SEC. 411. (a) The Water Resources Research Act of 1964 (Public Law 88-379, 78 Stat. 329; 42 U.S.C. 1961 et seq.), as amended, the Saline Water Conversion Act of 1971 (Public Law 92-60, 85 Stat. 159; 42 U.S.C. 1959 et seq.), as amended, and section 1 of the Water Research and Conversion Act of 1977 (Public Law 95-84) are hereby repealed. Nothing contained in this Act shall be construed to alter the authority of section 2 of Public Law 95-84.

(b) Nothing elsewhere in this Act is intended to repeal, supersede, or diminish existing authorities or responsibilities of any agency of the Federal Government concerning water resources

(c) Nothing in this Act shall be construed to alter existing law with respect to the ownership and control of water.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95-836), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURPOSE

The purpose of S. 2704, introduced at the request of the Administration, is to create an organic act for the Department of the Interior's Office of Water Research and Technology (OWRT). This bill would consolidate portions of Water Resources Research Act of 1964 (Public Law 88-379); the Saline Water Conversion Act of 1971 (Public Law 92-60); and the Water Research and Conservation Act of 1977 (Public Law 95-84), while repealing other portions of those Acts.

S. 2704 provides greater emphasis on technology development and demonstration, the coordination of research and development, and the dissemination, transfer, and practical applications of research and technology developments. The bill authorized appropriations for fiscal year 1979 consistent with the President's budget request, and such sums as necessary for fiscal year 1980.

The committee amended the levels of authorization and retained a portion of Public Law 95-84.

GENERAL STATEMENT

The OWRT program should serve as an integral component of the Nation's policy for wise and effective management of its water resources. The program received strong emphasis several years ago, reaching a peak level of appropriations in fiscal year 1971. The program then declined sharply before stabilizing somewhat below the present level of $27,000,000 annually.

The development of knowledge about the use of the Nation's limited resources of water is essential if we are to meet our needs for additional supplies of water. For this reason, the committee emphasizes the importance of the work of OWRT and related groups.

Title I of the bill re-enacts the authority for Federal matching grants to the 54 State water institutes for water research. The committee gave careful consideration to the work of the State water institutes and set the authorization for each institute at $150,000 in fiscal year 1979 and $180,000 in fiscal year 1980. While this is below the current level of authorization, it is substantially above the $110,000 actually appropriated annually to each institute in recent years. The committee urges the appropriation of the authorized amount in recognition of the need to expand the general program and to keep pace with inflation.

In addition, the bill authorizes $10,000,000 annually in matching grants to be open to all institutes and other interested parties on a competitive basis. The committee believes that such competition will encourage the most effective program to strengthen the national program to find more effective ways to use and improve water.

Title I of the measure also involves technology transfer. The committee considered making a separate authorization to each of the State water institutes for a program of technology transfer. It was found, however, that this might limit the flexibility of the institutes, to the detriment of their overall programs. The committee expects that the institutes will develop or continue an existing technology transfer program within the authorized level of $150,000 and $180,000 per institute. It is expected that each institute will utilize some of its funds to implement an effective technology transfer effort in the State.

In addition, the bill authorizes $750,000 in fiscal year 1979 and $1,350,000 in fiscal year 1980 for additional technology transfer grants. These sums will be made available on a competitive basis, with the institutes receiving preference. This money is intended to emphasize special new initiatives, particularly when an effort can be made to develop regional technology transfer programs.

The major change made by the committee was in title II, which authorizes research on the improvement of saline or other types of impaired waters. This section is designed to enhance the program for research at existing facilities. A total of $10 million is authorized for this activity.

It was the view of the committee that the bill, as introduced, failed to include a proper and sufficient emphasis for the development of the saline water conversion demonstration plants. Such plants were authorized by Congress last year in the Water Research and Conservation Act of 1977 (Public Law 95–84).

Section 2 of the 1977 Saline Water Act authorized construction of four demonstration projects at a cost of $40,000,000. The Secretary of the Interior is directed "to study, design, construct, operate, and maintain desalting plants demonstrating the engineering and economic viability of membrane and phase-change desalting processes at not more than four locations in the United States . . . provided, that at least two such plants shall demonstrate desalting of brackish ground water."

In hearings before the Subcommittee on Water Resources, Department of Interior witnesses stated that 50 percent of the cost of these demonstrations should be borne by non-Federal interests. The law already requires that the local sponsor provide a variety of items, including the necessary water, water rights, brine disposal areas, rights-of-way, and energy connections, as well as the assumption of full operating costs after a break-in period. The committee concluded that any cost sharing beyond the 1977 Act was inappropriate, particularly for a program that will demonstrate techniques designed to have national significance.

The committee, therefore, amended the bill to maintain the full saline water demonstration program as authorized under Public Law 94–84. The committee expects this program to go forward as rapidly as possible.

In response to a question in the hearings, the Administration's witness testified: "Demonstrations are needed to obtain cost and performances data needed by water planners and water suppliers to make judgments and decisions regarding how saline water technology can be applied to solve or mitigate real world water problem situations. Technology that is only developed to the pilot plant stage is not adequate to assure the viability of saline water conversion technology as a solution to real world water problems."

As the committee has noted previously, one opportunity for such a demonstration is in the Tularosa Basin of New Mexico, where sufficient underground brackish water exists that, if purified, could meet regional water needs for centuries.

Title III authorizes a technology transfer program to the Secretary. The committee believes this program will prove valuable in disseminating information about no-going research activities. The Secretary may also provide grants for development of applications of research results to State and local governments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

FEDERAL PHYSICIANS COMPARABILITY ALLOWANCE ACT OF 1978

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 990) to amend title 5, United States Code, to provide special allowances to certain physicians employed by the United States in order to enhance the recruitment and retention of such physicians, which has been reported from the Committee on Governmental Affairs with an amendment to strike all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Physicians Comparability Allowance Act of 1978".

SEC. 2. (a) Subchapter IV of chapter 59 of title 5, United States Code, relating to allowances, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 5948. PHYSICIANS COMPARABILITY ALLOWANCES

"(a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, and in order to recruit and retain highly qualified Government physicians, the head of an agency, subject to the provisions of this section and such regulations as the President or his designee may prescribe, may enter into a service agreement with a Government physician which provides for such physician to complete a specified period of service in such agency in return for an allowance for the duration of such agreement in an amount to be determined by the agency head and specified in the agreement, but not to exceed—

"(1) $7,000 per annum if, at the time the agreement is entered into, the Government physicians has served as a Government physician for twenty-four months or less, or

"(2) $10,000 per annum if the Government physician has served as a Government physician for more than twenty-four months.

"(b) An allowance may not be paid pursuant to this section to any physician who—

"(1) is employed on less than a half-time or intermittent basis,

"(2) Occupies an internship or residency training position,

"(3) is a reemployed annuitant, or

"(4) is fulfilling a scholarship obligation.

"(c) The head of an agency, pursuant to such regulations, criteria, and conditions as the President or his designee may prescribe shall determine categories of positions applicable to physicians in such agency with respect to which there is a significant recruitment and retention problem. Only physicians serving in such positions shall be eligible for an allowance pursuant to this section. The amounts of each such allowance shall be determined by the agency head, subject to such regulations, criteria, and conditions as the President or his designee may prescribe, and shall be the minimum amount necessary to deal with the recruitment and retention problem for each such category of physicians.

"(d) Any agreement entered into by a physician under this section shall be for a period of one year of service in the agency involved unless the physician requests an agreement for a longer period of service. No agreement shall be entered into under this section later than September 30, 1979, nor shall any agreement cover a period of service extending beyond September 30, 1981.

"(e) Unless otherwise provided for in the agreement under subsection (f) of this section, an agreement under this section shall provide that the physician, in the event that such physician voluntarily, or because of misconduct, fails to complete at least one year of service pursuant to such agreement, shall be required to refund the total amount received under this section, unless the head of the agency, pursuant to such regulations as may be prescribed under this section by the President or his designee, determines that such failure is necessitated by circumstances beyond the control of the physician.

"(f) Any agreement under this section shall specify, subject to such regulations as the President or his designee may prescribe, the terms under which the head of the agency and the physician may elect to terminate such agreement, and the amounts, if any, required to be refunded by the physician for each reason for termination.

"(g) For the purpose of this section—

"(1) 'Government physician' means any individual employed as a physician, dentist, or veterinarian who is paid under—

"(A) section 5332 of this title, relating to the General Schedule;

"(B) section 5361 of this title, or similar statutory authority, relating to administratively determined pay for certain specially qualified scientific or professional personnel

"(C) section 3 of the Tennessee Valley Authority Act of 1933 (16 U.S.C. 831b), relating to the Tennessee Valley Authority;

"(D) title 4 of the Foreign Service Act of 1946 (22 U.S.C. 861–890), relating to the Foreign Service;

"(E) section 10 of the Central Intelligence Agency Act of 1949 (50 U.S.C. 403j), relating to the Central Intelligence Agency; or

"(F) section 121 of title 2 of the Canal Zone Code, relating to the Canal Zone Government and the Panama Canal Company; and

"(2) 'agency' means an Executive agency, as defined in section 105 of this title, and the District of Columbia government.

"(h)(1) Any allowance paid under this section shall not be considered as basic pay for the purposes of subchapter VI and section 5595 of chapter 55, chapter 81, 83, or 87 of this title, or other benefits related to basic pay.

"(2) Any allowance under this section for a Government physician shall be paid in the same manner and at the same time as the physician's basic pay is paid.

"(i) Any regulations, criteria, or conditions that may be presented under this section by the President or his designee shall not be applicable to the Tennessee Valley Authority, and the Tennessee Valley Authority shall have sole responsibility for administering the provisions of this section with respect to Government physicians employed by the Authority.".

(b) The analysis for chapter 59 of such title is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"5948. Physicians comparability allowances."

(c) No agreement shall be entered into under section 5948 of title 5, United States Code, as added by subsection (a), before the 60th day after the date of the enactment of this Act. No such agreement shall provide for the payment of any allowance under such section for any pay period beginning before the later of—

(1) such 60th day, or

(2) October 1, 1978.

SEC. 3. (a) The Chairman of the Civil Service Commission shall submit a report each year to the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Governmental Affairs of the Senate regarding the operation of the special pay program authorized by section 5948 of title 5, United States Code, as added by section 2 of this Act.

(b) The Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall conduct—

(A) an investigation of the short-term and long-term problems facing the departments and agencies of the Federal Government (including the uniformed services and the Veterns Administration) in recruiting and retaining qualified physicians and dentists;

(B) an evaluation of the extent to which the implementation of a uniform system of pay, allowances, and benefits for all physicians, veterinarians and dentists employed in such Federal departments and agencies would alleviate or solve such recruitment and retention problems; and

(C) an investigation and evaluation of such other solutions to such recruitment and retention problems as deemed appropriate.

(c) After completion of the investigations and evaluations required to be made under paragraphs (1), (2), and (3) of this subsection, the Director shall, before September 30, 1980, submit to the Congress a report which—

(1) identifies suggested courses of legislative or administrative action (including proposed legislation) and cost estimates thereof, which in the judgment of the Director, will solve such recruitment and retention problems, and

(2) includes a recommendation, and justification thereof, as to which course of action of the courses identified under paragraph (1) should be undertaken.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95-864), explaining the purpose of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the Record, as follows:

PURPOSE

The purpose of the bill, as amended, is to enable Federal physicians, dentists and veterinarians, who are paid primarily under the General Schedule, to enter into service agreements with the head of an agency, which provides for such physician to complete a specified period of service in such agency in return for an allowance in the amount to be determined by the agency head. The amount of the allowance is not to exceed (1) $7,000 per annum if, the physician has served as a Government physician for 24 months or less, or (2) $10,000 per annum if the physician has served for more than 24 months. Such bonus contracts can only be offered to those categories of physicians in agencies where there is a significant recruitment and retention problem. In addition, contracts are to be awarded on a temporary basis with no agreement exceeding beyond September 30, 1981.

COMMITTEE ACTION

S. 990, as amended, provides the heads of executive agencies with discretionary authority to offer service agreements to certain categories of Federal physicians in order to alleviate recruitment and retention problems currently experienced by such agencies. The Civil Service Commission in a general statement on the recruitment and retention of Federal physicians, which was submitted to the committee, stated the following:

"Information from agencies and our own records show that virtually all Federal agencies experience extreme difficulty in recruiting and retaining physicians. The nationwide register of Medical Officers that is maintained by the Civil Service Commission contains just over 1,000 eligibles. This figure is deceptive, because an individual applicant may be on the register for positions at more than one grade level or for more than one specialty. Even more troublesome is the fact that about 44 percent of the physicians referred on certificates issued by the Commission to agencies are unavailable for placement. A large number of "non-availables" decline placement because of an undesirable geographical location of the position or the relatively low salary level. To overcome the shortage of available physicians, the Commission found it necessary to issue 93 noncitizen hire authorities in fiscal year 1977. As you may know, the Commissions can only issue such authorities when there are no U.S. citizens available to fill the vacancies.

"Since the vast majority of Federal physicians in the competitive service are employed by the Department of Defense and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the Commission has granted direct hire authorities to these agencies to combat the difficulties encountered in recruiting qualified physicians. This special recruitment flexibility is an addition to the authority to pay special rates world wide to medical officers, which currently is applicable to all agencies."

A further statement of the degree and extent of the recruitment and retention problems experienced by the 1805 physicians who are not covered under the uniformed services' or the Veterans' Administration's variable incentive pay plans is evidenced in the August 31, 1976, Comptroller General's report to the Congress, entitled "Recruiting and Retaining Federal Physicians and Dentists: Problems, Progress, and Actions Needed for the Future." As pointed out in the report, which was made pursuant to the Veterans' Administration Physician and Dentist Pay Comparability Act of 1975 (89 Stat. 669), and as reiterated by Senator Mathias at the March 10th subcommittee hearing:

"We found cases where differences between systems caused some employees to transfer between systems in an agency. In one PHS installation we visited, seven GS physicians transferred to the commissioned corps during fiscal year 1975 in order to receive VIP. Other GS physicians, who reportedly would have switched, had previously switched from the commissioned corps to the GS prior to the implementation of VIP because the benefits of the GS system were better at that time.

"We found numerous instances where physicians who were receiving VIP worked with physicians not receiving VIP because of ineligibility. This has caused bitterness among physicians and resulted in lawsuits being filed against the Federal Government by those physicians not receiving VIP."

In response to the General Accounting Office that one pay scale, rather than three pay scales, for Federal physicians be implemented, the committee adopted an amendment instructing the Director of Office of Management and Budget to investigate possible legislative and administrative solutions to the recruitment and retention problems and to submit a report to the Congress no later than September 30, 1980, 1 year before the expiration date of the service agreements authorized under S. 990, as amended.

The Civil Service Commission stated at the hearing that "the administration is in the process of reviewing Federal compensation policy on a broad basis." Further, according to a May 2, 1977, letter to the Honorable Ray Roberts, chairman of the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs, the former Director of OMB, Bert Lance, stated that OMB was reviewing relevant studies and that "(l)egislative proposals based upon this review will be reflected in the President's fiscal year 1979 budget." As a result, the committee believes the further study asked for in S. 990, as amended, will not put any extra burden on OMB, but only serve as an additional expression of the sense of the Congress that a comprehensive and permanent solution to the recruitment and retention problems faced by all Federal physicians be implemented.

Upon the recommendation of the Civil Service Commission, the committee adapted new language which makes major modifications in the bill. The primary change makes the bill applicable only to those physicians who are in categories which have been identified as having recruitment and retention problems. Such categories are to be identified by the head of the Agency in accordance with regulations, criteria, and conditions as may be prescribed by the President or his designee and the bonus contracts are to be administered on a discretionary basis. The committee endorsed this change as it is consistent with the rationale underlying bonus authorities now provided to physicians in the Veterans Administration and the uniformed services. Additional modifications that were recommended by the Civil Service Commission make the authority for entering into contract agreements end on September 30, 1979, the same date as proposed in the 1979 Budget for the Veterans' Administration, with all contracts terminating as of September 30, 1981.

The committee further believes that since similar recruitment and retention problems have been found to exist for certain categories of Federal veterinarians and dentists, Senator Mathias' suggestion to expand the definition of physician to include both veterinarians and dentists is appropriate and hence was adopted as an amendment by the committee.

However, such service agreements for veterinarians and dentists are to be implemented in the same manner for veterinarians and dentists as they will be for all physicians subject to the discretion of the head of an agency in accordance with the regulation, criteria and conditions as may be prescribed by the President or his designee.

According to the Civil Service Commission, there are approximately 6,500 dentists in the Federal workforce, but only 20 are found in the General Schedule. The remaining 5,080 dentists are employed by the military services and 886 are employed by the Veterans' Administration. With the exception of the 20 General Schedule physicians, the vast majority are already covered by existing bonus and special pay authorities.

Although there are 2,250 veterinarians in the General Schedule, since not all are experiencing recruitment and retention problems, many will not be eligible for service agreements under S. 990, as amended.

BACKGROUND

There are currently more than 20,000 Federal physicians employed by the Federal Government. The majority of these physicians are paid under three statutory pay systems; The Uniformed Services (DOD), The Veterans' Administration (VA), and the General Schedule.

Military medical officers are paid under an officer-rank system of military compensation. Physicians in the Commissioned Corps of the Public Health Service hold the same ranks and are paid in the same manner as military medical officers. Physicians in the Department of Medicine and Surgery of the Veterans' Administration are paid under a rank-in-person and a rank-in-job system, which resembles the General Schedule, but is actually quite different and more flexible in operation. Finally, physicians of the General Schedule are paid under a position classification system with grade levels and their definitions set in law.

Pay under the three salary systems covering Federal physicians is adjusted annually under the Federal pay comparability system. In the comparability process, a broadly based cross-industry survey of the corresponding private enterprise salary rates of selected General Schedule occupations, excluding medical occupations, is made. Currently, both DOD and VA have authority to grant temporary, special and incentive pay to alleviate recruitment and retention problems which have been identified.

When the so-called doctor draft, which had enabled the Uniformed Services to meet their needs for medical officers, ended in 1973, a supplemental pay, "variable incentive pay," up to $13,500 a year, was developed by the Department of Defense and Public Law 93-274, authorized on a temporary basis by the Congress in 1974 to insure adequate recruitment and retention of medical officers in a draft-free environment. The legislation, which expires next October, also covers physicians in the Public Health Service Commissioned Corps.

In 1975 when the Veterans' Administration experienced difficulties in meeting its needs for well-qualified physicians, especially in certain critically short specialties, the concept of a salary add-on was also extended to the VA physicians and dentists in the form of "special pay" under a bill passed by the Congress. This temporary legislation provides for "special pay" up to $13,500 for a 4-year employment contract. Although it, too, expires next October, Congress is working on additional temporary extensions.

No authority to provide "special pay" has been given to agencies employing General Schedule physicians. S. 990 is an attempt to meet this need.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FEDERAL RAILROAD SAFETY ACT AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1978

The bill (S. 3081) to amend the Federal Railroad Safety Act of 1970 to provide the Secretary of Transportation a longer period within which to assess civil penalties for certain violations, to extend authorizations of appropriations for fiscal year 1979 and 1980 for the rail safety program, and for other purposes, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Railroad Safety Act Amendments Act of 1978".

NOTICE OF VIOLATIONS

SEC. 2. The first sentence of section 207 of the Federal Railroad Safety Act of 1970 (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the "Safety Act") (45 U.S.C. 436) is amended to read as follows: "In any case in which the Secretary has failed to assess the civil penalty applicable under section 209 of this title, or no civil action has been commenced to obtain injunctive relief under section 210 of this title, with respect to a violation of any railroad safety rule, regulation, order, or standard issued under this title, within 90 days after the date on which notification was received by the Secretary from a State agency participating in investigative and surveillance activities under the provisions of section 206 of this title, that State agency may apply to the district court of the United States within the jurisdiction of which the violation occurred for the enforcement of such rule, regulation, order or standard.".

ROLE OF DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORTATION IN RAILROAD ACCIDENT INVESTIGATIONS; LIABILITY OF DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORTATION'S AGENTS

SEC. 3. Section 208 of the Safety Act (45 U.S.C. 437) is amended—

(1) by deleting subsection (b) and redesignating subsections (c) and (d) as subsections (b) and (c) respectively; and

(2) by amending newly designated subsection (b) to read as follows:

"(b) To carry out the Secretary's responsibilities under this title, officers, employees, or agents of the Secretary are authorized to enter upon, inspect, and examine rail facilities, equipment, rolling stock, operations and pertinent records at reasonable times and in a reasonable manner. Such officers, employees, or agents shall display proper credentials when requested, and during the course of such inspection or examination shall be considered employees of the Government for the purposes of the Federal Tort Claims Act (28 U.S.C. 2671 et seq.).".

"AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 4. Section 212 of the Safety Act (45 U.S.C. 441) is amended to read as follows:

"AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

"SEC. 212. There are authorized to be appropriated to carry out the provisions of this Act not to exceed $35,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and not to exceed $35,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1980. Sums appropriated for research and development, automated track inspection and the State safety grant program shall remain available until expended.".

HOURS OF SERVICE ACT; INTERSTATE COMMERCE REQUIREMENT

SEC. 5. Subsection (a) of the first section of the Act of March 4, 1907, as amended (45 U.S.C. 61), is amended to read as follows:

"(a) This Act shall apply to any common carrier engaged in interstate or foreign commerce by railroad.".

SEC. 6. (a) Section 4 of the Act of April 14, 1910, as amended (45 U.S.C. 13), and section 9 of the Act of February 17, 1911, as amended (45 U.S.C. 34), are each amended by inserting "assessed by the Secretary of Transportation and" after "shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $250 and not more than $2,500 for each and every such violation, to be", where those words appear in the respective sections.

(b) Section 25(h) of part I of the Interstate Commerce Act (49 U.S.C. 26(h)), is amended by inserting "assessed by the Secretary of Transportation and" after "shall be liable to a penalty of not less than $250 and not more than $2,500 for each and every day such violation, refusal, or neglect continues, to be".

AMENDMENTS TO THE RAILROAD REVITALIZATION AND REGULATORY REFORM ACT OF 1976

SEC. 7. Section 505 of the Railroad Revitalization and Regulatory Reform Act of 1976 (45 U.S.C. 825) is amended by (a) striking the last sentence of subsection (d)(3) thereof; and (b) striking "purchase under this title after September 30, 1978", and inserting in lieu thereof ", after September 30, 1979, make commitments to purchase under this title" in subsection (e) thereof.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95-865), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXCERPT

PURPOSE

It is the purpose of this legislation to provide authorization for appropriations to carry out the provisions of the Federal Railroad Safety Act for fiscal years 1979 and 1980 and to amend the Federal Railroad Safety Act, the Hours of Service Act and various related railroad laws to facilitate the timely enforcement of railroad safety programs. In addition, the legislation amends section 505 of the Railroad Revitalization and Regulatory Reform Act by eliminating the $100 million ceiling on the purchase of trustee certificates and by extending the date on which the Secretary of Transportation may commit funds under section 505 to September 30, 1979.

BACKGROUND AND NEED

The committee has been and continues to be concerned over the difficulty of the railroad industry to deal effectively with the problem of railroad safety and the lack of substantial improvements in safety statistics following enactment of the Federal Railroad Act of 1970. While national attention has recently focused on railroad safety problems as a result of the devastating rail accidents in Pensacola, Fla., Waverly, Tenn., and Youngstown, Fla., the Commerce Committee has been concerned for some time that while progress has been made in certain areas of rail safety, other problems appear to be growing worse.

Statistics available from the Federal Railroad Administration (FRA) show that total fatalities and injuries resulting from railroad accidents have shown a steady decrease in numbers over the 10-year period from 1966 through 1976. During that period, fatalities showed a 37-percent drop while total injuries showed an equally impressive 25-percent decrease. However, while the committee is encouraged by these statistics, it is greatly disturbed to learn that the total level of injuries and fatalities is still intolerably high—1977 figures show 1,531 deaths and 67,675 injuries—and this level must be further reduced.

Equally disturbing to the committee are statistics showing that train accidents have increased since 1966 by approximately 15 percent with a corresponding increase in costs. Total cost to the railroads as a result of train accidents rose 38 percent during the 10-year period and the trend does not appear to be changing. Testimony submitted to the committee during the course of hearings indicated that the cause of these train accidents are primarily in two areas—defects in the right-of-way or other structures and equipment failures. Together these two factors accounted for close to 70 percent of all train accidents.

Under provisions of the Federal Railroad Safety Authorization Act of 1976, the Office of Technology Assessment (OTA) was instructed to evaluate Federal railroad safety regulations and, in particular, the effectiveness of the Federal Railroad Safety Act of 1970. The results of that study highlight the dramatic relationship between the financial health of the railroad industry and its ability to reduce derailments and related accidents. The OTA report found that defects in track were the largest and most rapidly increasing single cause of derailments and that, unless there was a positive change in the economic health of the industry, there would be little chance for a decrease in rail accidents.

The committee was particularly concerned with the OTA findings in the area of the effects of Federal safety laws and regulations, effects of inspection activities, effects of research and development programs, and improvements in the handling of hazardous materials. Though the OTA report found that the current railroad statutory framework was adequate in dealing with railroad safety problems, the effectiveness of implementation has been hindered by inadequate use of accident data, jurisdictional problems, and the lack of alternative approaches to rail safety. Furthermore, OTA found that, in many instances, Federal Railroad Administration has not adequately articulated how certain regulations will bring about the desired results in rail safety improvements.

The OTA report reviewed the effectiveness of the Federal Railroad Administration inspection programs and found that the existing program has not greatly affected the accident rate. The Federal Railroad Administration inspection program is based on the premise that these inspections provide preventive safety measures. The committee appreciates the effectiveness of this type of activity and would like to see more inspectors in the field engaged in the automated track inspection program. The OTA report indicates that alternative approaches might be considered, and the committee encourages the Federal Railroad Administration to look into some of the more appropriate methods of administering its safety program.

The area of hazardous materials handling is of particular concern to the committee because of the possible catastrophic effects in the general population of tank car derailments. The committee is encouraged by the Secretary of Transportation's actions in expediting rulemaking proceedings on the retrofit of pressure tank cars and the elimination of carbon cast wheels by the end of the year. It is hoped that additional analysis will be undertaken by the Federal Railroad Administration to determine how the rail industry can effectively reduce the risks of hazardous materials transportation.

Finally, the committee wishes to emphasize the need for decreasing the level of deferred maintenance in the railroad industry. Not only does deferred maintenance adversely impact on the revenues and profits of the industry, but it has an obviously negative impact on rail safety. In this regard, the committee stresses the importance of track maintenance and the need to distribute funds as expeditiously as possible under the title V program of the Railroad Revitalization and Regulatory Reform Act of 1976. The largest increases in rail safety will come not from Federal regulation, but from the maintenance and rehabilitation of the right-of-way.

COMMITTEE ACTION

The Surface Transportation Subcommittee held hearings on S. 2897 on April 21, 1978. S. 2897 was introduced at the request of the Department of Transportation and provided for extensions of authorization in the amount of $35 million for both fiscal years 1979 and 1980. In addition, the Department's bill would extend the time period of review of safety violations by the Secretary of Transportation until actual receipt of the violation from the State agency and would help to preserve uniformity of interpretation of the railroad safety regulations. The Department's bill also would make it clear that the Federal Tort Claims Act does apply to the outside contract employees who operate as agents for the Department during inspections and examinations of rail facilities. Finally, the Department's bill would make it clear that the Hours of Service Act is to apply to any common carrier engaged in interstate or foreign commerce by railroad, thereby relieving the Federal railroad inspectors from having to prove, in each case in which a violation is processed, that one or two cars on that train were in fact moving in interstate commerce.

The primary purpose of the reported bill is to provide authorization for appropriations for the programs under the Federal Railroad Safety Act of 1970.

Finally, the reported bill contains an additional section, section 7, "Amendments to the Railroad Revitalization and Regulatory Act," that is designed to facilitate the distribution of funds under title V of the 4–R Act. Given the recent bankruptcy of the Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul and Pacific Railroad, raising to three the number of Class I railroads in reorganization, the committee felt it was necessary to eliminate the $100 million ceiling on the purchase of trustee certificates. Furthermore, the committee recognizes that railroad rehabilitation projects funded under section 505 will often be long, complex projects that may not be accomplished for many months after the commitment of Federal funding. Section 7 clarifies that September 30, 1979, is the date on which the Secretary's authority to commit funds shall terminate and allows drawdowns of funds for work accomplished after September 30, 1979.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

SIKES ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1978

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2987) to extend the authority for carrying out conservation and rehabilitation programs on military reservations and certain public lands, which had been reported from the Committee on Environment and Public Works with amendments as follows:

On page 2, line 2, strike "each of";

On page 2, line 3, strike "years" and insert "year";

On page 2, line 13, strike "each of";

On page 2, line 14, strike "three";

On page 2, line 14, strike "years" and insert "year";

On page 3, line 10, after "1979," insert "and";

On page 3, line 11, strike "$20,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1981, and $25,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982,";

On page 3, line 23, after "1979," insert "and";

On page 3, line 24, strike "$45,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1981, $50,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1982,";

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act shall be cited as the "Sikes Act Amendments of 1978".

SEC. 2. Section 106 of the Act of September 15, 1960 (16 U.S.C. 670f(b)), as amended, is further amended—

(1) by striking subsection (b); and

(2) by inserting in lieu thereof the following new subsections (b), (c), and (d):

"(b) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of Defense not to exceed $1,500,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and for the next fiscal year thereafter to carry out this title, including the enhancement of fish and wildlife habitat and the development of public recreation and other facilities. The Secretary of Defense shall, to the greatest extent practicable, enter into agreements to utilize the services, personnel, equipment, and facilities, with or without reimbursement, of the Secretary of the Interior in carrying out the provisions of this section.

"(c) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of the Interior not to exceed $4,500,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and for the next fiscal year thereafter to carry out functions and responsibilities as the Secretary may have under cooperative plans to which such Secretary is a party under this section, including those for the enhancement of fish and wildlife habitat and the development of public recreation and other facilities.

"(d) Sums authorized to be appropriated under this section shall be available until expended. In the event funds requested for appropriations are less than those authorized under this section, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Defense shall report to the Committee on Environment and Public Works of the Senate and the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives stating with particularity the reason for not requesting appropriation of the amount authorized under this section and the plans of such Secretary for otherwise carrying out the intent of this Act.".

SEC. 3. Section 209 of such Act (16 U.S.C. 670o) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 209. (a) There are authorized to be appropriated the sum of $10,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and $15,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1980, to enable the Department of the Interior to carry out its functions and responsibilities under this title, including data collection, research, planning, and conservation and rehabilitation programs on public lands. Such funds shall be in addition to those authorized for wildlife, range, soil, and water management pursuant to section 318 of the Federal Land Policy and Management Act of 1976, or other provisions of law.

"(b) There are authorized to be appropriated the sum of $35,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and $40,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1980, to enable the Department of Agriculture to carry out its functions and responsibilities under this title. Such funds shall be in addition to those provided under other provisions of law. In requesting funds under this subsection the Secretary shall take into account fish and wildlife program needs, including those for projects, identified in the State comprehensive plans as contained in the program developed pursuant to the Forest and Rangeland Renewable Resources Planning Act of 1974, as amended (16 U.S.C. 1601).

"(c) In the event funds requested for appropriations are less than those authorized under this section, the Secretary of the Interior and the Secretary of Agriculture shall report to the Committee on Environment and Public Works of the Senate and the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives stating with particularity the reason for not requesting appropriation of an amount authorized under this section and the plans of such Secretary for otherwise carrying out the intent of this Act.".

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

COUNCIL ON ENVIRONMENTAL QUALITY AUTHORIZATIONS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 10884) to authorize appropriations to the Council on Environmental Quality for fiscal years 1979, 1980, and 1981, which had been reported from the Committee on Environment and Public Works with an amendment to strike all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That section 205 of the Environmental Quality Improvement Act of 1970 (42 U.S.C. 4374) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 205. There are hereby authorized to be appropriated for the operations of the Office of Environmental Quality and the Council on Environmental Quality not to exceed the following sums for the following fiscal years which sums are in addition to those contained in Public Law 91-190:

"(a) $2,126,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979; and

"(b) $3,000,000 for each of the fiscal years ending September 30, 1980, and September 30, 1981.".

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent on behalf of Mr. CULVER to have printed in the RECORD a statement at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REAUTHORIZING FUNDS FOR COUNCIL ON ENVIRONMENTAL QUALITY

● Mr. CULVER. Mr. President, in 1970, Congress passed the Environmental Quality Improvement Act to provide funds and staff assistance to the Council on Environmental Quality (CEQ) for its ongoing policy analysis and research concerning environmental matters. The $3 million annual authorization for the Council on Environmental Quality expires at the end of fiscal year 1978.

The administration has asked that the law be extended at the level of $2,126,000 for fiscal year 1979 and such sums as may be necessary for fiscal year 1980. In addition, the Council has indicated it will seek increased authorizations for fiscal years 1980 and 1981, not to exceed $3 million annually.

The bill approved by the Committee on Environment and Public Works essentially reflects the administration's request by authorizing $2,126,000 for fiscal year 1979 and $3 million each for fiscal years 1980 and 1981. This amount should provide the necessary funds for ongoing research being conducted by the Council on various environmental issues such as energy development, air quality, coastal zone management and toxic substances, and permit CEQ to continue its other advisory, coordination and information-supplying activities.

Mr. President, I believe H.R. 10884 will let the Council on Environmental Quality continue its significant role in environmental affairs, and I urge the Senate to approve it.●

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

MRS. YOUNG HEE KIM KANG, HEE JAE KANG, HEE JIN KANG, AND HEE SOO KANG

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 3996) for the relief of Mrs. Young Hee Kim Kang, Hee Jae Kang, Hee Jin Kang, and Hee Soo Kang, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to strike all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That, for the purposes of the Immigration and Nationality Act, notwithstanding the death on September 15, 1975, of Jun Kun Kang, who was the beneficiary of an approved petition filed April 22, 1974, in his behalf by his brother, Stanley Shin Kang, a citizen of the United States, Young Hee Kim Kang, the spouse of Jun Kun Kang, and their children, Hee Jae Kang, Hee Jin Kang, and Hee Soo Kang shall, if otherwise eligible, be entitled to fifth preference status under section 203(a)(9) of the Act as of April 22, 1974.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95-902), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURPOSE OF THE BILL

The purpose of the bill, as amended, is to restore fifth preference status in behalf of Young Hee Kim Kang and her children, Hee Jae Kang, Hee Jin Kang, and Hee Soo Kang. The purpose of the amendments is to clarify the language of the bill.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

The beneficiaires of this bill are a 39-year-old widow and her three children, ages 16, 14, and 9, who are natives and citizens of Korea. The husband and father of the beneficiaries was the beneficiary of a visa petition filed by his brother, a U.S. citizen. The family was in the process of obtaining immigration visas when the principal beneficiary of the petition died of cancer on September 15, 1975, in Korea. Upon his death, the visa petition automatically became invalid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read:

A bill for the relief of Young Hee Kim Kang and her children, Hee Jae Kang, Hee Jin Kang, and Hee Soo Kang.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ANADROMOUS FISH CONSERVATION ACT AMENDMENT

The bill (S. 415) to amend the Anadromous Fish Conservation Act to include fish in Lake Champlain that ascend streams to spawn was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Anadromous Fish Conservation Act, as amended (16 U.S.C. 757a-f), is amended by inserting immediately after the words "Great Lakes", wherever they appear therein, the words "or Lake Champlain".

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95-907), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

INTRODUCTION

The goal of the Anadromous Fish Conservation Act is to restore severely depleted anadromous fish stocks and their habitats, to enhance existing anadromous fish populations, and to create new fisheries where possible, for the benefit of sport and commercial fisheries.

Non-Federal participants in this program include 29 State fishery agencies, universities, and one Indian tribe. Grantees with individual projects receive up to 50 percent Federal funding for eligible projects; on multi-State cooperative projects the Federal share can be as high as 66⅔ percent. Project funds can be used for construction, research, fish production, operation and maintenance of facilities, coordination and planning.

The benefits to both sport and commercial fisheries of this program have been enormous. The initiatives begun under this act have resulted in fisheries success stories throughout the country. The estimated dollar value in terms of fishery benefits both sport and commercial, during the act's 12-year funding period, is $440,600,000. Expenditures during that same period were $24,623,000.

DISCUSSION

At present only certain coastal waters and the waters of the Great Lakes are eligible for the programs within the Anadromous Fish Conservation Act. It was brought to the attention of the committee that in the waters of Lake Champlain there existed a tremendous potential for a salmonid fishery. Since 1973 much work has gone into development of a master plan for development of this fishery but work has been slowed because of limits imposed by inadequate funding, insufficient basic research on the lake and lack of programs and facilities for beginning and then managing an expanded fishery.

If the waters of Lake Champlain are included within those waters eligible for the competitive grant funds under the Anadromous Fish Conservation Act, the States bordering the lake will have the opportunity to begin in earnest the initiation of efforts to implement the master plan.

The committee also notes that because of the proximity of Lake Champlain to many of the major metropolitan areas in the northeast there is a tremendous need to develop the recreational potential on the lake. This bill by making those waters eligible for funds under the act can help the States bordering the lake fulfill this potential.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

SETTLEMENT OF RETROACTIVE SOCIAL SERVICES CLAIMS

The bill (H.R. 11370) to authorize an appropriation to reimburse expenditures for social services provided by the States prior to October 1, 1975, under titles I, IV–A, VI, X, XIV, and XVI of the Social Security Act, was considered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement by Mr. MOYNIHAN be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, on December 15, 1978, I introduced S. 2360, a bill to authorize funds necessary to settle a longstanding dispute between 28 States and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare arising out of numerous claims for social services rendered under the several titles of the Social Security Act that authorized such services prior to October 1, 1975, when the current title XX took effect.

This bill won widespread support in the Senate. Twenty-nine Senators asked to cosponsor it. On February 7, it was favorably reported by the Committee on Finance. President Carter requested the necessary funds in his fiscal 1979 budget, and the Congress made room for this expenditure in the first concurrent resolution on the budget.

On Tuesday, May 23, the House of Representatives passed the counterpart bill (H.R. 11370) by an overwhelming vote of 377 to 25. The House-passed bill is now before the Senate. It differs from S. 2360 in just a few minor technical details. In my view, we should now pass the House bill and thereby avoid any delay in the final enactment of this worthwhile, popular and uncontroversial measure.

The present title XX program represents a marked improvement over the previous social service titles under which these disputes arose in a series of misunderstandings, abuses, and apparent manipulations so well chronicled by Dr. Martha Derthick in her brilliant book, "Uncontrollable Spending for Social Services Grants" published by the Brookings Institution in 1975. It is now time to complete the transition from those programs to title XX. Passage of the present legislation, and implementation of the agreement it embodies, will have the salutary effect. It is a step forward for American federalism, and I congratulate all concerned on their success in bringing us to this point. It is also a fine example of the enduring ability of the executive branch, the two Houses of Congress, and the several States democratically to reach amicable and broadly satisfactory solutions to the problems that inevitably arise in the workings of a complex modern society.●

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER TO INDEFINITELY POSTPONE S. 2360

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Calendar Order No. 577, S. 2360, relating to settlement of retroactive social services claims, be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REVISED LIST OF COSPONSORS FOR S. 50—THE FULL EMPLOYMENT AND BALANCED GROWTH ACT OF 1978

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, on behalf of Mrs. HUMPHREY, I ask unanimous consent that the cosponsors of S. 50, as introduced on January 10, 1977, be amended to read as follows:

Mrs. HUMPHREY (for herself, Mr. NELSON, Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. JAVITS, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. BROOKE, Mr. JACKSON, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. RIBICOFF, Mr. ABOUREZK, Mr. ANDERSON, Mr. BAYH, Mr. CASE, Mr. CLARK, Mr. EAGLETON, Mr. HATHAWAY, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. MCGOVERN, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. PELL, Mr. RIEGLE, and Mr. SARBANES).

● Mrs. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, this change is necessary so that the list of cosponsors on the legislation now being considered by the Senate Banking Committee and on the bill that has been approved by the Senate Human Resources Committee reflect those Senators who joined with me on February 23, 1978, in introducing the most recent version of the Full Employment and Balanced Growth Act.●

1938 EVIAN CONFERENCE RECALLS NEED FOR GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, time has given us a valuable perspective in analyzing the actions of the nations in the past, and sometimes when we study history, we can perceive grave mistakes which went unnoticed in their own day. One such tragic mistake occurred in 1938, in a conference held at Evian-Les-Bains, France.

The United States chaired this conference, and the intentions of the conference were certainly noble ones. It was clear in 1938 that the Jews in Austria and Germany were in grave peril, and the parties to the conference hoped that a land could be found for the resettlement of many of Europe's Jews. The persecution of the Jews was well underway in Austria and Germany, and that persecution was well known to the conferees at Evian.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, no one at Evian really realized or believed that the Nazis would act to exterminate the Jewish race. None of the great countries of the world was willing to accept a large number of Jewish refugees. The problem, by the way, was not securing their release from Germany and Austria. Rather, it was finding a country which was willing to absorb the refugees.

The Evian Conference was worse than a failure. It not only failed to find some way to help the Jewish refugees, but it also broadcast to the German leaders the lack of resolve which the other major powers had to take action to save the Jews. Hitler himself, in a speech after the Evian Conference, said:

The other world is oozing with sympathy for the poor, tormented people, but remains hard and obdurate when it comes to helping them.

The true consequences of the Evian Conference were not realized until after World War II, when the extent of the program became clear. Six million Jews had been killed.

I ask unanimous consent that an excellent article by Peggy Mann about the Evian Conference, which appeared in a recent edition of the Washington Post, be printed in full immediately following my remarks.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I also wish to take this opportunity to point out to Senators that the Evian Conference shows that inaction can have very serious consequences. Today, the Genocide Convention awaits the action of the Senate. For 30 years, this treaty has been pending before the Senate, while over 80 other nations have ratified its provisions. This treaty, which would make the commission of genocide an international crime, was drafted largely because of the atrocities which occurred in Germany and Austria during World War II. The United States failed to act affirmatively at the Evian Conference. I hope that we will not continue to make the same mistake twice. I urge the Senate to ratify the Genocide Convention as soon as possible.

PRELUDE TO HOLOCAUST

(By Peggy Mann)

EVIAN-LES-BAINS, FRANCE.—I stood on a lawn overlooking Lac Leman where tiny sailboat triangles moved slowly through the evening. Behind me rose the white splendor of the Royal Hotel. It was a setting epitomizing peace, well-being. Yet, this is the place where, in July, 1938, the holocaust—the murder of two-thirds of Europe's Jews—could have been halted.

Here, in the famed French resort, 15 weeks after Hitler annexed Austria, delegates from 32 nations met to determine how they could rescue the Jews of the Greater German Reich, help them to reestablish their lives elsewhere.

Never before in history had nations of the world gathered together for the single purpose of saving a doomed people. "Nations of Asylum" they called themselves.

The conference had been organized by President Franklin D. Roosevelt, who appointed Myron C. Taylor, former president of U.S. Steel, as his special ambassador. All of the delegates were important men: three ambassadors, three ministers, 13 envoys and 13 other diplomats of high status. They settled into their luxurious suites at the Royal Hotel buoyed by the aura of expectancy and good will which news of the conference had engendered.

Reporters from the 32 nations attended. Two days before the opening of the conference, Anne O'Hare McCormick wrote in The New York Times: "It is heartbreaking to think of the queues of desperate human beings around our consulates in Vienna and other cities waiting in suspense for what happens at Evian. But the question they underline is not simply humanitarian . . . It is a test of civilization . . . Can America live with itself if it lets Germany get away with this policy of extermination, allows the fanaticism of one man to triumph over reason, refuses to take up this gage of battle against barbarism?"

Who were these "Nations of Asylum?" Argentina, Australia, Brazil, Colombia, Denmark, the United States, Great Britain and her Commonwealth countries, France, Belgium, Sweden, Norway, the Netherlands, Switzerland, nations of Latin America and Africa. Only two countries, Italy and South Africa, turned down the invitation, but South Africa sent an observer.

There also was a contingent of uninvited observers: Nazis. No one knew quite what to do about this, so they were allowed to remain. They showed up at every session, most of them dressed in mufti. And they took careful notes during all the proceedings.

Also attending were top officials of 39 refugee organizations, including 20 Jewish organizations, who had come to present the delegates with eyewitness accounts, reports, statistics, all of which culminated in one irrefutable conclusion: the Jews of Hitler's Reich were doomed unless they could get out of Germany and Austria.

And they could get out—then. Indeed, the official German policy in 1938 was to make the Reich Judenrein—purified of Jews—by getting the Jews out. There was only one problem. Who would let the Jews in?

A sad joke was making the rounds in the Reich. A Jew goes into a travel agent; he wants to take a trip. The agent sets a globe on the counter before him. "There. The world. Choose." Slowly the Jew turns the globe, studying it carefully. Finally, he looks up and says: "Have you got anything else?"

There was, in fact, only one spot in the world where Europe's Jews were welcomed. Palestine. At least they were welcomed by the Jews of Palestine, not by the Arabs of Palestine. And not by the British who held a League of Nations mandate to rule over Palestine. Just prior to the Evian Conference, the deputy head of the British delegation, Sir Michael Palairet, succeeded in winning a promise from Taylor that the world's most eloquent spokesman for increased Jewish immigration to Palestine, Dr. Chaim Weizmann, would not be allowed to speak. Not only was Dr. Weizmann an eloquent spokesman, he also was the most official spokesman the Jewish people had. He was president of the World Zionist Organization and president of the Jewish Agency, the widely recognized government of the Jewish people. A 40-year-old woman named Mrs. Golda Meyerson (Meir) had been sent to Evian by the Yishuv, the Jews of Palestine, because of her direct forcefulness as a speaker. But she also was not allowed to speak.

A heated debate took place during the first 2 days of the conference. The subject: which of the three main powers, the United States, France or Britain, should chair the proceedings. It was finally decided that the honor should go to the United States.

Then the representatives of the 39 refugee organizations were heard. All of their presentations were scheduled for a single afternoon. Each representative was given 10 minutes. As the afternoon wore on, the time allocated was cut to 5 minutes. The World Jewish Congress, which represented 7 million Jews, had 5 minutes. The Association for Aid to German Scientists had 5 minutes. The delegation of Jews of the Reich did not receive any time at all. They were told to submit a written memorandum to be included in the minutes.

HORRORS IN AUSTRIA

In the limited time at their disposal, the advocates of Jewish survival detailed horrors which had been happening for the past 3 months in Austria: tens of thousands of Jews thrown into concentration camps . . . men, women, even small children cornered on the streets, beaten, kicked, whipped by black-booted SS men . . . rabbis sent to clean the SS toilets . . . Jewish women forced down on their knees to scrub the gutters, often with acid added to the scrub water . . . throughout the country civilians "cooperating" with the SS by beating up Jews, evicting them from their flats, breaking into Jewish shops and homes, carting out anything of value. The explosion of terror and sadism even exceeded what had been seen in Germany.

Newspaper reports also were distributed to the Evian delegates. For example, two weeks before Evian, The London Times Vienna correspondent had written about "the constant arrest of the Jewish population. No specific charge is made, but men and women, young and old, are taken each day and each night from their houses or in the streets and carried off . . . There can be no Jewish family in the country which has not one or more of its members under arrest. The state of hopelessness and panic which is engendered can be imagined . . ."

In Austria, it had been happening for 3 months, since Hitler took over that country. In Germany it had been happening for 3 years, starting officially with the Nuremberg Laws of Sept. 15, 1935. The German Jew was not recognized as a citizen. All Jews in the civil service had been fired. Jewish teachers had been fired. Jews were excluded from the entertainment industry, from journalism, radio, the stock exchange, law. Indeed, by 1937, half the Jews in Germany were unemployed. And signs had started appearing throughout the county, signs on butcher shops, dairies, groceries, pharmacies: No Jews Allowed. Thus, in many towns, Jews could not buy milk for their children, medicine for their sick. Jewish children had to attend segregated schools and even kindergartens bore the signs: Jewish Scum, or Cursed Be the Jew.

Meanwhile, a brand new First Reader had been issued for small German Aryans. In the section on religion, for example, the youngsters read: "Remember that the Jews are children of the devil and murderers of mankind. Whoever is a murderer deserves to be killed himself."

A month prior to the Evian Conference, the Great Synagogue of Munich was destroyed on Hitler's personal orders, followed by the destruction of synagogues in Nuremberg and Dortmund. Two weeks before the conference, 15,000 Jews were arrested throughout Germany, sent to concentration camps. In Buchenwald, Jews were whipped, tortured in the day time. And all through the night a recorded voice kept shouting through the loudspeaker. "Any Jew who wishes to hang himself is asked first to put a piece of paper in his mouth with his number on it, so that we may know who he is."

Today, when asked how many of the 6 million annihilated Jews came from Germany and Austria, most people answer, 3 million, 4 million or more.

The fact is that at the time of the Evian Conference there were only 350,000 Jews in Germany and 220,000 in Austria. The 32 "Nations of Asylum," many of which had vast areas of unpopulated lands, could easily have agreed to save every Jew in the Greater German Reich? How many did they agree to save?

WHAT THE U.S. DID

Taylor was the first to speak on the subject. His words were awaited with great anticipation. Not only had the conference been called by the American president, but, in his opening address, he had exhorted the delegates to uphold "those principles which we have come to regard as the standards of our civilization."

Some delegates wondered whether the United States would agree to accept all the Reich's 570,000 Jewish refugees. (A generation later, the United States accepted 585,000 Cuban and Vietnamese refugees, with no noticeable ill effects on the economic life of the nation.)

Carefully, Ambassador Taylor explained that the United States had its quota system which could not be changed. However, an important new step now would be taken. Although the total German quota was 25,957 per year, it so happened that a total of only 27,000 Jews had been admitted to the United States during the past 6 years. (This had been brought about through a number of factors. They ranged from a "roadblock" set down by President Herbert Hoover in 1932 with the intent of discouraging immigration to the depression-ridden United States to the outright anti-Semitism of certain local U.S. consuls who made the on-the-spot decisions as to who should be granted visas.) Although, said Ambassador Taylor, unused quotas of previous years could not be used in subsequent years, U.S. consuls were being advised that the severe restrictions they had imposed upon Jewish refugees should be lifted for the current year, so that the full quota of 27,730 German and Austrian immigrants would be admitted each year. (This included, of course, any Christians who wished to come.)

There was a stunned silence as the ambassador sat down. This was the great gesture of hope and help offered by the nation populated by immigrants, the nation which for generations had offered asylum to Europe's oppressed?

Why had Roosevelt called the conference if this was the example the United States planned to set? Countless polls had shown that Americans, on the whole, were dead set against any increase in immigration quotas. On the other hand, the Nazi annexation of Austria had brought about increased pressure from many organizations, congressmen and reporters (notably Dorothy Thompson) for a State Department action to aid the refugees. According to an internal State Department memorandum, the Evian conference would enable the United States to "get out in front and attempt to guide the pressure, primarily with a view toward forestalling attempts to have the immigration laws liberalized."

Roosevelt sincerely hoped that the Evian conference, large underpopulated countries would accept the Jews of the Reich. Indeed, he previously had proposed this idea to Brazil.

The United States was only the first nation to be heard from. There were 31 others, some of them the largest and least populated countries in the world. Surely they would find room for the refugees: Canada, the second largest nation in the world; Brazil, the fifth largest; Australia, the sixth largest. Between them they could easily absorb all the half-million would-be refugees.

The delegate from Canada explained that Canada could accept only experienced agricultural workers. (Colombia, Uruguay and Venezuela, it turned out, also had the same immigration restriction.)

What of the vast and underpopulated nation of Brazil? When inviting countries to the conference, the U.S. State Department had made it clear that no country "would be expected to make any change in its immigration legislation." And just before coming to the conference, Brazil had enacted a brand new law—henceforth, every visa application must be accompanied by a certificate of baptism. So, unfortunately, Brazil could not accept any Jews at all.

The entire continent of Australia had a population of the city of London today. "Populate or perish" was a popular Australian slogan. Politicians were warning that if Australians did not populate their own 3 million square miles, someone else would do it for them. Yet, the Australian delegate, Lt. Col. J. W. White, minister of commerce and customs, explained that Australia could accept only 15,000 Jewish immigrants over a 3-year period. "As we have no real racial problem, we are not desirous of importing one." (Actually, from 1933 to 1943, only 9,000 entered the country.)

The British delegate had similar worries. A rush of Jewish refugees from the Reich "might arouse anti-Semitic feeling in Great Britain." Nor did the British colonial empire contain territory suitable for the large-scale resettlement of the refugees. (No mention was made of Palestine.)

The French delegate announced that his country had already taken in 200,000 Jews and "had reached the saturation point."

Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Honduras, all classified intellectuals and merchants as undesirables. Unfortunately, half the Jews in Germany and Australia fell into the "intellectual" category; doctors, lawyers, professors; most of the rest were businessmen.

The Swiss delegate spoke about the "inundation" of Jewish refugees after the fall of Austria to Hitler. Three or four thousand had already fled across the border, and unless the flow stopped, he warned, "Switzerland, which has as little use for these Jews as has Germany, will herself take measures to protect Switzerland from being swamped by Jews with the connivance of the Viennese police."

And so it went during the final days of the conference. One delegate after another rose with a similar message: The situation for Jews in the Reich was, indeed, horrendous. Unfortunately, his country's laws prevented any concrete aid. But he was certain that other nations would open their doors.

Three small countries did express willingness to help. Holland, the most densely populated of the Evian nations, with some 800 people per square mile, had already taken in more than 25,000 Jewish refugees, but offered itself as a country of temporary asylum. (The Germans invaded 2 years later, and by the end of the war, 75 percent of the Jews in Holland had perished.)

The Danish delegate stated that his overcrowded country would continue to accept refugees. (And Denmark took in—and protected—1,500 Jews.) The Dominican Republic announced it would settle 100,000 refugees. (However, due to innumerable roadblocks, only 500 found a home there.)

Even the positive proposals put forth by these three small nations at Evian were drowned out by an official resolution passed unanimously on the final day of the conference: "The delegates of the Countries of Asylum are not willing to undertake any obligations toward financing involuntary immigration." In simpler words, only Jews who could afford to pay their way would be accepted. Since it had been clearly brought out at the conference that no Jew was permitted to leave Germany or Austria with more than 10 Reichsmarks—less than $5—that single resolution made every Jew from Germany and Austria officially and automatically unacceptable to "the Countries of Asylum."

Furthermore, at the request of some of the South American delegates, "contentious allusions" to the Third Reich were omitted in the final resolution.

The delegates then appointed a committee to study the matter further: The Intergovernmental Committee on Refugees. The director was an American lawyer, George Rublee, a friend of FDR. The committee set up headquarters in London.

1938 GERMAN POGROM

On Nov. 9 and 10, four months after Evian, came the Kristallnacht (crystal night, so-called after the glass that littered the streets from the windows of Jewish homes and businesses), the ghastly government-sponsored campaign of arson, mayhem and terror aimed exclusively at Jews and carefully organized throughout every village, town and city of Germany and the country which had been Austria. Some 267 synagogues and congregational buildings were razed, and 7,500 Jewish shops were damaged, virtually the entire number which remained in the Reich prior to Nov. 9. A few Jews were thrown out of apartment house windows and from moving trains. Some were shot while trying to escape. Nearly 30,000 Jewish men between 16 and 18 were arrested on Nov. 10 and sent to concentration camps, 10,911 to Dachau, 9,845 to Buchenwald and 9,000 to Sachsenhausen.

In the villages, Nazi gauleiters held competitions to see which community should be "purified" of Jews first. Men, women, even small children were dragged from their homes, driven and whipped through the streets. Some were tethered to horse carts, their bodies pulled down country roads. Some were tied up and thrown into rivers. A few were hung. Official German figures listed 33 German Jews killed. But reporters and diplomats counted many more Jews murdered.

The Kristallnacht was the worst pogrom the modern world had, as yet, known, and outrage replaced apathy as tens of thousands of citizens of the Countries of Asylum petitioned their governments to immediately open their doors to the imperiled Jews of the Reich. Britain took in 9,000 Jewish children; Holland took in 1,700; Belgium accepted several hundred more. And George Rublee felt that now, finally, the time had come. Now the 32 nations must act. He put forth a simple plan. Each of the 32 nations should at once accept 25,000 Jews.

If only half the 32 nations had agreed, every Jew in the Reich could have been saved. None agreed.

Four days after the Kristallnacht, Rublee wired Secretary of State Cordell Hull: "The attack on the Jewish community in Germany on the one hand and the indifference of the participating (Evian) governments to the fate of the victims on the other has brought the affairs of tthe Intergovernmental Committee to a critical state where, in our opinion, immediate action is required if the president's initiative is to lead to a positive result . . .

"With the exception of the United States, which has maintained its quota, and the British Isles, which are admitting immigrants at a current month's rate equal to the rate immigrants are being admitted to the United States, doors have been systematically closed to involuntary immigrants since the meeting at Evian.

Indeed, during the four months since the Evian Conference some of the nations of asylum, including Argentina, Mexico, Chile and Uruguay, had adopted new and even more restrictive immigration regulations, specifically designed to keep out Jews.

On Nov. 15, the day after Rublee's urgent cable to Hull, President Roosevelt held a press conference. His prepared statement on the Kristallnacht included the realization that: "The news of the past few days from Germany has deeply shocked public opinion in the United States . . . I myself could scarcely believe that such things could occur in a 20th century civilization."

When a reporter asked whether the president would recommend a temporary change in the immigration laws so that more refugees would enter the United States, he replied that no such changes were being considered.

Was the United States contemplating breaking trade relations with the Third Reich?

"No," said the president.

Similar reactions were forthcoming from other "Evian nations." Most of the nations of asylum expressed their strong disapproval of the Kristallnacht. But none modified their immigrations laws so that the Reich's half-million Jews could be saved.

GERMAN REACTION

What if the Evian Conference had proceeded according to the desperate hopes of European Jewry? What if the delegates of the Nations of Asylum had stood up, one after the other, to announce their nations' horror at what was happening to the Jews of Germany and Austria? What if each nation at Evian had immediately agreed to take in 17,000 Jews at once? Every Jewish man, woman and child in Germany and Austria could have left for a new homeland.

But, as Golda Meir later wrote, "After the conference at Evian-les-Bains, it became chillingly clear that the Jewish people were entirely 'on their own.' "

The Evian Conference took place 8 months before Germany's annexation of Czechoslovakia, 14 months prior to the Nazi invasion of Poland and the outbreak of World War II. During all those strategic months, it was only the Reich's 570,000 Jews who were in dire danger. Their lives, in any case, would have been saved.

Could the holocaust have been halted at Evian? No one can second-guess history. But after a staunch expression of world opinion regarding the horrors being perpetuated on the Jews of the Reich—world opinion backed by world action—it seems almost inconceivable that Hitler would have proceeded with his "final solution to the Jewish problem."

What is certainly clear is that, in Hitler's view, the Evian Conference gave him carte blanche to go ahead.

Just prior to the conference, Hitler had said in a speech at Konigsberg, "I can only hope and expect that the other world, which has such deep sympathy for these criminals, will at least be generous enough to convert this sympathy into practical aid. We, on our part, are ready to put all these criminals at the disposal of these countries, for all I care, even on luxury ships."

In a speech made immediately after the conference, Hitler derided "the other world" which "is oozing sympathy for the poor, tormented people, but remains hard and obdurate when it comes to helping them."

The Danziger Vorposten summed up reaction to Nazi newspapers in a single sentence: "The Evian Conference serves to justify Germany's policy against Jewry."

After the conference, when French Foreign Minister Georges Bonnet informed Germany Foreign Minister Joachim von Ribbentrop that France's great interest in the Jewish problem was "not to receive any more Jews," Ribbentrop replied with understanding, "We all wish to get rid of the Jews. But no country wishes to admit them."

On Oct. 14, 1938, the French wrote an explanatory memorandum to the German Foreign Ministry about the intergovernmental Committee on Refugees which had been born at Evian. This document stressed the purely humanitarian function of the committee, and reassured the Germans that "none of the states would dispute the absolute right of the German government to take, with regard to certain of its citizens, such measure as are within its own sovereign powers."

Hitler then informed the South African defense minister, Oswald Pirow, "We shall solve the Jewish problem in the immediate future . . . The Jews will disappear."

On Nov. 22, 1938—4 months after Evian—a front page article appeared in Das Schwarze Korps, official newspaper of the Gestapo: "Because it is necessary, because we no longer hear the world's screeching and because, after all, no power on earth can hinder us, we will now bring the Jewish question to its totalitarian solution." Steps toward the final solution were outlined, concluding with the sentence: "The result would be the actual and definite end of Jewry in Germany and its complete extermination."

There are few people today who even remember the momentous conference which, perhaps, more than any other single factor underwrote the death warrant for 6 million European Jews. However, when I visited Evian last summer, I did find one man who remembered: Rene Richier, the elderly concierge at the Royal Hotel. He was a concierge then, at the time of the conference.

"Oh yes," Richter told me, "I remember the Evian Conference well. Very important people were here and all the delegates had a nice time. They took pleasure cruises on the lake. They gambled at night in the casino. They took mineral baths and massages at the Etablissment Thermal. Some of them took the excursion to Chamonix to go summer skiing. Some went riding; we have, you know, one of the finest stables in France. Some played golf. We have a beautiful course overlooking the lake. Meetings. Yes, some attended the meetings. But, of course, it is difficult to sit indoors hearing speeches when all the pleasures that Evian offers are waiting right outside."

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

LT. GEN. WOODROW W. VAUGHAN, USA

HON. JOHN J. McFALL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. McFALL. Mr. Speaker, on June 30, 1978, a dedicated senior officer of the U.S. Army and Director of the Defense Logistics Agency will retire after 38 years of commissioned service to his country.

I daresay Lt. Gen. Woodrow W. Vaughan, USA, is not widely known among the people of the United States or indeed, I imagine, among the Members of this body. He has not appeared in the media amid controversy nor has he evoked renown at the head of troops carrying war to the enemy. Nevertheless, every service man and woman, and great numbers of their dependents have been touched by "Woodie" Vaughan's professional stewardship and concern for their well-being. It has been his job to promote their health and welfare by effective and efficient management and supply of the food they eat, the clothing they wear, and the medicines that keep them well wherever they are located in the world.

But, as critical as these commodities are, General Vaughan's jobs involved even greater challenge, overseeing the most intricate, essential consumable parts and pieces that keep our aircraft, ships, missiles, and guns combat ready. He has been responsible for the acquisition, management, and supply to all the Armed Forces—and to the civil agencies of the Government as required—of most of the consumable items of construction, electronics, fuel, general and industrial materiel. He also has been responsible for administering most Defense contracts except for those for complete aircraft, missiles, ships, and vehicles. These have been no small jobs; they have direct vital effect on the combat readiness of the entire military establishment of this Nation. He has performed them with truly outstanding professionalism.

Rather than outlining General Vaughan's life and career from his birth in Woodford, Okla., today, I ask unanimous consent to include with these remarks a biographical sketch which paints a picture of a determined dedicated soldier who has devoted most of his life to being at the top among military business managers. But, this biography does not highlight what may be one of the most outstanding characteristics of "Woodie" Vaughan. Those of you who have met General Vaughan, or perhaps contacted him on behalf of a constituent involved in some way with the general's command, probably have been struck by his forthrightness, sincerity, and honesty. Those are the hallmark of the man, the willingness, indeed the determination to "tell it like it is"—warts and all. In testimony before committees inquiring into his command's operations he is likely to say "it was dumb" when a mistake had been made or some initially great plan or decision turned out to be something much different. I find such expressions of integrity refreshing and needed more in public servants at all levels. His devotion to the logistical support of the military fighting man, his professionalism, and his sincere honesty will be missed.

I urge my colleagues to join me in wishing "Woodie" Vaughan, and his wife Beth, the best of God's and America's blessing in the years ahead. They are well earned.●

INFLATION

HON. JAMES M. COLLINS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. COLLINS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the No. 1 concern in Texas, Washington, and everywhere is the issue of inflation.

When I come back to Washington, I hear mostly double talk about the subject. The facts are that overspending in Congress is causing inflation. Price control is the answer advocated by economic idiots. Price control has been tried for 5,000 years and it has never, and I repeat, never been successful.

You can no more stop prices from rising by price control than you can stop a forest fire with a congressional law. To stop a forest fire takes a big clearance which means hard work and a plan.

Today America suffers with the fires of inflation. Everyone is getting burned with this overspending Congress which in true accounts will run a $100 billion deficit this year.

In this country we still have some people with commonsense. I am glad to read from the editorial page of Business Week an excellent story on bankrupt policies that breed inflation. They refer to New York City which we all recognize as the saddest financial operation of any city in the world. But then they turn to our own Congress and what we are doing in Washington, and give specific recommendations.

You will be interested in the editorial from Business Week:

Federal officials and congressmen are fond of lecturing New York City for its profligate management and its overstretched finances. But the hard truth is that the financial situation of the federal government today is painfully similar to that of New York City in 1975. The total federal debt has grown by more than $300 billion in the past seven years. The only reason that the U.S. does not face bankruptcy—as New York did—is simply that it owns a printing press in the form of the Federal Reserve System. By creating money, it has forced the economy to absorb its deficits and distribute them as part of a general inflation.

Make massive cuts in federal spending and a broad reduction in federal staff. A cut of 10% in government employment by the end of fiscal 1979 is a realistic target, though no bureaucrat will ever admit it. As any businessman knows, there is no way to bring down spending without cutting payrolls.

To offset the recessionary effects of such cuts, launch an energy program in the private sector aimed at developing new sources of gas and oil, manufacturing synthetic hydrocarbon fuels, and solving the pollution problem that stands in the way of using more coal.

Scrap the energy program now before Congress. Its complexity makes it a bureaucratic nightmare that would raise prices with no improvement in supply.

Review the military budget to see that it meets security needs and nothing more. In particular, the Administration should examine the costs of maintaining a volunteer army instead of relying on a selective service system as the nation did after World War II.

Abandon the idea of a massive tax cut for consumers. Concentrate cutting on the business taxes sector, especially on investment. Consumers will be far better off in the long run if they get stable prices rather than erratic tax cuts that do not make them whole.

Review the complicated structure of environmental and safety rules to see which ones are causing unreasonable increases in costs. Postpone requirements that cost more than the nation can afford immediately.

Revise arbitrary federal laws that create inflation. Cases in point are the new minimum wage, and the scheduled increases in Social Security taxes.

Put a moratorium on social programs designed to redistribute income and level the U.S. society.●

PROPOSED $1 COIN TO HONOR ANTHONY AND TUBMAN

HON. JIM LEACH

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. LEACH. Mr. Speaker, last week the Department of the Treasury formally recommended to Congress the minting of a smaller $1 coin. While the need for a coin tragically reflects the ravages of inflation, there is little disagreement about striking such a coin, particularly if it would result in the proposed multimillion-dollar savings the Treasury predicts.

Unfortunately, the coin issue has become controversial because the mint has recommended that symbolically we depict Liberty on the face of the coin—and has suggested that because she is female, that this pays adequate tribute to American women. Women's organizations ask why, with so many real men on our coins, it is too much to suggest we honor a real woman. There is no good answer to that because although all of our contemporary coins do bear the likeness of former Presidents, and no women have yet served in that capacity, we have in the past honored one non-President, Benjamin Franklin, and, in the days when commemorative coins were minted, a number of others who never served in the Presidency.

The name of Susan B. Anthony has been suggested by many for such an honor and I believe she is deserving. However, others have been suggested and the dilemma is how to make an appropriate choice.

As ranking minority member of the Subcommitee on Historic Preservation and Coinage, I am offering a bill today which I believe presents a fair solution and properly honors American women. My bill would have the new $1 coin bear the joint profiles of both Susan B. Anthony and Harriet Ross Tubman. I have selected these two individuals—one white, one black—because they were contemporaries who served the cause of women and the Nation in a complementary effort.

Susan B. Anthony was born in 1820 and is best known for her lifetime efforts to secure women's suffrage which resulted in enactment of the 19th amendment—the "Anthony Amendment"—in 1920—100 years after her birth, 14 years after her death.

Less well known, perhaps, but equally meritorious were her efforts to abolish slavery, her campaign for the right of women to control their own property, and to have guardianship of their children in case of divorce.

Harriet Tubman was born a slave. The exact date of her birth is not certain, but it is believed she too was born in 1820. At the age of 25, she fled from her master and worked in the underground railroad assisting others to escape. In the next 10 years she established a national reputation and by 1860 Miss Tubman appeared across the Nation not only at antislavery meetings, but in behalf of women's rights. During the Civil War she served the Union as a cook, nurse, laundress, soldier, spy, and scout.

Despite her many honors and tributes, including a medal from Queen Victoria of England, she died in poverty, at the age of 93, in 1913.

Mr. Speaker, there is precedent for superimposing the profiles of two individuals on one side of commemorative coins, although not circulating coins. The 1900 Lafayette dollar contains the profiles of General Lafayette and President Washington; the 1925 Stone Mountain half dollar honors Robert E. Lee and "Stonewall" Jackson; and the 1926 Sesquicentennial half dollar superimposes President Washington on President Coolidge.

The coin authorized by this bill provides that the profile of Harriet Tubman be superimposed on the profile of Susan B. Anthony with the word "liberty" appearing along side. On the reverse side the unfurled flag of the United States would appear with the motto "In God We Trust" prescribed as well.

Mr. Speaker, I can think of no two women who have shown more courage in their heroic struggles for liberty than Susan B. Anthony and Harriet Ross Tubman. I hope Members will unite with me in support of this bill.●

WE NEED A NEW SPACE PROGRAM

HON. JIM SANTINI

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. SANTINI. Mr. Speaker, I find it grossly inappropriate—and I think most of our party colleagues will agree—that the Republican National Committee, whose claimed responsibility is campaign advocacy, is eating up 14 offices in the House office buildings.

This goes on while we are forced to accomplish our tasks and duties in a working circumstance that would rival the Black Hole of Calcutta. I endeavor to respond to the needs and dictates of 650,000 Nevada constituents in an environment which closely resembles a telephone booth office operation.

With six or seven people to a room, there is not nearly enough room for desks, office equipment, and files—not to mention space for visitors. Each time even a handful of people arrive in my office, the result is bedlam and disruption of much of the office operation. Yet the campaign committee occupies 14 offices with an average of three persons per room.

It is my understanding that congressional offices were set up so that we elected Members of Congress would have a place in which to fulfill their responsibilities, and yet, the Republican National Campaign Committee—working for the reelection of Republican members—is consuming much of our workspace.

The Democratic Congressional Committee has relocated its offices and I believe it is time for the Republicans to do the same and put an end to this misuse of public taxpayers' facilties.●

NEAL REPORTS FINANCIAL STATEMENTS AND INCOME TAX RETURNS FOR 1977

HON. STEPHEN L. NEAL

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, in compliance with the rules of the House I filed with the Clerk the required financial disclosure statement and, in fact, reported for the entire year of 1977 instead of just the last 3 months of 1977 as required by law. This financial disclosure statement, which follows, details income from all sources, all debts payable and financial assets of myself, my wife, and my children. I am also including for the record a recapitulation of my Federal income tax return.

It will be noted from my income tax return that my wife and I filed a joint return, paying $11,133.14 in Federal income tax. In addition, we paid $3,036.83 North Carolina income tax; $677.74 in North Carolina intangibles tax; $48.31 in North Carolina—Forsyth County—personal property tax; and $33 in North Carolina—Davie County—real estate property tax. In addition was the $1,736.02 property tax paid on our house in McLean. It is interesting to note, Mr. Speaker, that we paid about 27 percent of adjusted gross income in income, intangible and personal property taxes alone, not including sales taxes and other taxes that we all pay.

Following are line accountings from our Federal income tax return and our financial disclosure statement:

FEDERAL INCOME TAX RETURN FOR 1977

Line 2: Married filing joint return.
Line 7: Total number of exemptions claimed, 4.
Line 8: Wages, salaries, tips and other employee compensation, $54,275.
Line 9: Interest income, $4,974.86.
Line 10a: Dividends, $2,161.20.
Line 14. Capital gain or (loss), $2,295.74.
Line 20: Other, 133.80.
Line 21: Total income, $63,840.60.
Line 23: Employee business expenses, $3,000.
Line 31: Adjusted gross income, $60,840.60
Line 33: Deductions (itemized), $16,478.06.
Line 34: Tax table income, $44,362.54.
Line 54: Total tax, $11,133.14.

FINANCIAL DISCLOSURE STATEMENT FOR 1977

Part I

A. Income—The source and amount of each item of income aggregating over $100 from any one source.

Congressional salary, $54,275.
Smith Barney Income & Growth Fund $1,256.
RJ Reynolds Industries, $777.
RJ Reynolds Industries (wife), $327.
Credit Union interest, $178.
Business stock sale, $10,716.
Media General, $1.
Miscellaneous, $134.

B. Gifts—Of transportation, lodging, food or entertainment aggregating $250 or more from one source, none.

C. Gifts—Other gifts aggregating $100 or more from one source. Bob Timberlake, artist, framed print, $600.

D. Reimbursements—Directly or indirectly for expenditures aggregating $250 or more from any one source, none.

Part II

Holdings—Value of any property held, directly or indirectly, in a trade or business or for investment or the production of income.

Note, sale of newspaper business, $315,840.
Smith Barney Income & Growth Fund, $24,577.
RJ Reynolds Industries, $13,805.
RJ Reynolds Industries (wife), $5,807.

Notes Payable:
National Bank of Washington, $2,000.
Merchantile Safe Deposit & Trust, $11,250.
Federal Credit Union, $7,006.
G.E. Credit, $1,186.

Mr. Speaker, this is a complete financial disclosure for my wife, my children and me. It will be noted from the financial statement that the bulk of our holdings are a note due from the sale of a small business.

We borrowed every dime to buy a small newspaper and eventually, with the help and hard work of a lot of fine people, built a fairly decent business consisting of three weekly newspapers and a newspaper printing business. We invested 8 years of hard work building that business and the experience I gained has been invaluable to me. I know what it means to meet a payroll and I have shared the experiences and problems of all working people.

The experience has made me somewhat tight with money, but frankly, Mr. Speaker, I believe Congress ought to be considerably more tight with the taxpayers money than it has been in the past.●

"SPRING SYMMETRY"

HON. HELEN S. MEYNER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mrs. MEYNER. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Robert Makl, a constituent of mine who is known affectionately as the "Catholic Wheelchair Writer," has asked that I share with my colleagues a lovely bit of free verse that he wrote entitled "Spring Symmetry."

I offer this poem today in the hope that it will lighten the daily burden of all my colleagues, and that it will provide some small measure of happiness to Mr. Makl, a disabled combat veteran.

Poem follows:

Spring brings Hope and Renewal:

"SPRING SYMMETRY"

The caducous leaves are now reborn
Spring is here.
The symmetry of grass and trees
I need not fear
God is near.
The cacophonous cries of the crows
Can not sear
The new harmonic effect
Rekindled within
As gentle solar rays
Warm my skin
Spring is here.
The symmetry of the scheme of things
The symphony of the green of things
Grass and trees
Reverberant reflections
Of light and sound
Abound to see and hear.
At last, the past is past
The redemptive reawakening
Of eye and ear

SQUEEZING OUT DOMESTIC AGRICULTURAL WORKERS

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, while recent concern has centered on the illegal alien phenomenon and the importation of cheap foreign materials, we have not focused enough on the wholesale employer violations of the Immigration Act, which have resulted in the loss of thousands of jobs for American agricultural workers.

A recent article, which I submit for today's RECORD, points out how applegrowers, through stalling, manipulation and questionable tactics, have been able to circumvent the law. While some 2,500 agricultural workers from Florida and another 3,000 U.S. citizens from Puerto Rico were willing to come up to harvest the apple crops in the Northeast last fall, applegrowers unashamedly claimed that there was no available domestic labor supply, and then actively recruited foreign Jamaican workers.

Section 1101(1)(15)(H)(ii) of the Immigration Act permits importing of foreign labor only "if unemployed persons capable of performing such service or labor cannot be found in this country." By waiting until the last minute to recruit domestic workers and by refusing—for the first time—to pay domestic migrants' transportation costs to the orchards—while offering to pay such costs for Jamaican workers, the employers blatantly manufactured the very situation, that is, an unavailable domestic work force, which then permitted them to recruit this Jamaican labor. And this was at a time when over 100,000 American farmworkers were unemployed.

Rather than comply with the law, provide decent working conditions, and hire American workers at a fair wage, these employers prefer to continue to flout the Immigration Act, so they can obtain a foreign work force that is more susceptible to their strong-arm tactics. Jamaican workers, who face an unemployment rate of over 30 percent at home, constitute a docile and captive labor force highly vulnerable to employer retible to their strong-arm tactics. Jamaican workers, who face an unemsation or health and safety standards are inadequate, with loss of employment. This results in their immediate deportation. Poor and unemployed, they must then face the difficulty of having to pay, not only for their transportation costs home, but must reimburse the employer for their intransit expenses.

With this situation threatening to occur again this year, there is the increased danger that the apple growers successful evasion of the law will have a ripple effect, spreading to other seasonal work such as construction, retail services, and light industry. The following article, "Apple Picker Blues," the New Republic, October 29, 1977, describes the difficulties and growing problems surrounding this use of temporary foreign labor in the United States.

The article follows:

APPLE PICKER BLUES

(By Dorothy McGhee)

Every fall in apple country the Winesaps deepen to a ruddy hue and the Delicious grow plump with sweet, heavy juice and the growers have their annual showdown with the Department of Labor. The confrontation ritual—negotiations, suits, court orders and appeals—concerns how many foreign applepickers the growers will be allowed to bring into the country to harvest domestic crops. The issue in states like Virginia, West Virginia, Pennsylvania, New York, New Hampshire, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Vermont and Maine, is whether apple growers are refusing to hire US workers out of preference for submissive, hard working Jamaicans.

The growers claim that there are simply not enough domestic applepickers available to get their produce harvested. But the Labor Department must certify that there is a genuine need for alien workers before the Immigration Department will issue visas permitting foreign workers to enter the country. And the Labor Department contends that there are more than 100,000 unemployed domestic agricultural workers who could do the harvesting instead.

Officials of the Labor Department maintain that US growers have gone to great lengths to avoid employing domestic workers out of preference for Jamaicans. The money the Jamaicans earn at rates up to $50 a day during the seven- to eight-week apple harvest is more than they could make in a full year of work back home. The growers prefer the Jamaicans because they are captive labor force. They come into the country on a contract with an individual grower. If one is fired or quits, or if he gets into trouble, he faces immediate deportation. Such conditions make it virtually impossible for the Jamaicans to protest any wage or working condition, or to shop around for the best paying work once they are in the country. With a 33 percent unemployment rate and an average per capita income of $1000 in Jamaica, it is clear why Secretary of Labor Ray Marshall has described this imported workforce as "scared and hungry."

Federal law stipulates that before aliens can be hired, the jobs must first be offered to US citizens. And it is the Labor Department's job to see that the growers make reasonable efforts to procure U.S. applepickers before they get permission to import Jamaicans.

Growers get some US pickers from crew leaders who, year after year, trek up the East coast with southern agricultural workers. But when a grower's crew leader fails to bring enough workers with him, the grower must look elsewhere for additional pickers. The Labor Department maintains an Interstate Recruitment System which takes orders for workers from apple growers, then attempts through a network of state offices to match those orders with agricultural workers needing jobs. The growers would prefer to import the highly pliable Jamaicans. So year after year they try to disrupt the Labor Department's recruitment system. This year they thwarted the system with particular success.

To begin with, the growers refused to respond to the Labor Department's repeated request that they submit their orders for the number of pickers they would need during harvest time. While they were stalling the Labor Department, the growers negotiated a contract with the Jamaican government which relieved them of the expense of paying for the alien pickers' transportation to the orchards. After persuading Jamaican contracting agents to bear the cost of their workers' transportation, the growers began submitting their orders to the Labor Department. But for the first time, their orders for domestic workers did not include the traditional offer to pay the cost of transportation to their orchards.

The Labor Department refused to accept the growers' orders under those conditions. They said that it was unreasonable to expect poverty-ridden migrants to be able to pay their own transportation. The growers, however, were obdurate. Their tactic was to prove that domestic labor was unavailable, and they wanted to guarantee it by refusing to pay for their transportation to the orchards.

At the end of April, Labor Department officials reported having found more than 2500 agricultural workers in Florida who were willing and able to come north to harvest apples in the late summer. But because the growers were still refusing to pay for their transportation, the workers could not be signed on.

By the end of June, the growers in state after state began to sue the Labor Department for its refusal to accept orders that did not include advance payment of transportation. And state by state, the Labor Department was overruled by local courts.

By the beginning of August, the Labor Department was under court order in New Hampshire, Vermont, Virginia, and Pennsylvania to accept the growers' orders for workers without the traditional advance payment for transportation. But by this time, it was already too late to recruit the Florida workers previously contracted, because they already had started their migration up the East coast, picking peaches and apples in South Carolina, sweet potatoes and tobacco in North Carolina. In mid-August, Labor Department officials reported that an additional 600 agricultural workers were available in North Carolina. But because the long-delayed orders had not yet been processed in Washington, the workers could not be signed on.

At the end of August, the Labor Department found 3000 experienced workers in Puerto Rico, where unemployment is running 20 percent and the annual per-capita income is about $2300.

The apple growers, however, like Puerto Rican workers even less than those of the mainland. Puerto Rican workers are protected by an extremely strict law defining the conditions under which they can work. It also gives them the right to file complaints once they are back on the island against the mainland growers, who must then appear in Puerto Rican courts. The growers balked at hiring Puerto Ricans. The Puerto Rican Minister of Labor finally offered to suspend enforcement of the much hated Public Law 87, since new regulations promulgated by the Labor Department last January offered many of the same protections. The growers' attorneys, nevertheless, continued to hem and haw, worrying that the Puerto Rican Minister of Labor did not have the authority to suspend enforcement of a public law. Finally, the growers offered to interview Puerto Rican workers for harvest work, if the Labor Department paid their way to the orchards where they could first be looked over. But the growers would make no guarantees about actually hiring any of them.

The Labor Department refused to pick up the transportation tab for the Puerto Ricans. Labor has no funds authorized to pay for this transportation, and claimed that transportation costs are properly the burden of the growers themselves. As harvest time was aproaching in mid-August, the Labor Department continued to withhold from the growers their much coveted certification to import Jamaican workers.

Finally, on August 29, Labor Department lawyers were given ten hours' notice to appear in federal court in Roanoke, Virginia. After a two-hour hearing, a Republican judge signed, virtually without change, a consent decree prepared by attorneys representing the growers which ordered the Labor Department to certify the growers for however many Jamaican workers they felt they needed. Secretary of Labor Ray Marshall called the decision an "alarming precedent," which reversed a five-year decline in the importing of alien workers.

The growers got certification to import more than 5000 Jamaican apple pickers. By the end of September, with the harvest just beginning, the growers had imported 75 percent more alien workers than during the entire 1976 picking season. Meanwhile, thousands of unemployed US agricultural workers in Puerto Rico, North and South Carolina, Florida and other states remained out of work. And they will likely be out of work during the apple season next year too unless the Labor Department can overturn the Roanoke decision on appeal this winter.●

COMMEMORATION OF POLISH CONSTITUTION DAY

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, the month of May marks the 187th anniversary of the Polish Constitution of 1791. This historic occasion is a time in which we honor the Polish people for their steadfast dedication to the ideals of liberty, self-determination, justice, equality, and independence. It is a tribute to their fortitude and spiritual strength that a long succession of invasions and partitions has been unable to deter their continuing commitment to the principles of freedom and individual liberty embodied in the May 3 Constitution over 187 years ago. To observe the full significance of this occasion is to take notice of those positive qualities of the human heart and spirit—courage and perseverance and sacrifice—which are the attributes of a heroic people.

We in America have been the beneficiaries of valued contributions made by Polish immigrants to our social, scientific economic, artistic, and political development; our character is enriched by their vital heritage and traditions which are perpetuated in many of our communities across the country today. We commemorate and celebrate these noble qualities of the Polish character which have made the Polish birthright a continuing source of enduring pride.●

HOW THE MARYLAND STATE POLICE ENFORCE THE 55-MILE-PER-HOUR LIMIT

HON. NEWTON I. STEERS, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. STEERS. Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest concerns that people have is safety on the highways. I have heard from many people who urge strong enforcement of the 55-mile-per-hour speed limit as a means of reducing highway fatalities and as a way to save gasoline.

As anyone knows, who has traveled through Maryland, our State police are one of the more vigilant forces when monitoring speed limits. In the May 1978 issue of Traffic Safety, Mr. William E. Clark, public affairs officer for the Maryland State Police describes what our State troopers do to enforce the law. I strongly recommend this article to my colleagues:

HOW MARYLAND STATE POLICE ENFORCE THE 55-MILE-PER-HOUR LIMIT

(By William E. Clark)

Much has been written and said about the 55-m.p.h. national maximum speed limit (NMSL). But how does the public feel about this law?

Opinion surveys on driver attitudes have been conducted by various organizations. Many of the findings have indicated that the majority of drivers surveyed believe the 55-m.p.h. law is beneficial for a variety of reasons but that they are likely to obey the law only if there is a high probability they will be "caught" by the police if they exceed the NMSL.

THE DETERMINING FACTOR

Although various groups encourage voluntary compliance, the bottom line seems to be that the success or failure of the 55-m.p.h. speed limit will be determined by one element: police enforcement. From a police point of view this is more than challenging—it's frustrating.

For years the State of Maryland has practiced some form of selective traffic enforcement with varying degrees of success. Before 1974, selective traffic enforcement in Maryland had little or no effect on the increasing motor vehicle death rate. Then in the later months of 1973, the energy crisis threatened the entire nation. Almost overnight the American lifestyle was jeopardized. Leading the list of items affected was the use of the automobile.

It was estimated that 8.5 million barrels of crude oil could be saved per day if a 55-m.p.h. speed limit were enforced. In addition, it was estimated that strict enforcement of the law could save more than 3,000 lives nationally.

Because of the energy crisis, Maryland's governor lowered the state speed limit from 70 m.p.h. to 50 m.p.h. in November 1973 and then raised it to 55 m.p.h. in January 1974, to be consistent with national policy. A lowering of the speed limit had been considered prior to the crisis but public sentiment prevented officials from putting it into law. The energy crisis provided an opportune time to reduce the state limit.

The establishment of the national 55-m.p.h. speed limit was accompanied by a substantial reduction in motor vehicle accidents. The number of fatalities decreased by approximately 9,300 nationally—17 per cent below the 1973 figure. The figure marked an 11 year low—the fewest U.S. traffic fatalities since 1963. Maryland's fatalities decreased from 822 in 1973 to 737 in 1974. A significant amount of credit was given to the law enforcement agencies of their enforcement efforts. Unfortunately, the trend was to be shortlived.

By mid-1975, Maryland had experienced approximately 30 more fatalities than it had in the same period of the previous years. On July 28, 1975, the Maryland State Police began the most stringent campaign against speeders ever conducted in the state. Under a mandate from the governor, all speeding violators were to receive citations carrying the full fine and appropriate penalty. The courts were requested to impose maximum penalties on violators.

The state police developed a 10-point enforcement program and public information campaign designed to address the increase in speed-related accidents. Several of the more significant points were:

Strict enforcement of the national 55-m.p.h. speed limit with no tolerance.

The use of non-traditional police vehicles, including foreign cars and trucks.

High visibility of marked state police cars.

The use of rolling roadblocks in areas of continuing non-compliance.

The use of concealed electronic speed timing devices, including stationary radar, "moving" radar, and VASCAR.

The use of special supplemental enforcement personnel from headquarters to assist regular enforcement officers.

PRESS BACK-UP

In addition, a hard-hitting public information campaign was developed to supplement the enforcement program. Press coverage was extensive. The media were shown techniques the state police would use in its anti-speeding crackdown. It stressed the use of high police visibility and non-traditional enforcement techniques. The message conveyed to the public was that any vehicle on Maryland highways could be a police vehicle. The objective of the program was not to make a high number of arrests, but rather to encourage voluntary compliance with the NMSL.

News reporters were given demonstrations of detection techniques such as rolling road blocks, hand held radar guns, and helicopter surveillance.

The press continued to publicize the enforcement program by reporting daily speed arrest totals which were tallied as trucks, buses, and other vehicles. A non-traditional "vehicle of the week" was unveiled to keep interest high. As a result of the exposure, plus additional national coverage by U.S. News and World Report, the Wall Street Journal, the Associated Press, and the NBC Nightly News, public reaction to the program changed from rejection to acceptance.

The result of the enforcement and public information campaign was a reduction in the severity of motor vehicle accidents. By the end of 1975, the number of fatalities declined to 45 fewer than in the previous year.

Strict speed enforcement continued through 1976, and the death rate continued to decrease. Fatalities dropped to 678, the fewest in 12 years. The continued emphasis on enforcing the speed limit resulted in a 4.4 per cent reduction in speed-related fatalities.

While the enforcement campaign was demonstrating positive results, the number of alcohol-related accidents was continuing to increase. A five-year study by the state toxicologist indicated that 51 per cent of the fatally injured persons tested had a blood alcohol content of .10 per cent or above.

Sixty-six per cent of the fatalities tested during 1976 were found to have a positive blood alcohol content. Excessive speed was a contributing factor in 60 per cent of the fatal accidents during this same period.

As a result of the trend in alcohol and speed-related traffic accidents, the Maryland State Police launched an additional alcohol and speed enforcement campaign called Operation Yellow Jacket. Additional troopers were used to supplement regular patrols in this new effort. The operation used off-duty troopers, on an overtime basis, to patrol selected high-accident locations throughout the state.

LAYING THE GROUNDWORK

The enforcement unit core team consisted of nine state policemen who were to supervise the assigned overtime troopers. Their objectives were to reduce the escalating number of traffic accidents involving alcohol, while continuing to reduce speed-related accidents.

Through prior planning efforts involving the Maryland State Police, Maryland Department of Transportation and National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA), specific project objectives, activities, and overall requirements were identified.

Historical accident data for 1973 through 1976 were collected and analyzed by the state police and NHTSA in terms of the frequency and location of accidents related to speed or alcohol. All highways were linearly computer searched. This resulted in the identification of 96 locations in the state where such accidents tended to cluster along short stretches of highwy. In making the selections, data from the statewide computerized accident reporting system (MAARS) was used for its ability to identify accidents according to specific log mile reference points. Half of the 96 cluster locations were used for enforcement locations and the others were used as control sites for evaluation purposes. Only one of the sites is on an Interstate route. The other 95 locations are either Maryland or U.S. routes which have a maximum posted speed limit of 50 m.p.h.

A major press conference was called in January 1977 to announce the launching of this program. Representatives of the major print and broadcast media were briefed on the details. Specific information was prepared and distributed at the press conference and mailed to all the news media within the state and the District of Columbia. This gave a detailed analysis of the following:

The levels of alcohol found in the blood of drivers killed in traffic accidents.

The number of pedestrians and passengers killed who had alcohol in their blood.

Long-term fatality trends in the state.

The goal of the press conference was to make the public aware of the seriousness of the problem. It also demonstrated the intentions of the state police. The media were given actual demonstrations, including techniques for DWI apprehension. Special new long-range radar sets were unveiled. To symbolize the campaign, a logo depicting a yellow jacket holding a radar gun was affixed to each project vehicle.

The funding of Operation Yelow Jacket came from two sources. The personnel costs of the nine-man core team were funded through existing state police funds. This was almost one-half of the first-year cost of the project. To support the effort, the Maryland Department of Transportation provided $179,000 in funds allocated under Section 402 of the Highway Safety Act. Of this total, $125,000 was established for additional overtime troopers. The remaining funds were established for capital equipment such as moving radar, breath-testing units, and other direct and indirect costs.

RESULTS ENCOURAGING

A formal evaluation of Operation Yellow Jacket is presently being conducted and preliminary findings show positive results. Enforcement activity has been high. During the first year, troopers working at Yellow Jacket sites reported an average of 1.5 violator contacts for each mile of road patrol driven.

Speeding truckers also received special attention during 1977, when a tractor-trailer was assigned to enforcement activities. Dubbed "Mother Goose" by the state police, this "Trojan horse" was used to infiltrate speeding truck convoys. The truck is used on a regular basis around the state in conjunction with local speed enforcement assignments.

Maryland experienced a sharp reduction in fatalities in 1976 due primarily to the energy crisis which reduced driving and to the lowering of the NMSL from 70 m.p.h. to 55 m.p.h. However, the continuing enforcement efforts during the past three years have been a vital factor in Maryland's downward trend in traffic fatalities.

Maryland traffic deaths during 1977 hit a 13-year low, down for the fourth consecutive year. Massachusetts is the only other state reporting such a four-year decline in deaths.

Concentrated enforcement efforts have resulted in an increasing number of speeding tickets. In 1974, Maryland troopers issued 108,000 speeding summonses. This number jumped to 183,000 during the next year, a 69 percent increase. In 1976, troopers cited 203,000 speeders. This number increased by 10 percent during 1977 when 231,000 speeding tickets were issued.

Col. Thomas S. Smith, superintendent of the Maryland State Police, says that the lowering of the NMSL to 55 m.p.h. has had the most dramatic affect on traffic safety in the history of Maryland. He has provided strong leadership in the two-pronged program of speed enforcement and the selective patrolling of high accident locations.

There is growing concern within the Maryland State Police about the thrust and support of the federal government. The national commitment of the U.S. Department of Transportation is apparently focused primarily on gaining motorists' compliance on 55-m.p.h. highways. The governor of each state is required to certify every year to the secreary of transportation that the 55-m.p.h. limit is being enforced on all public highways of the state. The secretary has the power to withhold federal aid for highway construction projects from any state that fails to provide the required certification.

A plan is being devised by the U.S. Department of Transportation to assure the states' compliance with the NMSL. Under consideration is a criterion for monitoring speeds and a multi-year timetable for gaining an 85th percentile compliance with the 55-m.p.h. speed limit.

On the surface this approach might seem reasonable. Here is the problem. Better compliance with the NMSL will require more enforcement personnel to work on the 55-m.p.h. roads. In Maryland, the majority of these roads are Interstate highways. This means that troopers would have to be shifted from other patrol assignments to bolster the Interstate patrols.

However, the vast majority of serious and fatal accidents in Maryland do not occur on the Interstate system. If troopers are reassigned to the 55-p.m.h. roads it might result in a dramatic upward shift in the Maryland fatality curve.

Reasonable speeds should be maintained on the Interstate system. It is generally agreed that motorists' compliance on the Interstate system would tend to reinforce their compliance with the posted speed limits off the Interstate system, thus creating a halo affect.

The Congress and the U.S. Department of Transportation have decided that the 55-m.p.h. speed limit is in the best national interest. The goals of reducing fuel consumption and traffic fatalities through the enforcement of the speed limit can be realized. However, candid conversations with Department of Energy and Department of Transportation employes reveal a lack of overall coordination and direction for the program. Someone within the federal government should be given the responsibility and authority for the 55-m.p.h. program and should be directed to contact the states to determine their needs and to provide the maximum support available.

The thin line of state police and highway patrols throughout the nation bear the major share of the 55 m.p.h. enforcement responsibility. They need financial and technical assistance to meet the demands placed upon them for stricter speed enforcement. It is a complex problem that requires a close working relationship between the federal and state governments. Some of the issues that need to be addressed are enforcement techniques, public information campaigns, out-of-state violator compacts, court acceptance, and adjudication.

The simplistic idea of concentrating more patrols on 55-m.p.h. roads to the detriment of secondary routes in an attempt to gain compliance with a federal speed certification mandate just might have fatal results.●

THE EPTNESS ISSUE

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, the following article from today's New York Times by William Safire illustrates some of the White House's problems in the field of election law.

After saying it would investigate its Democrat nominee, the White House reneged. It still refuses to nominate a Republican satisfactory to Republican leadership.

I cannot say whether the Carter Campaign Committee is really in trouble with its audit, but the White House certainly acts as though it had something to hide.

[From the New York Times, May 25, 1978]

THE EPTNESS ISSUE

(By William Safire)

WASHINGTON.—Students of Democratic power-grabs were impressed last year when Jimmy Carter, in cahoots with Speaker Tip O'Neill, tried to take over the bipartisan Federal Elections Commission.

The first part of the plan was to upset the 3–3 balance of the Commission by appointing a Democrat in Republican clothing—former Washington Post reporter and Lyndon Johnson appointee Sam Zagoria—to one of the Republican seats.

The second part of the plan was to appoint a long-time O'Neill crony and hanger-on—John McGarry, known as "Tip's go-fer"—to one of the Democratic seats, assuring a friendly voice on the audit of Carter campaign finances.

Since the Zagoria subterfuge violated an agreement to consult with the Republican Congressional leadership on Republican appointees, and since the two men were submitted as a package, the Senate Rules Committee refused to move on the Carter choices. And then the fun began.

Anonymous letters charged that a restaurant in Boston once partly owned by John McGarry had a cash register that was frequently "skimmed." Mr. McGarry was the brother and outspoken defender of the late Bernard McGarry eminent Boston gambler; people in Boston and on Capitol Hill have long wondered how Tip's friend was able to amass a fortune while working on a small government salary in a full-time job.

On Jan. 24, the Senate Rules Committee wrote to White House counsel Robert Lipshutz about the allegations, asking that they be checked out by the I.R.S. and F.B.I. agencies accustomed to refuting or confirming tips from unnamed sources. On Jan. 25, Mr. Lipshutz wrote back that the matter would be vigorously pursued.

Three months went by. On April 10, Carter lawyer Lipshutz wrote Senate Rule Chairman Claiborne Pell (D-R.I.) that since the charge against McGarry was anonymous, there was no reason to check it out, and that the Senate should do its own investigating if it wanted to.

Two days later, on April 12 the Senate minority leader, Howard Baker, wrote President Carter again objecting to the Zagoria (not the McGarry) nomination, which "violates your agreement . . . rejection to our views on this vital post apparently reflects your decision that our candidates attitudes on policy questions be attuned to the requirements of the Majority Party. Such is contrary to the intent of Congress and to the spirit of the law."

Two weeks later, on May 1 Democrat Pell—who owes President Carter a huge favor for appointing his aide to head the National Endowment on the Humanities—wrote a namby-pamby protest to the White House about the McGarry investigation brush-off. On May 5 the ranking Republican on Senate Rules Oregon's Mark Hatfield followed up with a letter of his own denouncing the refusal of the White House to honor a request to check out charges about a nominee from a committee charged with responsibility for confirmation.

Then something strange happened. Frank Moore, who is President Carter's chief liaison man with Congress, wrote a letter to Senator Baker on May 5: "The delay in sending up Mr. Zagoria's nomination to the Senate resulted from our request that allegations made concerning him be checked thoroughly by all relevant agencies. This was accomplished successfully. . . . Naturally, should any of the allegations have been proven true, we would have withdrawn Mr. Zagoria's name from consideration . . ."

Hold on: the President's aide was all mixed up. Nobody made any sinister charges against Mr. Zagoria, other than that he was a closet Democrat. It was John McGarry who was the subject of the investigative request from the Senate.

Worse than the mixup of the names was the contradictory story the two White House aides were selling the Senate: Counsel Lipshutz was saying it was not for the White House to probe the nominee at the Senate's request, while Congressional liaison aide Moore was saying precisely the opposite: that the charges had been "checked thoroughly by all relevant agencies."

On May 12, Mr. Moore—after having the matter explained to him slowly by Senate staffers—wrote another letter to the Senate, regretting his previous "misinformation" about the wholly innocent phony-Republican Sam Zagoria. But Moore continued to suggest that "agency inquiries" had been run on Mr. McGarry, contrary to the impression left by counsel Lipshutz.

And there, in splendid confusion, the matter sits. Mr. Carter needs a 4–2 vote to set aside the campaign-law reforms which make it hard for Democrats to pay old debts, and wants a friendly commissioner on the Federal Elections Commission when an audit comes out soon (which will show how the Carter campaign spread $248,000 in last-minute "walkin'-around money" to local pols with itchy fingers). Good reasons exist for the Democratic power play, and we can thank White House ineptness for the voters' protection.●

CRIME TASK FORCE ADVOCATES CHANGING EXCLUSIONARY RULE

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to announce today that the House Republican Task Force on Crime is introducing legislation aimed at major changes in the criminal law of search and seizure. The focus of our legislation is an alteration of the so-called exclusionary rule whereby otherwise admissible evidence is suppressed on narrow technical grounds.

The following example illustrates the often bizarre effects of the exclusionary rule:

A suspicious-appearing hitchhiker (Jones) was asked for his I.D. by a Missouri State policeman. After making a radio check, the officer learned that Jones was wanted in Pennsylvania for theft of a revolver and the murder of his aunt. The officer seized the allegedly stolen revolver as evidence. Applying the exclusionary rule, the Pennsylvania court suppressed as evidence both gun and statements made by the suspect to the officer. The judge said the officer had insufficient "probable cause" to suspect Jones of criminal activity. He further ruled that even though the suspect had only been detained and had voluntarily talked to the officer, the policeman's uniformed presence constituted authority and force. The District Attorney claimed that both the gun and the voluntary statements were critical evidence. The judge's decision was upheld by the Pennsylvania Supreme Court. The U.S. Supreme Court refused to review the decision. According to the District Attorney, it is unlikely that Jones will be prosecuted for the murder of his aunt. Pennsylvania v. Jones 378 Atl. 2nd 835 (1977).

The crime task force believes such miscarriages must be corrected if Americans are to regain confidence in their criminal justice system. Suppressing unchallenged truth has set guilty criminals free but has neither deterred deliberate violations of fourth amendment rights nor decreased policemen's errors of judgment given the inherent pressure of dealing with serious crimes.

The bill we are introducing today marks a significant step toward placing the full truth before the trier of fact—through the admission of all relevant evidence. This should be the ultimate goal in a criminal proceeding. The bill would admit evidence seized in good faith although technically in violation of the fourth amendment. Evidence seized with the intent to violate the fourth amendment would still be excluded, however. Thus, the Government would gain no benefit by purposely violating a citizen's rights.

The crime task force goes on record today in support of an effective remedy against egregious police misconduct. One such remedy is embodied in H.R. 9219, now being considered by the Subcommittee on Administrative Law and Governmental Relations. We await the outcome of the subcommittee's markup of H.R. 9219. We intend to add its police deterrent features to our bill if in fact the remedy it provides is adequate.

The need for a change in the exclusionary rule is compelling when one looks at the price the rule exacts from society—the release of countless guilty criminals. We believe that our proposal strikes a proper balance between the permissible boundaries of police conduct and the effective scope of the citizen's fourth amendment guarantees.

The House Republican crime task force is comprised of the following:

Henry J. Hyde, chairman; M. Caldwell Butler, William S. Cohen, David F. Emery, Richard Kelly, Bob Livingston, and Larry Winn, Jr.

Ex-Officio Members: Bill Frenzel, chairman, House Republican Research Committee; Robert McClory, Tom Railsback, Charles E. Wiggins, and John Ashbrook.

Mr. Speaker, the consequences of maintaining our existing criminal law of search and seizure were aptly expressed by Mr. Justice Cardozo in People v. Defore, 242, N.Y. 13 150 N.E. 585 (1926), as follows:

The criminal is to go free because the constable has blundered . . . A room is searched against the law, and the body of a murdered man is found . . . the privacy of the home has been infringed, and the murderer goes free.●

TERRORISTS BOMBINGS DEMONSTRATE NEED FOR DETECTION TAGGING

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I know that our colleagues share in your disgust and my disgust for the terrorist bombings that occurred earlier this week at the Department of Justice here in Washington, and at three of our airports in the eastern part of the country.

This is not the first time I have brought the problem of terrorism and terrorist bombing before the House. Nor will it be the first time I have recommended legislation of mine which constitutes a part of the solution.

H.R. 12516 will phase in provisions requiring that explosive materials manufactured, distributed, or imported contain tags which will allow their detection prior to detonation, and their identification after they are exploded.

The value of detection tagging should be apparent. If the presence of a bomb can be determined before it goes off, the damage it was intended to create can be prevented or minimized.

A cost-benefit analysis recently prepared for the Government indicates that the benefits will be even greater with the introduction of identification taggants. The study suggests that identification tagging will result in an increased arrest rate (currently at only 8 percent for bomb crimes) accomplished with a reduction in investigative time. Also taken into consideration was the fact that some potential bombers may be deterred from acting once they know there is an increased chance of their arrest.

H.R. 12516, pending before the Judiciary Committee, has 57 cosponsors. I will be reintroducing this bill shortly, and invite more of my colleagues to join us in consponsorship.

Additionally, explosives tagging provisions have been included in omnibus antiterrorism bills which have been referred jointly to the Committees on Public Works and Transportation, International Relations, and Judiciary. The Aviation Subcommittee, which I chair, will be holding hearings at the beginning of June on those parts of the legislation under our jurisdiction.

It is time for Congress and the Nation to start fighting back. We must act to prevent terrorist acts like those of Monday. The people of America are demanding, and deserve, no less.●

WORLD HUNGER—A SHIFT IN THE WIND

HON. RICHARD L. OTTINGER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. OTTINGER. Mr. Speaker, throughout history, one of the most fundamental problems in the world has been the persistence of hunger and starvation. During the past 5 years alone, more people have died as a consequence of starvation than of all the wars, revolutions, and murders of the past 150 years. Even as you read these words, 26 people are dying each minute as a result of hunger—21 of them children.

As of May 23, 1978, more than 120,000 individuals have expressed their willingness to work together to end world hunger in two decades by enrolling in the hunger project. It is the intent of the hunger project "to create the end of starvation as an idea whose time has come."

I would like to call upon all of my colleagues, all Americans, and the President of the United States to join me in observing July 14, 1978, as End of Hunger Day. On this day, I invite all people to fast, or to do whatever is personally appropriate as an expression of their commitment to create the end of starvation on this planet in 19 years.

The persistence of the problem of hunger and starvation has not been due to lack of concern. Thousands of individuals and organizations have been working toward ending hunger in the world. It is out of their success and in support of their work that the hunger project arises. It is the job of the hunger project to cause the opportunity whereby work already being done in this area and the work that will be done makes the greatest difference. Those in the hunger project support and wish to see alinement among all efforts to end hunger and starvation.

The work of the hunger project is not about researching new technical solutions, growing food or feeding people directly. The solutions for hunger already exist. Since World War II, more than 30 nations have successfully ended starvation. Over 1,500 scientists completed a 3-year study of hunger and starvation, and their conclusion was published recently in a National Academy of Sciences report:

Given the political will here and abroad, it should be possible, by the end of this century, be possible, by the end of this century, to eliminate most of the hunger and malnutrition how associated with mass poverty.

At about the same time, the results of another study, conducted to discover what individuals can do to contribute to the end of starvation, was the creation of the hunger project which is grounded in personal commitment and individual will. We have the technological and agricultural resources and capabilities to end starvation on our planet in 20 years. What has been lacking is the will of the people. It is the intentions of the hunger project to create this will.

The hunger project recommends no particular action or activity for its members. It simply supports people's individual and creative answer to the question, "What can I do?", once they have discovered their natural responsibility for creating the end of starvation in 19 years.

Much of the work of the project is done by over 35 committees in the United States and 10 in other countries. These committees are composed entirely of volunteers who have chosen to be responsible for successfully communicating and implementing the hunger project in various sectors of their communities. Committees are currently active in the following locations: California: Berkeley/Oakland, Los Angeles, Newport Beach, Sacramento, San Diego, San Francisco, San Lorenzo Valley, Santa Clara Valley, Santa Cruz, Santa Rosa, and San Luis Obispo; Texas: Houston and Austin/San Antonio; Colorado: Boulder and Colorado Springs; Arizona: Phoenix; Utah: Salt Lake City; Hawaii: Honolulu; Massachusetts: Boston; Maine: Union; Connecticut: Middletown; New York: Somerset and New York City; Pennsylvania: Philadelphia and Pittsburgh; Illinois: Chicago and DeKalb; Washington: Seattle; Oregon: Portland; Florida: Miami; Maryland: Baltimore; Tennessee: Nashville; and Washington, D.C.

Proclamations supporting the hunger project have been made by more than 20 mayors and four Governors throughout the country as well as the State Senate of Hawaii. The Governors are from the following States: Maryland, Colorado, New York, and Massachusetts. The mayors of from the following cities: Del Mar, San Francisco, Santa Cruz, Santa Rosa, Chula Vista, San Diego, Lompoc, Redwood City, and Laguna Beach, Calif.; New Rochelle, Yonkers and the County of Westchester N.Y.; Dade County, Miami, Coral Gables, and Hialeah, Fla.; and the mayors of Washington, D.C.; Philadelphia, Pa.; DeKalb, Ill.; and Fort Collins, Colo.

The hunger project is an investment in self-sufficiency for the planet and for the people of the world. The time has come for hunger and starvation to end. Not just to be dealt with better, not just to be handled more effectively, but to be ended finally and forever.●

OBSERVATIONS ON THE CANADIAN HEALTH CARE EXPERIENCE—PART II

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to share with my colleagues an additional portion of the paper which was prepared by Richard Lehrman, who serves on the staff of the Select Committee on Aging, which I chair. This paper, which discusses the Canadian health care program, provides meaningful insights on the subject of a nationwide health care program and can benefit those whose task it will be to develop a national health insurance program for the United States.

I believe that my colleagues will be interested in these observations, and I, therefore, ask unanimous consent that this additional portion of Mr. Lehrman's paper be inserted at this point in the RECORD.

The material follows:

COVERAGE BENEFITS

Virtually all of the Canadian population of slightly more than 22 million are covered under the hospital, medical, and auxiliary health insurance plans of their respective province.[38] Members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, the Armed Forces and inmates of penitentiaries are not covered; however their medical care is otherwise provided for.[39] Coverage is either compulsory or automatic in all provinces except Ontario and Alberta, where part of the provincial costs are financed through premiums.[40] In Ontario, coverage is mandatory for employee groups of 15 or more, while residents in Alberta may "opt-out" of the program on a yearly basis.[41]

A. HOSPITAL BENEFITS

Canadian Health care essentially consists of many plans that vary province to province, not unlike the U.S. Medicaid program which is jointly funded by Federal and state funds, and administered by the state within broad Federal guidelines. Federal law requires that the following benefits be covered by the hospital insurance plan of all 10 provinces and the Northwest and Yukon Territories:

(1) Accommodations and meals at the standard ward level.
(2) Necessary nursing service.
(3) Laboratory and diagnostic services.
(4) Drugs and biologicals.

Footnotes at the end of article.

(5) Use of operating and case room and anesthetic facilities.
(6) Routine surgical supplies.
(7) Use of radio therapy and physiotherapy facilities where available.[42] programs that were formerly covered by the provinces such as mental hospital care are now eligible for federal cost sharing.[43] To the required benefits may be added, by separate arrangements between the federal and Provincial governments, specified outpatient and emergency services.[44] Provinces are free to choose which, if any, outpatient services they will cover. All provinces include emergency services and outpatient follow-up, and a varying list of other outpatient benefits.

Provinces may impose nominal cost-sharing for insured services, as long as such charges do not deter patients, particularly low-income persons, from obtaining medical care.[45] As of 1975, however, only the plans operating in British Columbia, Alberta, and Manitoba utilized patient cost-sharing.[46]

Medicare-medicaid versus Canada

Canadian hospitalization is rather comprehensive, covers more persons, and does so less expensively in comparison with American Medicare-Medicaid. All provinces cover standard ward inpatient care with all approved service, as described above. In British Columbia, patients are charged $1 per day for standard ward care. In Alberta, adults are charged $5 for the first day. In Manitoba, hospitals may charge $6 per day for semi-private wards.[47] Ontario levies a slight charge on a portion of the ambulance ride.[48]

Medicare and Medicaid by contrast, cover a significantly smaller part of the population, principally the elderly, disabled and the poor who conform to rather strict criteria. Part A of Medicare covers 90 days of hospitalization. The first 60 are covered by benefits comparable to those in Canada, except that an American must pay a $144 deductible. Full coverage is still in effect, but Medicare beneficiaries must pay $36 per day after the 60th day.[49] An additional "lifetime reserve" of 90 hospital days may be drawn upon when more than 90 days per benefit period are needed. All "reserve days" are covered with benefits identical to that of the first 90, but coinsurance per reserve day leaps to $72.[50] Thus, the fully covered Medicare beneficiary pays $144 for 60 days of care, but should care be necessary for 180 days, the out of pocket cost is over $7,700.00. Should further care be necessary, the patient is charged the full cost.

B. MEDICAL CARE BENEFITS

The Canadian Medical Insurance plan was the second phase of its national health insurance program, enacted a decade after the advent of hospitalization coverage. Already conscious of rising costs, the authors of the 1966 Federal Care Act set up federal-provincial cost sharing utilizing a structure distinct from that of the hospitalization program:

"The financial formula ignores provincial variations in per capita costs and pays to each province one-half of the national per capita cost in respect of each member of its insured population. Thus, the equalization factor is greater than in the hospital financing formula (80% of the cost in Newfoundland, but only 45% in Ontaria)."[51]

Thus, because provinces were given stronger incentives to cut expenses than under the financial arrangements for the hospitalization plan, the federal-provincial cost-sharing structure for medical care was an initial step towards cost control.

As is the case regarding hospitalization coverage, fewer than 19% of all Canadians are not covered by Medical Care Insurance. One hundred percent of all eligible residents are currently insured in all provinces except

Ontario, British Columbia, and Alberta, where virtually 100 percent are covered.[52] Federal exclusions to the plan are similar to those in the Hospitalization plan, with the addition of residents, such as veterans, who are entitled to receive insured services under any other act of the Parliament of Canada or any law of a Province relating to workmen's compensation.[53]

The Federal Government of Canada will contribute to the cost of any Provincial Medical Care plan that provides comprehensive coverage for all medically required services rendered by a physician or surgeon, with no dollar limits or exclusions except where such services are not medically necessary.[54] The benefit coverage must be administered in such a way that there will be no financial impediment to an insured person receiving necessary medical care. In addition, there must be portability of benefits when the beneficiary is temporarily absent from his own province, and when he is moving from one province to another.[55]

In addition to providing for the financing of comprehensive physicians' services for all insurable residents without regard to their age or ability to pay, the Medical Care Act empowers the Federal Government to include additional health care services provided by nonphysician professional personnel.[56] For example, six provinces as of 1975 cover the services of optometrists. Ontario, British Columbia, and Alberta also cover services performed by osteopaths, chiropractors, podiatrists, and other health personnel.[57] Certain surgical-dental services rendered by dental surgeons in hospitals are also included as benefits, although routine dental care is covered only in the Medical Care plans of Quebec, Alberta, and Saskatchewan.[58]

Medicare-medicaid versus Canada

Canada's Medicare, roughly equivalent to Medicare "Part B" (Medical Insurance) provides for coverage so comprehensive that "there can be no dollar limit or exclusions except on the grounds that the services were not medically required.[59] All provinces' plans basically cover all physician services that are medically required. Except for a $5 charge if a patient is admitted to a hospital in Alberta, there is no utilizaton fee for care under the Medical Care Insurance Act.[60]

Medicare Part B covers persons who have reached the age of 65, or who are disabled.[61] Services of independent practitioners under Medicare Part B also includes the services of medical doctors, osteopaths, chiropractors, podiatrists and certain other practitioners regardless of where their services are provided.[62] However, after paying a $60 deductible, the patient is then charged for 20 percent or more of the physicians bill, dependent upon how "reasonable" the charges are judged to be by Medicare.[63] Thus, the fraction of Americans who are covered for physicians' care pay a much greater sum than the Canadians who are universally covered by a more comprehensive plan.

C. AUXILIARY HEALTH CARE BENEFITS

Home health care/nursing care

Both countries have discovered that auxiliary care such as home health and preventive care are cost-effective, as well as more humane alternatives to institutional care.[64] Under Bill C-37, effective April 1, 1977, the Canadian Federal Government is making an equal per capita cash contribution to provinces to contribute to the cost of certain extended health service, including nursing home intermediate care and health aspects of home care.[65]

Somewhat comparable coverage is now available to Americans over 65 under Medicare, Parts A & B. Part A provides for up to 100 home health visits per year upon the fulfillment of all these six conditions:

(1) at last 3 days of inpatient care in a qualifying hospital

(2) The home health care is for further treatment of a condition which was treated in a hospital or skilled nursing facility

(3) the care needed includes part-time skilled nursing care, physical therapy, or speech therapy

(4) The patient is confined to the home

(5) A physician determines the need for home health care, and sets up a home health plan witin 14 days after the patients discharge from a hospital or skilled nursing facility

(6) The Home Health Agency providing services is participating in Medicare.[66]

Part B provided for an additional 100 home health visits, provided the last four conditions listed above are met.[67]

Medicare in the United States also provides for 100 days of inpatient care in a skilled nursing facility provided conditions similar to those for home health care are met, although covered services are paid for the first 20 days; patients must pay a daily co-insurance amount of $18.00 after the 20th day.[68]

Medical appliances

Medical appliances coverage varies from province to province. Most provinces cover eye examinations, but as of 1974, only Alberta provided for eyeglasses for residents over 65.[69] All provinces cover dental surgery performed in a hospital under Medicare, but comprehensive medical care (check-ups, etc.) is covered only in Alberta for residents over 65.[70] Alberta and Saskatchewan subsidize hearing aids, but Nova Scotia, Newfoundland, and Prince Edward Island specifically exclude them.

In the United States, coverage is similar. Although Medicare excludes eyeglasses, hearing aids, dental checkups, and dentures, many states offer one or more of these services under Medicaid.[71] Eleven states provide eyeglasses, 36 states offer dental services, and 11 states provide coverage for hearing aids, for the categorically needy, under their particular Medicaid plans.[72]

Other services

Outpatient prescription drugs are totally excluded under Medicare in the United States, although a few states offer partial coverage under their respective Medicaid plans. By contrast, most Canadians are covered by drug programs. Ontario has a free drug benefit plan for the elderly, disabled, and persons with limited income.[73] Quebec, British Columbia, Manitoba, and Nova Scotia offer similar benefits (17,629,568 Canadians reside in participating provinces, 3,859,083 do not).[74]

Annual physical checkups are categorically excluded by Medicare in the United States,[75] and only a few states cover check-ups under their respective Medicaid plans. The Provinces of Saskatchewan and Nova Scotia cover physical examinations, the latter only when deemed medically required by a physician.[76]

OLDER WORKERS WEEK

HON. WILLIAM J. HUGHES

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, the Governor of New Jersey, the Honorable Brendan T. Byrne, has proclaimed the week of May 22-29, 1978, as Older Workers Week. Since the month of May has been designated as Senior Citizens Month, I feel it is especially timely that the Governor has officially recognized the special talents that older workers bring to their jobs. I would like to add my support for the Governor's actions acclaiming the thousands of older workers in New Jersey and across the country who give so freely of themselves to their tasks whether they are paying jobs or volunteer assignments.

A copy of the Governor's proclamation follows:

Whereas, programs such as Green Thumb and other Title IX Programs have provided employment opportunities for older New Jersey citizens; and

Whereas, older workers have availed themselves of these employment opportunities and thereby have contributed greatly to their communities and to their state; and

Whereas, older workers comprise a reliable, dependable work force with expertise and knowledge as gained with age;

Now, therefore, I, Brendan Byrne, Governor of the State of New Jersey, do hereby proclaim the week of May 22, 1978 as Older

Workers Week in New Jersey and ask all New Jersey Citizens to join with me in acknowledging the quality of work performed by New Jersey's older citizens.●

THE SOVIET-CUBAN AXIS

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to the valiant efforts of France, Belgium, and Zaire in effecting a daring rescue of 2,000 hostages in Kolwezi, Zaire.

It is indeed heartening for those of us who have a sense of history to see our oldest ally, France, rise to this occasion. The valor of the French Foreign Legion is legendary, and the role they played in liberating Kolwezi from the clutches of the Communist-backed rebels is a fitting addition to their annals of their gallant service.

Mr. Speaker, even though this mission of mercy was undertaken with dispatch, it is unfortunate that the rescue operations came too late for many of the residents of Kolwezi. Early reports indicate a familiar pattern of atrocities, including the mass execution of Europeans and black civilians. Once again, we are reminded of the consequences of the Communist-backed aggression, consequences that have been brought into sharp relief by the Communist conquest in Cambodia. Once again the Kremlin's bloody hands have reached into the heart of Africa, bringing a reign of terror, death, and destruction.

While the Carter administration flounders in confusion and hypocrisy in Africa, fumbling opportunities and surrendering initiatives, the Cuban-Soviet Axis strengthens its grip on the continent. African leaders who were once wary of Western intervention, now are coming to recognize the dangers posed by the Cuban operations are, in the words of Andy Young, a "stabilizing influence" in Africa. At the recent Franco-African Summit meeting, a total of 21 African nations petitioned French President Valery Giscard D'Estaing to communicate their fears to the President of the United States.

Mr. Speaker, I am desperately concerned that the Cuban-Soviet axis is only in the first stages of its war against the Third World nations. Militarily, economically, and politically these are weak states. Their antagonism to the West was often borne of parochial hatreds, a legacy of Western colonialism, and an envy of Western affluence and progress. Ever since 1956, the Soviet Union has intensified its campaign to support "national wars of liberation" in these less developed countries of the world.

Soviet theoreticians have long believed that revolution in these countries paved the way for ever stronger assaults against the West. Rich in raw materials needed for Western industrial production, these states are the "soft-underbelly," to borrow a phrase from the late Sir Winston Churchill, of the West. The creation of "client states" in this sector of the international community poses the greatest threat of a slow economic strangulation of the inflation torn, industrialized nations of the world.

Mr. Speaker, thus far, the Soviet-Cuban axis has taken and held the military initiative in Africa. In fighting this vicious proxy war in the African heartland, thousands of miles from either the Soviet or Cuban homelands, the Kremlin's leaders may realize victories far beyond the worst fears of Western foreign policy analysts. Castro is not a patsy for the Kremlin. He is a dedicated Communist. Though he is repaying his enormous debts to the Kremlin in Cuban blood, and he is also carving out his own reputation as a messianic Communist revolutionary and increasing the military prestige of Cuba around the world.

Mr. Speaker, if Castro and the Kremlin are victorious in Africa, we can expect them to press their aggressions even further. History tells us that military ambitions, when satisfied, only beget even greater ambitions. Like an addiction, the passion for conquest drives the aggressor ever onward. He looks for new worlds to conquer, new terrain where he can plant his bloody battle flags, and gratify his all consuming lust for power. With the establishment of little client states in Africa, as repressive as any Third World dictatorships, I fear the Cuban-Soviet axis will turn on Latin America. The conditions of poverty, political, and economic instability are prevalent below our borders, and can easily be exploited.

Mr. Speaker, I was greatly impressed with an analysis of the Cuban efforts in Africa by Mr. Bonner Day in the April edition of Air Force Magazine. The author details the Cuban presence, the Soviet support, and the geopolitical design behind Castro's relentless drive. I commend it to my colleagues, and ask that it be inserted into the RECORD.

THE CUBANS IN AFRICA

(By Bonner Day)

The war in Ethiopia has focused the world's attention on Cuba and its military adventures in Africa.

Clearly a tool of the Soviet Union, Cuba nevertheless is making its foreign legions felt from the Algerian desert in the north to the coasts of Mozambique on the southeast edge of Africa.

From an island-bound force of guerrilla-led troops, the Cuban armed forces have become an important military organization to be reckoned with around the world. With continued Soviet support, and in the absence of opposition from the US, the Cubans, under Fidel Castro as commander in chief, are on the move.

In Ethiopia, Cuban troops are in the forefront of the battle for control of the strategic Horn of Africa. Raul Castro, second only to Fidel in Cuba, flew to Ethiopia the first week of January. Within a month, the Ethiopian armed forces, backed by Cuban air and ground forces, launched an offensive against Somali guerrillas, supported by neighboring Somalia, in Ethiopia's Ogaden Province.

An estimated 12,000 Cuban troops were put into the early fighting. Cuban pilots, flying US-built F-5s that were sold to Ethiopia or provided under grant aid prior to 1975 and recently delivered Soviet-built MiG-21s, quickly gained control of the skies in the first days. On the ground, Cuban soldiers armed with Soviet T-54 tanks were sent into the battle.

Assisting the Ethiopians have been several thousand East German and Russian military advisors. Russian ships, according to some reports, shelled Somali troops from the Red Sea. The Russians are reported to have pledged more than $800 million worth of arms and ammunition to Ethiopia, much of it delivered by a major Soviet airlift that began late last year.

But it was the Cubans who provided the most combat troops. Many were brought in from Angola. Others came from Aden in the Arabian Peninsula. As the Ethiopian offensive developed, the question among African diplomats was whether Ethiopia and its allies would be content with recovering its Somali-occupied territory, or would push on into Somalia. Somalia created an enemy in the Soviet Union when it broke relations last fall and ordered Soviet troops out of the Russian sea base and two airfields at Berbera on the Red Sea.

It is in Angola, however, that Cuba has had its biggest success so far. As many as 25,000 Cuban troops and another 6,000 technicians have been brought in to prop up the government of Agostinho Neto, in charge following the withdrawal of Portugal from its former colony. Up to 4,000 troops and some Cuban noncombatants have been killed or wounded in the war, which still continues. Wounded Cubans apparently are being sent to East Germany and the Soviet Union in an effort to play down war news in Cuba.

Most of the Cuban troops in Angola are fighting two antigovernment armies that control about one-third of the countryside, but no major cities. The rest of the Cuban forces are engaged in training guerrillas for insurrections in nearby African countries.

CONTINENT-WIDE CAMPAIGN

The Rhodesian government of Ian Smith is a major target of the Cuban forces and the guerrilla movements Castro backs. To the north of Rhodesia are some 400 Cubans in Zambia, charged with supervising the transfer of Soviet-supplied weapons from stockpiles in Angola to the camps of Joshua Nkomo's anti-Rhodesia guerrilla movement. Convoys of Soviet-made military trucks transport weapons and Nkomo guerrillas from training camps in Angola. The whole operation is run by a military team working from the Cuban Embassy in Lusaka, Zambia.

To the east of Rhodesia, up to 1,000 Cubans operate another set of training camps in Mozambique. Some soldiers are trained for the Mozambique government. Others are trained as guerrillas for Robert Mugabe, another black anti-Rhodesian revolutionist.

In Tanzania, the Nyerere government hosts 500 Cubans who are training troops for the Tanzanian government and also are preparing guerrillas to fight in Rhodesia.

In Congo (Brazzaville), there are some 1,000 Cubans. Some are used to support the Agostinho Neto government in Angola.

In Guinea, President Sekou Touré has a permanent garrison of 1,000 Cuban soldiers to keep him in power.

Guinea-Bissau has another garrison of several hundred Cuban troops, mostly military advisors.

In Libya there are 1,000 Cubans. Egypt claims they have been used to fight Egyptian troops in recent border skirmishes.

Cuban soldiers act as advisors to Sierra Leone's Internal Security Unit. About 200

Cuban troops are stationed in the suburbs of the capital, Freetown.

Cubans based in Algeria have been supporting the Polisario Front in the western Sahara region of Morocco and Mauritania. The guerrillas have been fighting government forces of both Mauritania and Morocco, which now claim the territory.

Altogether, there are up to 42,000 Cuban troops in Africa, plus as many as 6,300 doctors and technicians. Other countries that have accepted Cuban troops and advisors include Cape Verde, São Tomé and Principe, Uganda, Equatorial Guinea, and the Malagasy Republic.

The Cuban armed forces have not been working alone. They have been supplied, encouraged, and, when necessary, transported to African battlefields by the Soviet Union.

CUBAN CHALLENGE—U.S. RESPONSE

Why is Castro, who has severe economic problems at home, sending troops to Africa?

US experts on Cuba give three reasons.

First, the Cubans were ordered to Africa by Moscow. Castro, the beneficiary of billions of dollars of Soviet military and economic aid, could not refuse. Western analysts say there is evidence that Castro is being allowed to repay Moscow for its aid through these military operations, though it is unclear how the payments are calculated.

Second, Latin American experts consider Castro a dedicated revolutionary with a fanatical desire to export communism wherever possible.

Third, Castro enjoys the prestige that comes with a successful military venture. Castro's timely and vital role in helping to power Agostinho Neto, a fellow revolutionary, has whetted his appetite for similar victories.

Says one government expert: "Castro will try to improve his relations with the US and at the same time continue his African adventurism. But if forced to choose, he will turn his back on the US with little hesitation."

The US, under both the Ford and Carter Administrations, has limited its response to public criticism for the most part, and held back support of African forces opposing the Cubans.

Many in the present Administration, following the lead of Sen. George McGovern (D-S. D.), want the US to amend its relations with Cuba and restore diplomatic and economic ties. The feeling is that with restored relations, the US can exert more influence on Cuba. Some, such as Ambassador to the UN Andrew Young, have gone further, arguing that the Cubans in Africa can be a "stabilizing" force.

Other advisors have warned the President that the Cuban presence, with its Soviet support, represents a dangerous threat to the freedom and independence of African nations, a threat the US, as leader of the free world, cannot ignore.

While the debate continues within the Carter Administration, the Cuban invasion of Africa shows no sign of drawing to a close.

From Castro's point of view, the African adventures have to be considered a major success and have returned him, personally, to the center of the world stage after some frustrating setbacks.

CASTRO'S NEW STRATEGY

After his takeover in 1959, Castro focused his attention first on consolidating his hold on Cuba, and later on exporting revolution to Bolivia, Venezuela, Guatemala, and other Latin American countries.

There has been a Cuban military presence in Congo (Brazzaville) since the mid-1960s, and for years Castro has flirted with the radical leaders in Algeria and Libya. But his main early efforts, assisted by the Soviet Union, were in Latin America.

Then, after the death of Ernesto (Ché) Guevara in Bolivia in 1967, Cuban attempts to export revolution seemed to diminish in Latin America. In Cuba, economic problems increased and the people continued to suffer food, clothing, and other shortages.

Shortly after Ché's death, Moscow stepped in to take a stronger hand in Cuban military and foreign affairs. In 1970, the Cuban armed forces were reorganized along Soviet lines. Under the direction of Soviet advisors, the large standing army was cut forty percent in size, discipline in the reserves was tightened, training was improved, and equipment was modernized with the addition of the latest in Soviet tanks and planes. Cane-cutting duties, once a major occupation of the Cuban Army, were transferred to the newly created Youth Labor Army, and regular soldiers were freed to concentrate on their military jobs.

At about the same time, Castro, apparently under Soviet guidance, adopted a new strategy for exporting revolution. In Latin America, his earlier attempts to support guerilla movements had been made without the backing of neighboring countries that might have been able to provide sanctuaries.

In Africa, however, Castro won invitations to several countries and the host countries in turn have been used as sanctuaries for supporting guerrillas.

Congo (Brazzaville), for example, was a sanctuary for Cubans and African guerrilla fighting in Angola, and now Angola is a sanctuary for Cuban efforts against Rhodesia, Namibia, and Somalia.

The strategy's success so far has made Castro a popular revolutionary in Africa, and given him new confidence. In response to questions about renewing diplomatic relations with the U.S., Castro has said:

"Our relations with Africa—that we cannot discuss, that we cannot negotiate. . . . It has nothing to do with the United States."

Whether the U.S. can continue to stand aside militarily while Cuba and the Soviet Union increase their hold in Africa is a question the Carter Administration and Congress will address in the months ahead.

What is sure is that the Cuban armed forces have come of age. Their invasion of Africa, and the subsequent victories, pose a danger much larger than numerical strength would suggest.

THE CUBAN ARMED FORCES TODAY

(By Bonner Day)

The Cuban armed forces have been transformed, over a period of eight years, from a large but poorly trained militia led by romantic guerrillas, to a somewhat smaller but more effective modern army.

The difference has been the Soviet Union, whose leaders decided to protect their massive investment in arms, training, and other aid to Cuba with a heavy hand. Already a significant community, the number of Russian military advisors in Cuba has been increasing in recent months.

The Soviet Union subsidizes the Cuban economy at the rate of $500 million a year—almost double the budget of the Cuban Ministry of the Revolutionary Armed Forces. The Cuban armed forces have received an additional $3 billion in Soviet aid since Fidel Castro took over, plus tanks, planes, ammunition, and other aid delivered to Cuban troops in the field in Africa.

The commander in chief of the Cuban armed forces still is Castro. But it is the Soviet arms and Soviet instructors that have changed a Latin guerrilla army into a modern military force and made it almost a part of the Soviet armed forces.

More important to the rest of the world, the mission of the Cuban armed forces was changed as they were poured into the Russian mold.

Once primarily concerned with resisting an invasion by the US or Cuban anti-Castro exiles, the Cuban armed forces now are focused on exporting communism, Soviet-style, to the Third World.

Universal compulsory service still is in effect, and agriculture still is a national priority. But only a small number of draftees with little military potential—those with low intelligence, little education, or lacking in discipline—are funneled into a special Youth Labor Army for agriculture chores.

Most conscripts are given concentrated military training under an increasingly sophisticated cadre of Cuban officers and NCOs advised by Soviet officers. In addition to military skills, emphasis is on physical conditioning and political indoctrination. Soldiers are fed a steady diet of Castro speeches and the writings of Lenin.

Cuba still has one of the largest standing armies in Latin America, second only to Brazil, a nation with ten times the population.

From a high of about 300,000, however, the armed forces have been trimmed to 200,000 or fewer. Added to this is a ready reserve, about 100,000 strong.

As in the Soviet Union, youths receive military training even before they enter active duty. This amounts in some cases to as much as nine months of rifle drill and classroom training. A number of high schools have been developed for youths with military officer potential.

Officers are trained at one Navy and three joint Army-Air Force academies.

Fidel Castro is the top man in the armed forces—and in every other organ of power in Cuba. Right behind him is his brother, Raul. With the four-star rank of General of the Army, Raul is Minister of the Revolutionary Armed Forces. He has been closely supervising Cuban operations in Africa, using communications furnished by the Soviet Union, but also making periodic on-the-spot inspection trips.

The relation of the Communist Party to the military is much different from that in the Soviet Union, because of the military backgrounds of Cuba's leaders. The military in Cuba is in charge: There is no system of Communist Party representatives within the military to make it toe the party line. The entire government, on the other hand, is seeded with military officers, ensuring a military bias.

Within the military, however, about eighty-five percent of the officers are members either of the Communist Party or the Young Communist League, while twenty-three percent of the members of the Communist Party Central Committee, the highest party body, are in the armed forces.

The Army is the largest of the military forces, with approximately 150,000 on active duty. Equipment includes 600 tanks, 200 armored personnel carriers, artillery, antiaircraft missiles—all furnished by the Soviet Union.

The Navy is modernizing. Old ships given by the U.S. prior to 1959 are being replaced with more than sixty new Soviet vessels, including some of the latest in cruise missile boats. About 9,000 Cubans are currently assigned to the Navy.

The Commander in Chief of the Cuban Air and Air Defense Force (DAAFAR), Maj. Gen. Francisco Cabera Gonzalez, commands 12,000 airmen, including about 400 pilots. His deputy, Col. Edel Martin Hernandez, is chief of the Revolutionary Air Force.

The Air Force includes a fighter-bomber force of 100 MiG-21s and fifty of the older MiG-15s and MiG-17s. Another fifty jets or more, mostly MiG-21s, have been furnished by the Soviet Union for Cuban pilots in Africa.

Cuba has integrated its Cuban commercial airlines with the Cuban Air Force, though seventy of the 200 government transports are nominally assigned to commercial services. Transport planes in operation are the Soviet-built An-2, Il-14, and An-24. To get the bulk of its men and equipment to Africa, however, Cuba must rely on Soviet ships and planes.

The Cuban armed forces have been tested in a series of guerrilla operations in Latin America, followed by a touch of conventional warfare more recently. Cuban tank crews fought for Syria against Israel in 1973. A Cuban advisor was captured in Guinea-Bissau, when the Portuguese army was there. Members of the Cuban armed forces participated in the Vietnam War, some taking part in the torture of American pilots.

But the biggest tests so far have been in Angola and Ethiopia. And there, the Cuban performance has generated admiration from allies and foes alike. The Cuban Air Force in particular has come in for praise for the skill of its pilots and ground crews. To receive some of the same training, a flood of Africans has poured into Cuba from Angola, Mozambique, and other countries—additional evidence that the Cuban armed forces have come of age.●

A TRIBUTE TO DR. ROBERT NEIDICH—NOTED EDUCATOR

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, on May 26, 1978, a richly deserved tribute will be paid by his associates to my good friend, Dr. Robert Neidich, as he retires from his position as superintendent of schools of the Levittown, N.Y., School District, located in my Fourth Congressional District.

I wish to congratulate and commend Dr. Neidich for his many contributions to the Levittown community, and to our entire Nation. Indeed, he has compiled a record worthy of the highest tribute.

Bob Neilich is a special human being. His tireless energies are channeled to a great number of professional, community and family activities, and his attention to each is full, complete and productive. He is greatly admired by his associates, adored by his lovely wife, Marilyn, and their two fine children, and emulated by both students and teachers with whom he comes in contact.

In 1965 Dr. Neidich brought to the Levittown school system the benefit of his wide-ranging experience in education. After 4 short years as assistant superintendent of schools, he was appointed superintendent in 1969.

In the Levittown system, he conceived the idea of the district horticultural center and vocational program, which offers noncollege bound youth an opportunity to learn a marketable skill and prepares them well to be productive and useful citizens. He also deserves credit for instituting the Adelphi College district cooperative program, permitting high school seniors of Levittown, who have a light course load in their final year, to enroll in concurrent college courses—an especially productive use of their spare time.

Dr. Neidich continues to distinguish himself in a particularly important and timely cause. He is chairman of a steering committee of 26 New York State schools now working toward the institution of a more equitable method of financing education in New York State.

Dr. Neidich's professional associations include his service as a consultant to the New York State commission on quality cost and financing of elementary and secondary education. He has also been especially active in the community with service clubs and organizations seeking to spur economic growth and opportunity.

All of the above show the side of Dr. Neidich which proves his commitment to education and to the community. The modesty and humility of the man, I would say, is best demonstrated by the one condition he imposed with respect to his own testimonial dinner—Bob Neidich refused to attend if he were going to be given a gift. In the alternative, the dinner committee encouraged a generous outpouring of offerings from the community to establish the Dr. Robert Neidich Scholarship Fund. This year three scholarships will be awarded in his name to deserving high school seniors.

Although Dr. Neidich's teaching career has now reached a formal conclusion, he will continue his work in the field of education as an adviser and consultant to New York University doctoral candidates. I know those counseled will benefit greatly from his wisdom, his excellent judgment, and the wealth of experience he has gained over the years.

I join Dr. Neidich's many friends and neighbors in the wish that his retirement years will be graced with good health; the richness of friendships; the warmth of memories; the deep satisfaction that comes from many jobs well done; and a readiness to face any new challenges the future may bring.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. ANTHONY C. BEILENSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, last Friday, May 19, the House passed legislation deciding the fate of millions of acres of land in Alaska. I was a cosponsor of the original version of that legislation, H.R. 39.

Unfortunately, previous calendar commitments in my district prevented my being present for four of the votes on H.R. 39 last Thursday and Friday. Had I been present I would have voted as follows: against Mr. MEEDS' substitute; against Mr. SANTINI's amendment to title XIII regarding minerals; against Mr. YOUNG's motion to recommit the bill to committee; and in favor of the final passage of the bill.

I am pleased that the House recognized this unique opportunity to preserve the natural values of land and wildlife before allowing development and exploitation of these resources, and passed a bill that will insure the protection of abundant wildlife habitat and will place millions of acres in the National Park, Wilderness Preserve, Wildlife Refuge, and Wild and Scenic River Systems.●

INDUSTRIAL FUNDED ACTIVITIES

HON. DAVID L. CORNWELL

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. CORNWELL. Mr. Speaker, I was most pleased that the House saw fit to approve my amendment to H.R. 10929, the Defense Authorization Act for fiscal year 1979, which increased the end-strength flexibility granted to the Secretary of Defense from 1¼ percent to 2 percent. I believe that this is a constructive step which, if properly used by the Defense Department, can ease some of the problems caused by rigid manpower ceilings which do not accommodate the fluctating workloads of Industrially Funded Activities (IFAs). Unfortunately, the various components of the Defense Department have been hesitant to ask the Secretary of Defense to use the additional manpower flexibility slots that are available to him in current law. I hope that passage of my amendment yesterday is seen by Defense components as an encouragement to request use of the flexibility slots so that the current practice of playing off one installation's manpower needs against another's can be ended.

I consider passage of this amendment, however, only an interim approach to the resolution of the manpower ceiling issue. Efficient management of IFAs, and efficient use of taxpayer dollars for defense efforts, will only come from an outright removal of the manpower ceilings for IFAs. Congressman DODD of Connecticut was prepared to offer an amendment along these lines during consideration of H.R. 10929. Unfortunately, a prior commitment forced him to leave town, and the amendment was not offered. It is my intention to work with Congressman DODD over the next year to secure passage of this amendment for fiscal year 1980. At this time, I would like to offer a statement I prepared in support of this amendment. I hope it will serve to shed some light on this issue.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the amendment offered by my Colleague from Connecticut, Mr. Dodd, to exempt industrially funded activities from the civilian manpower ceiling. My staff and I have worked extensively in the past year on this problem. In all our dealings with officials of the Defense Department and OMB, as well as officials of Crane Naval Weapons Support Center—an IFA in my District—I have yet to find anyone who feels that the civilian manpower ceiling is an effective or efficient means of managing approximately ⅓ of our defense support activities. Rather, the universal belief is that civilian manpower ceilings do not accommodate the fluctuating workload that these installations face, that manpower ceilings drive up the costs of performing Congressionally-approved work in research and development, weapons production and testing, and a variety of other combat support services. Unfortunately, it is impossible to calculate the millions and perhaps billions of dollars that are wasted every year due to additional overtime payments, unnecessary contracting-out, and the massive paperwork burden that results from the ceilings. Also, it is impossible to calculate the cost of human suffering felt by the thousands of employees who are arbitrarily down-graded, fired and rehired, or simply fired two days prior to the end of the fiscal year so that installation managers can meet their manpower ceiling requirement.

As many of you may remember, last year I and a number of our Colleagues attempted to address this problem by increasing the endstrength flexibility given to the Secretary of Defense to exceed the manpower ceiling. We increased this flexibility from ½ percent to 1¼ percent, in effect providing an additional 7600 manpower slots.

Furthermore, the Conference Report on the Defense Authorization Act directed the Secretary of Defense to insure that IFAs "are provided sufficient manpower to fulfill their work requirements, within the funding plans established for their operations." Despite our well-intended efforts, the Defense Department has either not been able to or not seen fit to meet our requests. To date, the Department has used only 2700 of the 12,600 additional manpower slots available to them. Yet, this very day, numerous IFAs in all regions of the country are still plagued with manpower ceilings too low to meet the funded workload.

In my installation of Crane, the Commanding Officer, a former official of NAVSCC, has stated that the funded workload justifies a manpower ceiling of 2965. The Department of the Navy nevertheless saw fit to grant Crane a manpower ceiling of only 2595, 360 men less than the estimated need. To meet this ceiling, Crane would need a substantial Reduction in Force (RIF).

However, when Crane applied for authority to perform the RIF, the authority was denied. To try to resolve this absurdity, the Navy decided to try to increase Crane's ceiling by 120 slots—still 240 short of what is needed to perform the workload that we in Congress approved. However, rather than granting the additional manpower slots outright, by asking the Secretary of Defense to use a few of the 9800 available flexibility slots, the Navy delayed and delayed until it found another IFA where the 120 slots could be taken away.

Thus, to not even meet the manpower requirements at Crane, Navy spent countless hours and dollars playing off one installation's needs against another's. Now that the dust is finally settled, neither Crane nor the other sacrificial installation have enough manpower slots to perform the work we demand to be performed.

To remedy this second absurdity, Crane will have to execute a "skills readjustment" wherein blue-collar workers employed in various weapons production, demilitarization, and testing functions will be offered jobs as typists and secretaries. Some will quit outright. Others will accept these downgraded positions and bump other employees with less seniority who have worked for years to improve their skills, jobs, and pay. The end result will be delays in accomplishing vital combat readiness missions, increased contracting-out of production work without prior cost-analysis, and the waste of millions of taxpayer dollars in this non-productive exercise in futility.

Last year, Senators Bayh and Matsunaga offered legislation similar to that offered today by Congressman Dodd. In Senate hearings on the bill, officials from the Defense Department argued against the bill on the grounds that we would be limiting overall manpower flexibility by exempting the IFAs since we would, in effect, be reducing the Congressional manpower ceiling by ⅓. I do not see where this argument holds water. Specifically to increase the overall manpower flexibility we have increased the end-strength flexibility by 7600 slots.

Further, I have yet to hear of an occasion where manpower slots were taken away from an IFA to be given to a non-IFA installation. What the Defense Department really wants is an outright removal of the total civilian manpower ceiling. There is a great deal of merit to this suggestion, and I feel that it should be examined closely in the near future.

However, until that time comes, I feel that we cannot take the attitude that, because the entire manpower allocation process is troubled, we should not try to begin to remedy its most troubled areas. Along these lines, passage of the Dodd amendment would provide a concrete example upon which to base future discussions of the viability of the total removal of the manpower ceiling.

I come from a business background which I know many of my Colleagues share. In business, we all learned that the demand for our goods or services dictated our manpower requirements. None of us ever learned to set an arbitrary employee level and then gear our production accordingly. The Dodd amendment gives us an opportunity to put this most basic business principle into operation in our single most costly budget item. I urge your support of the amendment.●

ALASKA LANDS BILL

HON. ROBERT (BOB) KRUEGER

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. KRUEGER. Mr. Speaker, although I was necessarily absent from the House floor last Friday when the House passed the Alaska lands bill, I want to take this opportunity to express my support for that legislation in its final form. If present, I would have voted for final passage of H.R. 39, and I want to salute my colleagues who worked so diligently throughout the discussion period and the committee process to develop this legislation. I believe that the bill, as approved, affords ample opportunity for continued study of the mineral potential within our 49th State, while giving priority to protection of the irreplaceable environmental treasures to be found there. I join the vast majority of my colleagues in the hope that we will soon have the opportunity to send this important legislation to the White House for the President's signature.●

EXPLANATION

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to indicate how I would have voted were I present on the House floor, Friday, May 19. I would have voted nay on the motion to recommit the Alaska national interest lands conservation bill, roll No. 339 and would have supported passage of this needed legislation and voted yea on roll No. 340. I certainly regret a commitment in my district caused me to leave the floor early that day and miss these votes.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker.●

SENATE—Friday, May 26, 1978

(Legislative day of Wednesday, May 17, 1978)

The Senate met at 10 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by Hon. SPARK M. MATSUNAGA, a Senator from the State of Hawaii.

PRAYER

MEMORIAL DAY TRIBUTE

O God, our Father, make us to remember the true meaning of the forthcoming holiday, that it is indeed a holy day when as a people we hold in sacred memory those who served in the defense of their country, who have fought a good fight, kept the faith, finished their course, and are at rest with Thee. May a full measure of their devotion and sacrifice fall on us that we may serve Thee in life as they served by death.

"O Valiant hearts, who to your glory came Through dust of conflict and through battle flame
Tranquil you lie, your knightly virtue proved,
Your mem'ry hallow'd in the Land you loved.
"O risen Lord, O Shepherd of our Dead,
Whose Cross has brought them and whose Staff had led
In glorious hope their proud and sorrowing Land Commits her Children to Thy gracious hand." Amen.

—SIR JOHN ARKWRIGHT.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. EASTLAND).

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., May 26, 1978.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable SPARK M. MATSUNAGA, a Senator from the State of Hawaii, to perform the duties of the Chair.

JAMES O. EASTLAND,
President pro tempore.

Mr. MATSUNAGA thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF LEADERSHIP

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings be approved to date.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, there are various nominations on the Executive Calendar, following "New Reports," which I believe have been cleared. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent, if this be accurate and the minority leader will respond—that the Senate go into executive session to consider the nominations under "New Reports."

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, the majority leader is correct, with one exception, as we observe from our calendar on this side of the aisle.

All the nominations under "New Reports" on pages 2 and 3, with the exception of Small Business Administration, the last nomination on the calendar, have been cleared. With that single exception, I would be pleased to proceed to their consideration.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the distinguished minority leader is correct. That was an oversight on my part. I modify my request as follows: That the Senate go into executive session to consider the nominations under "New Reports," with the single exception of Calendar No. 177.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The nominations will be stated.

REPRESENTATIVES TO THE 10TH SESSION OF THE UNITED NATIONS GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the nominations for Representatives to the 10th Session of the United Nations General Assembly be considered and confirmed en bloc.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations are considered en bloc and confirmed en bloc.

The nominations considered and confirmed en bloc are as follows:

To be a Representative of the United States of America to the 10th Special Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations Devoted to Disarmament: Andrew J. Young, of Georgia; W. Averell Harriman, of New York; GEORGE MCGOVERN, U.S. Senator from the State of South Dakota; CHARLES W. WHALEN, JR., U.S. Representative from the State of Ohio; and Paul Newman, of Connecticut.

To be an Alternate Representative of the United States of America to the 10th Special Session of the General Assembly of the United Nations Devoted to Disarmament: Adrian S. Fisher, of the District of Columbia; James F. Leonard, Jr., of New York; CHARLES MCC. MATHIAS, U.S. Senator from the State of Maryland; PAUL SIMON, U.S. Representative from the State of Illinois; and Marjorie Craig Benton, of Illinois.

THE JUDICIARY

The second assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Adrian G. Duplantier, of Louisiana, to be U.S. district judge for the eastern district of Louisiana.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

The second assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Gilbert G. Pompa, of Texas, to be Director, Community Relations Service.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

The second assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Walter M. Heen, of Hawaii, to be U.S. attorney for the district of Hawaii.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

The second assistant legislative clerk read the nomination of Ishmael A. Meyers, of the Virgin Islands, to be U.S. attorney for the district of the Virgin Islands.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nomination is considered and confirmed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to move en bloc to consider the votes by which the nominations were confirmed.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I make that motion.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of the nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume the consideration or legislative business.

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of legislative business.

AUTHORITY FOR CERTAIN ACTION DURING RECESS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that during the recess over until 12 noon on June 5, 1978, the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to receive messages from the President of the United States and that they may be appropriately referred.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that during the recess of the Senate over until 12 noon on June 5, 1978, the Vice President of the United States, the President of the Senate pro tempore, and the Acting President pro tempore be authorized to sign all duly enrolled bills and joint resolutions.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to receive messages from the other body and that they be appropriately referred during the recess over until June 5.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Vice President and the President pro tempore of the Senate be authorized during the recess of the Senate to make appointments to boards, commissions and delegations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO REPORT BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS ON MAY 31

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that during the nonlegislative period of the Senate, all committees may report bills and resolutions on Wednesday, May 31, 1978, between 9 a.m. and 3 p.m.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I have no further desire for time under the standing order.

THE PRESIDENT'S FOREIGN POLICY STATEMENTS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have read with great interest the transcript of the remarks by the President of the United States in Chicago yesterday, which covered a wide range of subjects.

I was particularly interested in the remarks by the President relating to foreign policy and the national defense of this country, especially as affected by the activities of Cuban troops in Africa and Cuban support and assistance for African insurgents.

I think the President's tone and the content of his statements show a firmness of resolve and the beginnings of a new direction in America's attitude toward that troubled part of the world, both of which will serve us well.

I commend the President for the strength of his statement. I hope he will continue with the development of a policy that finally will signal to the Soviet Union and to their surrogates, the Cubans, that their adventurism in Africa is unacceptable from the standpoint of the national security interests of the United States.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I have no further requirement for my time under the standing order, and I yield the floor.

LABOR LAW REFORM ACT OF 1978

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume consideration of the unfinished business, H.R. 8410, which will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 8410) to amend the National Labor Relations Act to strengthen the remedies and expedite the procedures under such act.

AMENDMENT NO. 1768

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I call up my amendment No. 1768.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from Kentucky (Mr. FORD), for himself and Mr. HUDDLESTON, proposes an amendment numbered 1768.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 22, insert the following between lines 3 and 4:

"SEC. 14. Section 3(d) is amended by inserting immediately after the third sentence the following new sentence: 'The General Counsel shall designate one or more officers or employees in the Board's national office and in each regional office to act as ombudsmen for the purpose of answering inquiries and disseminating information, particularly with regard to the rights, obligations, and responsibilities of those employers and employees in the small business community. The ombudsmen shall provide general information and explanation regarding the provisions of this Act, regulations of the Board, procedures involved in the processing of cases and the current state of the law with regard to particular areas of concern Any such ombudsmen shall not be authorized to render advisory opinions or make any factual or legal determinations under this Act.'".

On page 22, line 4, strike "SEC. 14." and substitute "SEC. 15.".

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, on behalf of Mr. HUDDLESTON, I ask unanimous consent that a statement by him on the Ford amendment be printed in today's RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATEMENT BY MR. HUDDLESTON

Over the past several months, I have talked with countless constituents and read countless letters on both sides of the labor reform issue. Both sides, I believe, have very real and legitimate concerns. It is incumbent upon us to see that those concerns are addressed in such a way that our labor laws do not tip the balance of power—do not favor one side over the other—in labor-management disputes.

I am cosponsoring this amendment which, I believe, would address in a fair and equitable manner the fears and concerns of our nation's small businesses. It would prohibit the National Labor Relations Board from exercising jurisdiction over more than 75% of our nation's establishments and industries and provide coverage only of those larger firms which do not meet existing small business definitions.

Under existing law, some four million businesses are potentially within the statutory jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Board. However, the Board historically has not exercised its full jurisdiction. Rather, it has adopted a series of standards for particular industries, under which approximately 3,150,000 of those employers are not covered, and only 850,000 are.

This amendment would write those exemptions into the law, and provide a statutory prohibition against any future action by the Board to change its standards in order to extend its jurisdiction to small enterprises currently exempt. According to Department of Labor figures, three out of every four U.S. establishments would be statutorily excluded from NLRB coverage by this amendment, including 88% of all retail establishments; 96% of all auto repair facilities; 90% of all banks, insurance and real estate firms; over 90% of all hotels and motels in the country; 95% of all personal service firms; 99% of all taxi companies and 88% of all newspaper and magazine enterprises.

Further, this amendment directs the General Counsel of the NLRB to appoint ombudsmen in each of the regional offices to provide information and answer inquiries particularly with regard to the rights, obligations and responsibilities of those employers and employees who will be covered by the law. This information will be readily available to anyone who requires it without their having to go to the considerable expense of hiring outside counsel.

Mr. President, small businesses are the backbone of this country. They need and deserve the special consideration afforded them by this amendment.

Just as this amendment represents, I believe, a workable compromise to a particularly disturbing aspect of this issue, I hope that we will see other reasonable compromises as debate on this bill continues. I am confident that both sides will gain if we can proceed in a spirit of cooperation.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I take this opportunity to explain why I support S. 2467, the labor law bill, and to offer an amendment which I believe will improve it significantly.

The Senate has been debating S. 2467, the first revision since 1959 of our labor-management relations law, for 9 days. We have heard cogent arguments on both sides.

I compliment the floor manager of the bill, Mr. WILLIAMS, and the ranking minority member of the committee, Mr. JAVITS, for the clear explanation given on each point that has been raised; and I congratulate the opponents of the bill as well.

All have done their homework well.

The discussion of the bill has been substantive, and it has been exhaustive. Members who have participated have contributed much to my understanding of the bill by their questions and their comments, and I feel that they have contributed much to the understanding of the bill by our constituents throughout the country.

I am particularly impressed by the fair and openminded approach which the floor managers of the bill have taken. Opponents have pointed to areas where the bill might be improved, and supporters have responded by indicating their willingness to consider proposals which address several areas of concern. Thus the debate has, indeed, served the important function of promoting understanding and compromise.

Today I will submit an amendment, cosponsored by several members of the Senate on both sides of the aisle which, in our opinion, will go a long way toward resolving some of the doubts and fears that have been expressed about the impact of this bill and especially the impact of the bill on small business. This amendment will prohibit the National Labor Relations Board from exercising jurisdiction over more than 75 percent of our business establishments.

I hope that my colleagues—those who have opposed the bill thus far, and those who have supported it—will, during the Memorial Day holiday, give every consideration to the amendment and to the assurances that it will provide to small employers.

This is not the first time that the Senate has debated the complicated issues of labor-management relations law—it will not be the last.

I was not in the Senate in 1935, when the Wagner Act—the basis of our labor-management laws—was passed. Some of the testimony before the old Committee on Education and Labor, however, I have read. They ring with dire predictions of the demise of capitalism and free enterprise in the United States which has been repeated from time to time since then.

I was not in the Senate in 1947, when the Taft-Hartley Act was passed; there were those who called it the "slave labor law" and predicted the end of the labor movement in the United States.

I was a member of the Senate in 1959, when the Landrum-Griffin Act was debated and passed. I recall the heartfelt and even anguished cries from supporters and opponents of the bill—that it went too far, or that it did not go far enough—in regulating union activities.

Our businesses have prospered since 1935, and our labor unions have matured. Labor and management are equal partners in the economic growth of our country in the 20th century. The predictions of doom have proved to be unfounded.

The legislation now before us is a response to changed conditions in our business and working communities. I believe that most of my colleagues—regardless of the position that they have taken on this particular bill—would agree that a law which has been in place for 43 years, and which has been revised only twice during that period of time—deserves careful review.

Government commissions, congressional committees, labor groups, business groups, academic groups, have studied the law. The recommendations contained in S. 2467 are, in part, the product of these analyses. More importantly, the bill reflects the lessons that have been learned over the years in the implementation of the National Labor Relations Act. It does not solve all the problems—it is not a panacea. But it is a constructive and carefully considered response to the concerns that trouble employers and employees alike.

It has often been said, and I do not hesitate to repeat, that, "You cannot legislate good labor-management relations." I agree. But we can—and we should—do our utmost to learn what 43 years of experience under the Wagner Act, and several years of experience under the Taft-Hartley Act, and the Landrum-Griffin Act have to teach us, and with this knowledge write a better labor relations law that will protect the rights and serve the interests of employers and employees. There is much to be learned.

We have learned of the heavy economic burdens that fall on the employer who must litigate prolonged and complex issues, and on the employee who may be discriminatorily discharged or be prevented from benefiting from a union organization and a union negotiated contract. We have learned of the uncertainty and hardship suffered by employers and employees alike who, in good faith, may wish to comply with the requirements of law but simply are unable to discover just what the law requires.

It is time that Congress provide a meaningful and appropriate response to these particular problems and to the mood of discouragement with Government which so many citizens express. I am sure that many of my colleagues have sensed that mood. The people of West Virginia have expressed to me—by their letters, by their comments when I see them in Washington and when I see them in West Virginia—a feeling of frustration with and alienation from their Government. I hear criticism of Government from both workers and business executives. There is a growing feeling that the Government, which they support with their tax dollars, is less of an ally than an adversary.

I view the bill before us as an opportunity to dispel that alienation and frustration. The bill is designed to promote fairness and efficiency—fairness in the operation of the law, efficiency in its administration and delivery. Several provisions of the bill—such as the expansion of the National Labor Relations Board, the authorization to hire law clerks, the use of short-form decisions, the rulemaking requirements—should reduce administrative delay, increase the predictability of decisions, and cut down on redtape and paperwork while preserving fairness. Other provisions—the use of preliminary injunctions in certain categories of illegal discharge cases, the establishment of statutory deadlines for the holding of elections, the changes in the backpay remedy—should help to promote compliance with the law.

I compliment the Committee on Human Resources for the recommendations it has made to achieve these goals. During 8 days of public hearings, the committee amassed an impressive array of testimony and information—from individual employers and employees, from representatives of business groups and unions. Testimony was submitted by more than 120 witnesses, resulting in nearly 4,000 pages of printed hearings. Many business representatives expressed legitimate concern about the proposed legislation. Through their testimony, and the experience and information which they shared with the committee, business groups have made a constructive contribution to the committee's work.

As a result, the bill reported by the committee is, in several important ways, more moderate, more fair and just. Early proposals that would in certain cases have provided triple pay to employees illegally discharged during an organizing campaign or prior to an initial contract have been modified. The House-passed bill provides for double backpay, less wages earned, while the Senate bill calls for 1½ backpay, with the same deduction. So this is an improvement.

The original proposal for setting statutory deadlines for the holding of elections was that they be held within 15 days, 45 days, or 75 days, depending upon the number of employees who requested an election, or the existence and complexity of a problem requiring pre-elections hearings. This is the version reported to the House floor, where it was changed to 25, 50, and 75 days, respectively. The Senate bill contains 30 days as its shortest deadline—double the original proposal, and then 45 and 75 days. I think this is an improvement.

In other areas as well the Senate bill better protects employer rights, without sacrificing employee rights or interests: First, in providing increased discretion to the Secretary of Labor with respect to reducing or modifying the debarment sanction; and second, in requiring that, before the equal access provision is triggered, the union must formally notify an employer that a "significant minority" of employees have demonstrated an interest in hearing the views of a union seeking to organize them.

There is continuing concern, however, about the impact of this bill on the Nation's many small businesses.

I share that concern and I am therefore introducing, together with Senators WILLIAMS, JAVITS, DURKIN, SASSER, MCINTYRE, ZORINSKY, CRANSTON, HUDDLESTON, CHAFEE, BROOKE, WEICKER, STAFFORD, PERCY, and others an amendment which is designed to address the special needs and conditions of our Nation's small businesses.

The amendment preserves the existing jurisdictional standards developed by the National Labor Relations Board with respect to small businesses. It provides that the Board "shall not assert jurisdiction over any labor dispute over which it would decline jurisdiction" under the standards in force on May 1, 1978. This language constitutes a statutory bar against any future action by the Board to change its standards in order to extend its jurisdiction to small enterprises currently exempt.

What does this bar mean, in practical terms?

At the present time, approximately 4 million business establishments are potentially within the National Labor Relations Board's statutory jurisdiction, which is as wide as the commerce clause of the Constitution. The Board, however, does not and historically has not exercised its jurisdiction over all 4 million employers. It has adopted a series of standards for particular industries, under which approximately 3,150,000 of those employers are not covered, and only 850,000 are covered. In other words, only 25 percent of employers whose businesses affect interstate commerce—only the 25 percent who are the larger firms—are regulated by the act.

Despite the fact that State laws—and not the National Labor Relations Act—govern labor relations for the remaining 75 percent of employers, the argument has been made that the Board could and in fact would change its jurisdictional standards, thus extending the provisions of this bill to small businesses not presently covered. In my opinion, it is not likely that the Board would take this course of action.

But those of us who offer this amendment believe that this amendment is an appropriate and necessary response to the possibility that the Board might, in the future, take such action.

First, it would be unfair and unwise to leave such a crucial issue in doubt. One of the primary goals of the legislation before us is to increase the predictability of Board procedures and decisions. Let us then answer the fears expressed by the country's small business community about what effect the provisions of this bill might have; let us put the matter decisively to rest.

Second, I believe that the jurisdictional standards which have been developed by the Board are both practical and fair; the Board has quite properly taken into account the physical, financial, and economic conditions of the small business organization. The standards recognize that rules and remedies which may be appropriate when dealing with a large firm are not always appropriate for the smaller firm, and may even work an undue hardship.

So those of us who support this amendment want to insure that the current exemptions be continued, and the amendment that I have offered on my behalf and theirs will do this.

I believe that a word of history is relevant in discussing existing exemptions and jurisdictional standards. In Guss v. Utah Labor Board, 353 U.S. 1 (1957), the Supreme Court held that when the NLRB declines to exercise jurisdiction over a labor dispute involving an employer in interstate commerce, the States are precluded from doing so except in situations where the NLRB had entered into an agreement with a State agency ceding that agency jurisdiction. The proper legislative response to the Guss decision was the subject of an extensive debate in the Congress during consideration of the Landrum-Griffin Act.

The answer ultimately agreed upon is contained in section 14(c) of the National Labor Relations Act, which states that the Board is precluded from raising the jurisdictional standards in effect on August 1, 1959. The section also grants to the States jurisdiction over those cases which the Board declines to hear. The first portion of section 14(c) was designed to reassure those who favored a uniform national labor policy and who were concerned that many States lacked procedures for the holding of secret ballot elections or other guarantees of employee free choice. The second portion responded to the plight of employers and unions caught in a no man's land in which neither Federal or State law applied.

Section 14(c) was a sound compromise between competing interests. But, while it precludes the Board from raising its jurisdictional standards, it fails to prohibit the Board from lowering them. My amendment would cure that defect by providing that the standards in effect as of May 1, 1978, cannot be varied either up or down.

It should be noted that, under my amendment, the Board would continue to be able to take jurisdiction over employers in interstate commerce who refuse to provide information on their volume of business; to require timely assertion of jurisdictional defenses; and to apply similar rules designed to limit unnecessary litigation and to prevent evasion of the Board's standards.

I urge my colleagues to review this amendment and I hope that they will be persuaded to support it. I believe that it answers, directly and fully, the charge that, upon passage of this legislation, the NLRB will proceed to extend its jurisdiction to cover hundreds of thousands of small employers.

I know that there are other areas in this bill of concern to the business community as a whole, and to small business establishments in particular. This is not the sole area of concern as we have seen manifested during the debate thus far. One of those areas is addressed by the amendment being offered by Senators FORD and HUDDLESTON. It directs the General Counsel of the NLRB to appoint ombudsmen who would respond to inquiries about the operation of the law, Board procedures, complaint processing and so on. Adoption of the Ford-Huddleston proposal will provide meaningful assistance to the smaller businesses covered by the act for whom the cost of outside counsel is burdensome.

I support the Ford-Huddleston amendment and offer my amendment as an amendment to it.

Mr. President, comparisons have been made between this bill, and this debate, and earlier labor-management relations acts. Along these lines, I would like to note that, in 1935, the Senate spent 3 days debating the Wagner Act; in 1947, the Taft-Hartley Act was debated for 14 days; and in 1959, the Landrum-Griffin bill was debated for 8 days. In none of these instances was cloture necessary to bring debate to a close.

No petition to invoke cloture has been filed on the bill before us now. I intend, when the Senate returns on Monday, June 5, to file a petition. The vote on the motion to bring debate to a close, pursuant to rule XXII, will occur on Wednesday, June 7—after 11 full days of debate.

I hope that the motion will prevail. If not then, later. If cloture is invoked, the Senate can proceed to consider substantive amendments which will result in a better bill. So I respectfully ask each of my colleagues to consider whether an attempted murder of this bill by filibuster is appropriate. Will we, as a legislative body, be serving our constituents by prolonging debate and by dilatory tactics or will we serve them better by considering the merits of the bill and by considering substantive amendments designed to improve the bill?

The debate thus far has been carried on in a very, very fine way, and I want to compliment again all Senators, both proponents and opponents, who have joined in the debate. The issues have been joined, and as a result we have been able to delineate the areas of utmost concern to Members, and it is for that reason that I think the debate thus far has been efficient.

The answer to my own question is very clear to me—we must complete action on this bill. Let us do so deliberately but let us do it expeditiously upon our return in June. There has been no attempt to choke off debate, and no indications of a stone wall being erected around the bill. But the time is fast coming for constructive action—and I would suggest that we get on with it.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1323

(Subsequently numbered amendment No. 2254)

(Purpose: to prohibit the N.L.R.B. from exercising jurisdiction over small business currently exempt.)

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I send to the desk the amendment to which I have alluded, and I ask that it be stated by the clerk. Let me be sure I have all the cosponsors down; then the clerk can read them again.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore (Mr. MATSUNAGA). The Chair requests that his name be added to the list of cosponsors.

The clerk will state the amendment.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from West Virginia (Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD), for himself, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. JAVITS, Mr. DURKIN, Mr. MCINTYRE, Mr. SASSER, Mr. ZORINSKY, Mr. HUDDLESTON, Mr. FORD, Mr. CRANSTON, Mr. MATSUNAGA, Mr. NELSON, Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. HASKELL, Mr. BROOKE, Mr. CHAFEE, Mr. WEICKER, Mr. PERCY, Mr. SCHWEIKER, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. BAYH, Mr. CLARK, Mr. SPARKMAN, Mr. MCGOVERN, Mr. HART, Mr. PAUL G. HATFIELD, and Mr. RANDOLPH proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1323 to the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. FORD) numbered 1768:

On page 2, insert the following between lines 7 and 8:

"SEC. 15. The proviso to Section 14(c)(1) of the Act is amended by striking "August 1, 1959" and substituting "May 1, 1978 and shall not assert jurisdiction over any labor dispute over which it would decline jurisdiction under those standards."

On line 9, strike "SEC. 15" and substitute "SEC. 16."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it has become commonplace here to have examples of the most exemplary legislative leadership on the part of the Senator from West Virginia. To measure after measure of great complexity, controversy, and difficulty, he brings his particular talent and leadership that is not demanding of the Members, but leadership that recognizes and respects every Member of this body; leadership that listens. I can say that with our modern technology, even when the majority leader is not on the floor, he listens. He will be listening on the audio systems that are now available. He is listening to the Members who have elected him to leadership and recognize his leadership.

From this whole process of understanding of this great institution, at critical hours he comes forward gathering as much of a consensus as can be seen, organized, and presented to this deliberative body. In this way he brings us constructively forward and moves us toward solutions that are necessary if the Nation's business is to be conducted.

So it is with the highest praise and commendation that I rise to express Senators' and citizens' appreciation for the leadership of the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD).

Mr. President, throughout the debate on this bill, indeed, from the time of its introduction last year, the outcry we have heard over and over again is that this bill will have a devastating impact on small business.

Small businessmen have made their way to my office over these many months to express their concern that my bill will seriously undermine their position under the law. These discussions have been a source of frustration for me. We know that most small businesses in this country are not presently covered by the National Labor Relations Act. And, it is indisputable that S. 2467 does not extend the application of the act to a single employer who is not presently covered.

Nevertheless the complaints have persisted.

Mr. President, I want to take this opportunity again to express, as manager of the bill, my appreciation to those who have contributed to the most productive and constructive processes of the Senate. My appreciation certainly also runs to the distinguished Senator from Kentucky (Mr. FORD) as well as to our distinguished majority leader for offering this amendment, which I hope will settle once and for all two major allegations that have been made with respect to this bill.

First, it has been argued that small businessmen, unlike large corporations, have neither the time nor the money to prepare for the difficulties they may encounter if confronted with an organizing campaign. They have argued that the law is so complex that they have no idea what they can say or do during an organizing campaign without committing an unfair labor practice, and that consequently they are inhibited from conducting a full campaign for fear of running afoul of the law.

It rather surprised me, to realize that there was this depth of concern in this regard. But I certainly had it demonstrated to me without any question when I had the opportunity to share an audience with the Senator from Utah. At a chamber of commerce audience, here in the District of Columbia, this anxiety was expressed by the business people of the community that we were talking to.

I made the observation that it seemed to me that the question of the employer's attitude at the time of electioneering and prior to elections should present no great, major legal questions. It seemed that it was a simple matter, that the employer could express his opinion freely but not coercively, and that was that.

A hue and cry went up from that audience, demonstrating that there is great anxiety out there that the law is complex, and that employers need a lawyer to define what they can say, what they cannot say, when they can say it, and where they can say it.

Well, I still think that with the law as it is and as it will be when we pass this measure, it is not that complex. But the anxiety is there, and we have to recognize that. And, recognizing it, let us meet it; and this amendment, of course, is directed toward those ends.

It has been suggested, so I can say it, Mr. President, that this has been a most helpful and educational process for this Senator, both here on the floor and in committee. I have been here most of the time and listened intently, and I have learned a great deal of the perceptions concerning the impact of the law and this bill. These debates have been a very, very fruitful and helpful process of learning.

It has been suggested that in order to protect himself in these situations the small employer must go to the time and expense of hiring a lawyer—probably a high-priced labor lawyer, if he can find one at all—in order to give himself a fair chance during the organizing campaign.

I believe that the distinguished Senator from Kentucky (Mr. FORD), has offered an amendment which provides an answer to this problem. Under it, the Labor Board is directed to designate an individual in each of its 32 regional offices across the country to act as an ombudsman who will answer questions and disseminate information to the small business community, to the individual business people, explain their rights and obligations under the act, and advise them on the current state of the law. Under the amendment, every small businessman will know where to go to seek advice and will have a Board employee well schooled in the law available to instruct him on his rights and duties. I believe this will go a long way toward resolving one of the recurring issues which has been raised by the small business community.

I will say it has also been raised by the big community which has assumed the role of representation of the small business community.

The second major issue concerns the widespread apprehension in the small business community—an apprehension created by the opponents of this legislation—that this bill is designed to sweep millions of small enterprises under the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Act.

This is patently untrue. As I have said over and over again, this bill would not include a single business under the NLRA which is not currently under its jurisdictional standards. But still, this ungrounded fear persists and it is for this reason that I am gratified that the Senator from West Virginia has offered his amendment—which will make crystal clear to everyone that after this bill becomes law, the Board cannot lower its existing industry standards to cover businesses in that industry that it does not cover now.

Under section 14(c)(1) of the act, the Board may decline to assert jurisdiction over any labor dispute which in its opinion does not affect commerce sufficiently to warrant the exercise of jurisdiction.

Thus, the Board may assert jurisdiction over private nonagricultural employers of virtually any size if it chooses to do so. However, over the years the Board has established a series of tests based on gross volume of business which must be met before it will assert jurisdiction.

The NLRB has developed figures on the number of business establishments in covered industries which do not meet the Board's jurisdictional standards from Bureau of Census publications.

The Board's figures reveal that only 847,497 or 22 percent of the 3,843,000 establishments in industries covered by the act meet its jurisdictional standards.

In other words, nearly 3 million business establishments are too small to meet these standards. Presently, only 12 percent of the 1.1 million retail establishments and 10 percent of the service establishments are covered by the act.

I will repeat, Mr. President, because this is not popularly understood, that presently only 12 percent of the 1.1 million retail establishments and 10 percent of the service establishments are covered by the act.

In Guss v. Utah Labor Board, 353 U.S. 1 (1957), the Supreme Court held that when the NLRB declines to exercise jurisdiction over an employer in interstate commerce, the States were precluded from doing so. Under that decision, employers not covered by the act were without protection from union activity, such as secondary boycotts and recognitional picketing, which is regulated by Federal law.

The Guss decision was the subject of extensive debate during consideration of the Landrum-Griffin Act in 1959.

I will say parenthetically that this was the bill on which the Senator from West Virginia, the majority leader, and I cut our eye teeth. That was our first year of membership in the Senate. I can recall those days of debate with such vividness. I recall that the final vote came one Saturday afternoon at 4:30 or 5 o'clock.

That was a difficult period, of course. That was the culmination of a lot of understanding of problems out there in the world of labor. It will be recalled that our great and good friend, our now departed colleague, John McClellan, and his committee had highlighted so many of the problems, and so many of those problems we addressed in that bill. That was, again, our openers as Members of the U.S. Senate, the Senator from West Virginia and I. We were of the same class elected in 1958, joining the Senate in 1959.

It dealt with part of the situation that we are facing here. It did recognize problems for the small business community created by the case of Guss against the Utah Labor Board.

In 1959, Congress did enact section 14(c)(2) of the act which permits the States to regulate any labor dispute over which the NLRB declines jurisdiction. This put the States in a position of being able to take out of the state of limbo those smaller establishments not covered by the National Labor Relations Act and enabled the States to enter into the picture and bring order and law where otherwise there would not be order and law.

At the same time, section 14(c) was further amended to provide that the Board could not raise the jurisdictional standards in effect on August 1, 1959. However, no action was taken to prohibit the Board from lowering those standards. Thus, the Board remains free to lower those standards if it so chooses.

The amendment proposed by the distinguished Senator from West Virginia (Mr. BYRD) and the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. DURKIN)—who had earlier introduced this idea and, of course, now many of us have joined Senator BYRD and Senator DURKIN—will lay these fears to rest, for it will insure that the Board may not hereafter lower its present standards in order to assert jurisdiction over the 3 million presently uncovered small businesses.

I congratulate my colleagues. I think this is a constructive approach. Throughout the debate on this legislation I have expressed my willingness to consider constructive ideas which are consistent with the basic purposes of this act. I think this is just such a constructive idea, particularly since it should lay to rest yet another of what I consider to be unfounded characterizations about this bill which we have been required to respond to over and over again.

It has been a time-consuming process and it is my hope that we can now get on with the business before us without being diverted any longer by the charge that the purpose of this bill is to promote the unionization of the small businesses of America.

We have listened, we have learned, we have understood, we have struggled. So many of us, by cosponsorship, have joined in this expression of response. I hope it will be found to be a refreshing development in this extended debate, which has been helpful in bringing us to constructive ideas, to adjustment, to amendment, to change, to head down the road toward a decision about the important principles of this legislation.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement by the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. DURKIN), who is a cosponsor of the amendment, be printed in the RECORD.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR DURKIN

I am pleased to cosponsor this amendment to the National Labor Relations Act, introduced by Majority Leader Robert Byrd, because I believe it extends substantial and needed benefit to small businessmen throughout the nation.

Some months ago I introduced an amendment, which contained the provision embodied in the Majority Leader's amendment, in order to meet the legitimate concerns of small businessmen in reference to the National Labor Relations Act. The amendment I am cosponsoring today directly and positively addresses many of these concerns and lays them to rest.

This amendment is vitally important because it will enact into law decisions of the National Labor Relations Board which now exempt thousands of businesses throughout the nation from coverage under the National Labor Relations Act.

Presently, the National Labor Relations Board has authority under the NLRA to exempt from its coverage businesses which do not have a substantial impact on interstate commerce. Over the past 42 years the Board has, on a case-by-case basis, exempted numerous businesses, based on their dollar volume of business. For example, a retail enterprise with a total annual business of $500,000 is exempt from the Act. Two-thirds of existing retail firms fall under this exemption.

This amendment would codify these exemptions in order to meet the legitimate concerns of small businessmen. Because these Board rules have been determined on a case-by-case basis, many are subject to change in the same manner, and these changes would not even be printed in the Federal Register. Thus, even if a businessman was fortunate enough to know his status under the NLRA, he could not be certain, without time-consuming monitoring on his part or costly advice on the part of counsel, that these rules, and thus his status, had not been changed.

This is particularly important since most small businesses do not even know whether or not they are exempted from the NLRA because they can ill-afford to hire an attorney to research the Board's case law to learn the appropriate dollar volumes which determine exemptions for their type of business. Thus, if faced with an organizing effort, most small businessmen do not know where to begin, and in many cases are hard pressed to retain a lawyer schooled in the intricacies and nuances of NLRB case law to advise them.

This amendment will bring certainty to this chaotic system and it will insure that small business has an easy and inexpensive way of determining whether or not they are covered under the NLRA.

It is also important to note what this amendment does not do.

It does not prevent the Board from determining that other businesses do not substantially affect interstate commerce and thus are also exempt from the NLRA.

It does not exempt business from organization efforts under State law if that is the wish of a majority of the employees.

It does not interject the Federal government into labor disputes involving small businesses which do not have a substantial impact on interstate commerce.

For these reasons, I urge the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I rise in support of the amendment.

To me, the debate on this bill has now arrived at a new stage. We are now beginning the process of seeking to fashion a bill which will have broad acceptance.

I said yesterday, and I repeat today, with the greatest respect, that there are some in this Chamber who simply are against this bill, no matter how it is amended. That is their right, and we shall debate the issues with considerable deliberation, as we already have.

I am very pleased to say that there are, on this side of the aisle, for whom it is my privilege to rise as the ranking member of this committee, a considerable number of members who feel that the amendment process is a very essential element in what we are going to do about this bill. That includes, I should say, four of the six minority members of our committee. It shall be my aim and ambition, if I can ever attain it, to make it six—to wit, the whole minority. Whether I can or not is a very serious question, but I shall try.

In any case I shall do my utmost, with the greatest respect, to deal with the individual matters of critical analysis which are raised by my colleagues, who desire to defeat it.

As I have said, we have listened, we are listening, we will listen. The second point here, which is critical, Mr. President, is to deal with what I consider to be a very legitimate problem, which is the issue of the small business community, which, because of physical facilities, money, lawyers, accountants—whatever the particular reasons may be—find it difficult to deal with aspects of labor-management relations which will continue in the law long after this bill is debated, whether or not it is passed. And I certainly hope it will pass in an appropriate form, or then, we have contended, and I think quite properly, that the overwhelming bulk of small businesses are not covered at all by the regulations which have been properly adopted, under the commerce clause and under the law, by the NLRB. Now we are proposing that those regulations be incorporated into the law so that there will be no question about it.

It has already been emphasized by Senator BYRD and by Senator WILLIAMS that this will be a floor as well as a ceiling, and that the difficulty of this particular provision, up to now—to wit, that it has been a ceiling—is removed by this amendment—to wit, that it will also be a floor. So no more people can be brought under it than are subject to it now and, unlike a regulation, that cannot be changed except if Congress acts.

Mr. President, when the debate on this labor law reform bill began last week, I expressed my dismay at the fact that the interests opposed to this measure have continually overblown its impact on the small business community and to the Congress and to the owners and managers of small enterprise all across the country. The bill continues to be unfairly attacked as being aimed at small business, and predictions that its enactment will devastate small business are ceaselessly repeated day after day.

The emotional appeal of this kind of hyperbole has been so widespread that it has, in fact, succeeded in arousing the anxieties of many small business entrepreneurs. I can only regret that this has already happened, for its effect has been to cloud, rather than illuminate, the debate on the substantive elements of this bill. Because of the volume of these charges, I believe they must be answered now, before the Senate is asked to invoke cloture on unlimited debate.

I have at several points during the past 2 weeks expressed openly my willingness to consider responsible suggestions for reasonable amendments that are consistent with the purposes of the labor law reform bill. In my judgment, the amendments that are today before us by the distinguished majority leader, Senator BYRD, and by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, Mr. FORD, deserve approval by the Senate because they are designed to assure those in the small business community that the charges made against the bill in the name of small business are baseless.

I would like to take this opportunity, however, first to address the entire small business issue. I am appalled that U.S. small business has allowed itself to be used as a weapon by the interests opposed to labor reform, opposed to adequate enforcement of current labor law, to free and fair freedom of choice for workers. The small business issue has diverted attention from the real problems that are addressed by the Senate bill. Instead we hear slogans repeated over and over implying that the rights of employees to organize and to bargain collectively are somehow antithetical to the interests of small business entrepreneurs, and that therefore this bill, designed to further those rights, cannot be tolerated by the small businesses of this country.

I hope to be able to show today that these arguments are without real foundation.

Mr. President, no discussion of the small business issue can proceed without reference to the facts about the size of business establishments which are today subject to the jurisdiction of the National Labor Relations Act. The NLRA gives the Labor Board broad statutory jurisdiction over "labor disputes" which may affect interstate commerce.

Instead of making a case-by-case determination of the effect of each business on interstate commerce, the NLRB adopted "jurisdictional standards" over 20 years ago which established criteria for the exercise of jurisdiction based on the volume of business engaged in by a particular category of employers. For example, the standard for retail employers is $500,000 of gross business volume per year.

Under these standards, the overwhelming majority—78 percent—of small business is not subject to the jurisdiction of the NLRB. Therefore it would be subject to the pending bill and nothing proposed in the labor law reform bill would have a direct impact on these small business establishments. Bureau of Census data show that there are approximately 3.8 million business establishments in the country. Of these, only 850,000 are large enough to fall within the existing jurisdictional standards. For retail establishments, of a total of 1.2 million only 145,000 are covered. And for service businesses of all types, only 105,000 of a total of 1.1 million are subject to NLRB jurisdiction.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the complete table of figures furnished by the NLRB be printed at the conclusion of my remarks.

During the over-20-year-period since the Board has established these jurisdictional rules, the only concern of the Congress was that as many employers as possible be subject to the act's coverage. In the Landrum-Griffin amendments of 1959, the Congress amended section 14 (c)(1) expressly to forbid the Board from raising the existing dollar amount standards. The fear expressed by business representatives at that time was that they might lose the important protections offered by the act if the Board were to restrict its exercise of jurisdiction further. Indeed, until this year we in Congress have not heard complaints from the small business community that they were not exempt by the act—rather, the complaints have been that they were not included.

That small employers up to now have wanted to be covered is not at all surprising. Before the Wagner Act was enacted, efforts to organize workers were often characterized by lengthy strikes and other forms of industrial strife. The NLRA established an orderly, peaceful alternative means of resolving recognition questions, and guaranteed employers a fair opportunity to resist a union-organizing effort. In addition, the act, in section 8(b)(7), limits recognitional picketing and permits a picketed employer to request an expedited election in order to minimize disruption. Once an election has been held, section 9(c)(3) of the act prohibits furthering picketing or elections for 1 year. These provisions are especially critical for the small employer who may not be able to match the economic power of a large labor organization.

Other employer protections available to those covered by the act include protection against secondary boycotts (sections 8(b)(4) and 8(e)), limitations on mandatory subjects of bargaining (section 8(d)), protection from work jurisdiction disputes between two unions (section 8(b)(4)(D)), and protection for employers and the self-employed against coercive demands to join a union (section 8(b)(4)(A)).

When a collective-bargaining relationship is established, section 301 of the act permits employers and unions to enforce contract rights in Federal court. In addition, the NLRB must seek quick injunctive relief on behalf of employers who are subject to union unfair labor practices such as secondary boycott and unlawful recognitional picketing, pursuant to section 10(l).

Businesses excluded from the Board's jurisdiction must rely upon State law for protection, yet 34 States today lack a comprehensive labor relations law. Given the range and effectiveness of the act's protections against union abuses, it is no wonder that small business has sought coverage.

Even though these advantages to small employers continue to exist, the bill itself makes absolutely no change in the coverage of the act. The amendment offered today by Senator BYRD simply makes this fact explicit.

Turning to the specific provisions of the bill, I do not believe that there is a single provision of the bill that would discriminate against small business as opposed to larger establishments. The bill is aimed at lawbreakers and at those who have been able to manipulate its procedures to nullify its intended protections, both union and management, both large and small. If anything, the specific provisions of the labor reform bill will have less impact upon the small business person who obeys the law than on big business concerns.

The equal access provision, for example, is designed to insure that workers have the opportunity to hear both sides of the representation issue. But in a small 10 person shop or store, it is obviously not necessary to assemble all of the workers together for a captive audience speech in order to communicate management's views, as it might be for a large manufacturing plant. More informal means of communication are available to the small business person, and the provisions of the bill are less likely to be triggered in those circumstances, and less likely to be necessary.

Similarly, the election deadlines set by the bill are hardly difficult to meet where campaigning takes place among a small group of employees. One month is a more than adequate period in order to acquaint fully a few employees with the issues. Moreover, the bill's rulemaking and free speech provisions are designed to simplify the law relating to election conduct and to make it easier for employers to know in advance what the rules are. Senator FORD's amendment, cosponsored by Senators BYRD, WILLIAMS, DURKIN, MCINTYRE, HUDDLESTON, CRANSTON, CHAFEE, BROOKE, WEICKER, STAFFORD, PERCY, NELSON, MATSUNAGA, SASSER, HASKELL, ZORINSKY, and myself, is designed to assist small business further by directing the NLRB to designate an officer in every regional office to be responsible for assisting and giving general advice to small business. This amendment has my support because it is consistent with the labor reform bill's overall purpose—to foster compliance with the act.

Another section of the bill that has been criticized as unfair to small business is the index used to calculate the make-whole backpay remedy for unlawful refusals to bargain. The bill refers to the most accurate and current index now available, the Quarterly Report of Major Collective Settlements, published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics.

This index is expressed as a percentage increase from one year to another; it does not refer to actual wage and benefit levels in the settlements surveyed. The data available from the Department of Labor indicate that there are only minor differences in percentage terms between settlements involving units of 5,000 or more (the data base for the index) and settlements involving much smaller bargaining units. For example, 1976 data indicate that wage agreements in units with fewer than 100 workers averaged 7.6 percent, units with 100 to 500 workers averaged 7.4 percent, 500–1,000 averaged 8.4 percent. I submit that these figures prove that little if any adjustment is appropriate in order to apply the percentage index to smaller employers. Nonetheless, because I believe that the appearance of fairness relating to a more precise objective measure for small businesses is important, I will be happy to consider any more precise measure of damages for employees of smaller employers found guilty of unlawfully refusing to bargain.

I would emphasize, however, that I must oppose any proposal which would create a double standard of justice in the remedial provisions of this bill. We cannot pretend that small employers never commit serious violations of the act—over half of all unfair labor practice complaints issued in 1977 were against employers of 50 or fewer employees. For the worker who is unfairly fired, for the family that is without income for an extended period due to a labor law violation, it is no answer to deny an effective remedy because the size of the business was not big enough.

Small business persons themselves should not support any proposals for remedial exclusions, since small businesses are particularly vulnerable to unfair competition from lawbreakers who now avoid the act through the exploitation of its weaknesses. A strong commitment to evenhanded and effective law enforcement would serve the interests of all law-abiding citizens, including all business persons.

Mr. President, the Senate has faced the small business issue before in a variety of contexts. Only last year the Senate defeated proposals to raise the exemption for retail and service establishments for the Fair Labor Standards Act to $500,000 gross business annually. The Senate's judgment was that in light of the purpose of the FLSA—to protect the dignity of the worker and the minimum living standards of the poor—it would be entirely inappropriate to "uncover" thousands of employees now protected by that act. I would point out that the exemption rejected by the Senate for that bill—$500,000—is identical to the jurisdictional standard that now applies to retail enterprises under the NLRA. Why should we even consider exempting businesses above $500,000 from the NLRA when we decisively rejected raising the FLSA exemption at that same level?

We need to recall again how great a role small business has in the economic life of our Nation. Collectively, small business has an immense contribution to make to our economy, our way of life, and our vitality as a people. But this contribution depends on a creative response to the truly significant problems that now confront American business—problems of unemployment, sagging productivity, competition from abroad, and worker dissatisfaction on the job. These problems must be addressed by labor and management together, and they demand the highest level of trust and cooperation. It would be a tragedy indeed if the preoccupation with labor reform were to poison the atmosphere between labor and small business that is necessary to meet the challenges ahead. This is a time for vision and for preparation for a new era in labor-management relations. It is most definitely not the time to repeat older errors in pursuit of the status quo.

Mr. President, earlier this week a great deal of debate was generated over a low level internal staff analysis of the impact of labor law reform, prepared by the Office of Advocacy in the Small Business Administration. The Office of Advocacy is a newly created unit within the SBA, charged with advocating the interests of small businesses within the bureaucracy. It should therefore come as no surprise to anyone that the staff analysis mirrors point-for-point the arguments that have been made in opposition to the bill by the national business and industry associations. The fact that it was written by a staffer at the SBA does not mean that the analysis is the official position of the SBA, nor does it mean that the analysis is in any way more objective or factually accurate or dispassionate than the similar analysis circulated by the opponents of the bill. I have examined the memo, and in my judgment it simply repeats the arguments that have been raised by others and to which I have already addressed myself. I would point out to my colleagues, however, that in several respects the staff memo is based upon erroneous understandings of the bill's provisions and must therefore be read with caution.

Finally, it is a disservice to the credibility of small business to have every vested interest that feels threatened by this legislation to use the banner of small business in justification for maintaining the status quo. I believe that this repeated crying of "wolf" will be found baseless by the Senate, for it is certainly unwarranted in connection with this bill. There is nothing in a bill designed to protect the already established rights of workers that threatens the interests of small business. If some believe that employee rights and small business cannot coexist, I can only reject that belief categorically as unworthy of serious consideration here.

Moreover, such opposition risks the appeal to class warfare that this country has largely escaped to date. Certainly one of the greatest accomplishments in our 200-year history as a nation has been the pervasive sense that we are not shackled by rigid class distinctions and we do not define our individual interests solely on the basis of economic circumstances. This has only been possible because Americans have not begrudged others the basic rights and fairplay that allow everyone an opportunity to advance.

Mr. President, I was the ranking member of the Small Business Committee until the rules of the Senate required me to give up certain of my committees. I believe, and I represent to the small business community, that when this bill finally emerges into law, it will give small business nothing to fear. I believe that reforms in the protection of employee rights and in the rules for free and fair elections, which are the result of an abuse of the legal process and an abuse of the delays possible under that legal process, will not threaten law-abiding small businessmen, any more than strong criminal law enforcement will threaten the law-abiding citizen.

On the contrary, they will be an effective factor in raising the morale of workers in such small businesses as are affected and will make them feel that, because the employers they work for are small, they are not thereby deprived of the rights of other Americans in the collective bargaining process with their employers.

I pledge myself, whether in the debate here, in the amendments which are acted on, or—I emphasize this very strongly—in the ensuing House-Senate conference, to see that what emerges as the law, as a result of this debate, will be a law upon which there is a general consensus, insofar as humanly possible, by the large number of people who are concerned that the abuses of the legal process be corrected by this bill.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks a full description of the current NLRB jurisdictional standards, published by the Bureau of National Affairs in its labor relations index.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 1.)

Mr. JAVITS. I also ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a table entitled "Estimated Number of Employees and Establishments Covered Under the Provisions of the National Labor Relations Act, 1975."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(See exhibit 2.)

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the name of the Senator from Pennsylvania (Mr. SCHWEIKER) be added as a cosponsor of the Byrd amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Exhibit 1 follows:

NLRB'S BASIC JURISDICTIONAL STANDARDS

The revised set of jurisdictional standards adopted by NLRB in 1958 are stated in terms of the following:

1. Gross annual volume of business.

2. "Direct outflow," which refers to goods or services furnished to customers outside the state.

3. "Indirect outflow," which refers to goods or services furnished to customers within the state who themselves meet a jurisdictional standard other than "indirect" outflow. (For instance, indirect outflow can be met by sales to retail establishments which meet the retail standard of $500,000 gross volume of business.)

4. "Direct inflow," which refers to goods or services furnished directly to the employer from outside the state.

5. "Indirect inflow," which refers to purchases from a seller within the state of goods or services that originated outside the state.

Following are the basic jurisdictional standards and rules the Board applies to various categories of businesses or operations and types of situations.

General non-retail—$50,000 outflow or inflow, direct or indirect. In applying this standard the Board will add direct and indirect outflow or direct and indirect inflow, but it will not add outflow and inflow. (Siemons Mailing Service, 1958, 43 LRRM 1056).

Retail concerns—$500,000 gross volume of business. (Carolina Supplies & Cement Co., 1958, 43 LRRM 1060).

Retail and manufacturing combined—Where a single, integrated enterprise not only manufactures a product but also sells it directly to the consumer, the NLRB will assert jurisdiction if the company meets either the retail or the applicable nonretail standard (Man Products, Inc., NLRB 1960, 46 LRRM 1352).

Retail and wholesale combined—If a company is engaged in wholesale and retail operations, the nonretail standard will be applied. (Pease Oil Co., NLRB, 1958, 43 LRRM 1128).

Service establishments—NLRB applies the same jurisdictional standards to service establishments as it does to retailing (see above). (Claffey's Beauty Shoppes, NLRB, 1954, 35 LRRM 1079).

Instrumentalities, links, and channels of interstate commerce—$50,000 from the interstate (or linkage) part of the enterprise or from services performed for employers in commerce. This standard applies to (1) all passenger and freight transportation enterprises engaged in the furnishing of interstate transportation service, and (2) all transportation and other enterprises which function as essential links in the transportation of passengers or commodities in interstate commerce. In applying the "essential links" standard, jurisdiction is not asserted on the basis of services performed for a company that meets the Board's standards only by virtue of indirect outflow or inflow (H P O Service, Inc., 1958, 43 LRRM 1127).

National defense—Substantial impact on national defense. In revising this standard in 1958, the Board eliminated previous requirements that an enterprise's national defense operations must be directly related to national defense, must be performed pursuant to contracts or subcontracts with the Government, and must amount to at least $100,000 annually (Ready Mixed Concrete & Materials, NLRB, 1958, 43 LRRM 1115)

Territories—Same standards applied as in the states.

District of Columbia—Plenary jurisdiction (complete and outright).

Employer associations—Regarded as a single employer for application of the standards. The totality of the commerce facts concerning the operations of the various members will be considered in determining whether the regular jurisdictional standards are met (Siemons Mailing Service, NLRB, 1958, 43 LRRM 1056).

Multistate establishments—The Board initially set up separate standards for assertion of jurisdiction over the particular enterprise of a multistate retail or nonretail establishment. The tests now are the same for both the single state and the multistate enterprises. If the entire multistate establishment meets the appropriate standard, the Board will take jurisdiction (T. H. Rogers Lumber Co., NLRB, 1957, 40 LRRM 1063)

Nonprofit organizations—The fact that an employer operates on a nonprofit basis is not alone sufficient to exempt it from NLRB jurisdiction, the Board has held. Asserting jurisdiction over a nonprofit "home for the aged," the Board expressly rejected the contention that "an institution's effect on commerce may be measured by its non-profit status, its title, its religious affiliation, or its occupants." (Drexel Home, NLRB, 1970, 74 LRRM 1232)

Charitable institutions—In a 1976 case, the NLRB changed its policy and ruled that whether an institution is charitable in nature is not a factor to be considered in determining whether jurisdiction should be asserted.

Asserting jurisdiction over a home for children with behavioral difficulties, the Board in effect overruled such cases as Ming Quong Children's Center (1974), 86 LRRM 1254 in which jurisdiction was declined because the employer was a nonprofit institution, whose activities primarily were noncommercial in nature and intimately connected with the charitable purposes of the institution (St. Aloysius Home, LRRB, 1976, 92 LRRM 1355).

Religiously sponsored organizations—Jurisdiction will be declined over religiously sponsored organizations only when they are "completely religious, not just religiously associated." (Catholic Bishop of Chicago, NLRB, 1975, 90 LRRM 1225)

Union-employers—The Supreme Court has held that NLRB can not refuse jurisdiction over unions as a class when they act as employers. The Board subsequently asserted jurisdiction over a local union as an employer on the basis of (1) the local's being an integral part of a multistate organization composed of the parent international and 500 affiliated locals, and (2) its payment of more than $40,000 in dues money to the international's office in another state. The Board also asserted jurisdiction over the union-administered welfare fund as an employer on the ground that the fund furnished services valued in excess of $50,000 annually to employers who in turn met the Board's jurisdictional standards. (Chain Service Restaurant, 1961, 48 LRRM 1457)

Secondary boycotts. In laying down jurisdictional rules to cover secondary boycott cases, the NLRB regards the primary employer as the one with whom the union has a direct dispute and the secondary employer as the one whose employees the union is trying to induce to stop handling the primary employer's goods. Under the present formula, the NLRB will consider, if necessary, "not only the operations of the primary employer, but also the operations of any secondary employers * * *." Furthermore, in considering a secondary employer's operations, the NLRB will take into account "the entire business of the secondary employer" at the location affected by the boycott instead of limiting its consideration to the amount of business done by the secondary employer with the primary employer at that location. Under this general rule, the NLRB will look at the secondary employer's operations, if the primary employer's operations don't meet its standards (Int'l B'hd Teamsters, Loc. 554 [McAllister Transfer, Inc.], 1954, 35 LRRM 1281; also see Reilly Cartage Co., 1954, 35 LRRM 1292).

If the secondary employer's entire business at the location affected by the boycott meets the tests, jurisdiction will be asserted, regardless of the primary employer's failure to meet the tests. Furthermore, if more than one secondary employer is involved, jurisdiction may be asserted over all secondary employers if the entire business of one or more of the secondary employers at the location or locations affected by the boycott meets the tests (Commission House Drivers, Loc. 400, Int'l B'hd Teamsters, [Euclid Foods, Inc.], 1957, 40 LRRM 1135).

Period used in applying standards. What if a company generally regarded as being in interstate commerce has a drop in its volume in the year when unfair practices are alleged? The NLRB rejected the view that a company "which is interstate in character" isn't subject to NLRB's jurisdiction "during those annual periods" when the business volume tails off markedly. (Barton Brass Works, 1948, 22 LRRM 1225) In general the NLRB policy is to rely on the commerce facts of "the most recent calendar or fiscal years, or the 12-month period immediately preceding the hearing before the Board" when such facts are available. (Aroostock Fed'n of Farmers, Inc, 1955, 36 LRRM 1611)

§ 3. Industry rules. Discussed below are standards that the NLRB applies to specific industries.

Apartment projects—In 1967, NLRB began taking jurisdiction over employers in the rapidly growing apartment project business. It decided to assert jurisdiction over apartment housing projects that receive at least $500,000 in gross revenue annually. (Parkview Gardens, NLRB, 1967, 65 LRRM 1492)

Automobile dealers—NLRB applies the same jurisdictional standards to automobile dealers as it does to other retail establishments even though the dealer has a franchise from a national manufacturer. (Wilson-Oldsmobile, NLRB, 1954, 35 LRRM 1062)

Baseball—NLRB has asserted jurisdiction over professional baseball as an industry in or affecting interstate commerce. Baseball's exemption from the federal antitrust laws, the Board said, has been preserved merely as a matter of judicial stare decisis. (American League, NLRB, 1969, 72 LRRM 1545)

Building and construction industry—As a matter of administrative discretion, the NLRB didn't take cases involving the building trades under the Wagner Act. But this policy was changed under the LMRA. (NLRB v. Denver Bldg. Council [Gould & Preisner], US SupCt, 1951, 28 LRRM 2108; Int'l Bro'hood of Electrical Workers, Loc. 501 [Sam'l Langer], US SupCt, 1951, 28 LRRM 2115) The regular jurisdictional standards described above apply to cases involving a single building trades employer.

Colleges and universities—NLRB will assert jurisdiction over private colleges, universities and "secondary schools" having a gross annual revenue from all sources, excluding contributions which are not available for use for operating expenses because of limitation by the grantor of at least $1,000,000. This jurisdictional standard applies both to nonprofit educational institutions and to those operated for profit. (See Cornell University, NLRB, 1970, 74 LRRM 1269; Jurisdictional Rule, 1970, 75 LRRM 1442, NLRB Rules and Regulations, § 103.1, LRX 4141; Windsor School, Inc., NLRB, 1972, 82 LRRM 1341)

Communications systems—$100,000 gross volume for radio, television, telegraph, and telephone companies. (Raritan Valley Broadcasting Co., NLRB, 1958, 43 LRRM 1962)

Country clubs—NLRB applies its jurisdictional standard for retail establishments in deciding whether to assert jurisdiction over the operations of a country club. (Walnut Hills Country Club, NLRB, 1963, 54 LRRM 1335)

Day care centers—The Board will assert jurisdiction over day care centers that have gross annual revenues of at least $250,000. (Salt & Pepper Nursery School, NLRB, 1976, 91 LRRM 1338)

Entertainment and amusement—The Board has declined to assert jurisdiction over some enterprises in the amusement or entertainment industry, such as horse- and dog-racing tracks (Jurisdictional Rule, 1973, 82 LRRM 1737, NLRB Rules and Regulations, § 103.3 LRX 4141); a motor tour company (Tanner Motor Tours, NLRB, 1955, 36 LRRM 1025); and an outdoor sports arena (Olympia Stadium Corp., NLRB, 1949, 24 LRRM 1410)

But several 1961 decisions made it clear that the Board did not intend to include the entire amusement-entertainment industry. An advisory opinion stated that the Board would assert jurisdiction over a league of New York City theatre owners (The League of N.Y. Theatres, Inc., NLRB 1961, 47 LRRM 1210). Jurisdiction also was asserted over a firm that operated local sight-seeking boat tours on a year-round basis with a comparatively stable and regular workforce. In applying its retail jurisdictional standard to take the case, the Board stated that "the amusement or entertainment industry, although once regarded as being out of the mainstream of commerce, is no longer a negligible factor in our national life." (Ray Davidson & Ray, NLRB 1961, 48 LRRM 1052)

In both of the above decisions, the Board noted that the cases did not involve detailed regulations by other public authorities.

The Board has followed a consistent policy of taking jurisdiction in motion picture and broadcasting cases (Edward Small Productions, Inc., NLRB, 1960, 46 LRRM 1017; Television Film Producers Assn., NLRB, 1951, 27 LRRM 1491).

Gambling casinos—Although NLRB has declined to assert jurisdiction over the horse- and dog-racing industries, it has no compunction about taking cases involving major gambling casinos. (El Dorado, Inc., NLRB, 1965, 58 LRRM 1445)

Guard service—Companies furnishing plant guards to employers in interstate commerce are themselves under the jurisdiction of the NLRB if the value of the services meets one of the Board's basic jurisdictional standards (§ 2 above). The NLRB, for example, asserted jurisdiction over a detective agency operating on a nationwide basis that furnished guard services to companies that produced and shipped in interstate commerce goods worth more than $50,000 a year. The Board found that the agency's operations met the indirect outflow test. (Burns Detective Agency, NLRB, 1954, 35 LRRM 1179)

Hospitals, nursing homes—Revising a prior decision, NLRB decided in 1967 to bring within its jurisdiction proprietary hospitals and proprietary nursing homes and "related facilities." The Board established jurisdictional yardsticks of gross annual income—$250,000 for proprietary hospitals and $100,000 for proprietary nursing homes. (Butte Hospital Properties, 66 LRRM 1259; University Nursing Home, 66 LRRM 1263)

In 1970, jurisdiction was asserted over a "home for the aged" which the Board found was an "extended care facility" as defined for Medicare purposes by the American Hospital Association. Applying the $100,000 jurisdictional standard, the Board held that the employer's nonprofit status was irrelevant. (Drexel Home, 74 LRRM 1232)

Private nonprofit hospitals were specifically exempt from the Taft-Hartley Act until 1974, when Congress extended coverage to all private "health care institutions."

The Board also has asserted jurisdiction over a nonprofit corporation whose "homemaker services," intended to maintain children, families, and older persons in their community and to prevent institutionalization, are similar to those of visiting nurses associations over which the Board previously had asserted jurisdiction. (Children & Family Service of Springfield, NLRB, 1975, 90 LRRM 1211)

Hotels and motels—In 1959, NLRB for the first time began taking jurisdiction over labor disputes involving hotels and motels. The Board now will exercise jurisdiction over hotels and motels that do a gross annual business of $500,000. Until 1971, the Board declined to assert jurisdiction over "residential" hotels, but the Board now will assert jurisdiction over all hotels meeting the $500,000 dollar-volume standard, without regard to whether they are residential or nonresidential. (Penn-Keystone Realty Corp., NLRB, 1971, 77 LRRM 1600, overruling to extent inconsistent Floridan Hotel of Tampa, NLRB, 1959, 44 LRRM 1345)

Job Corps Centers—The Board has declined to assert jurisdiction over an employer that operates two Jobs Corps Centers under contracts with the U.S. Department of Labor. (Teledyne Economic Dev. Co., NLRB 1976, 92 LRRM 1012)

Newspapers—$200,000 gross volume. The standard is applicable to newspaper companies which hold membership in or subscribe to interstate news services, or publish nationally syndicated features, or advertise nationally sold products. (Belleville Employing Printers, 1958, 43 LRRM 1125)

Office buildings—Gross revenue of $100,000 of which $25,000 or more is derived from organizations that meet any of the other standards. (Mistletoe Operating Co., NLRB, 1959, 43 LRRM 1333)

Oil pipe line—The NLRB decided that an oil pipe line company, operating within a single state, was a link in the chain of interstate commerce and hence subject to the Board's jurisdiction. (Eureka Pipe Line Co., NLRB, 1956, 37 LRRM 1226)

Public utilities—$250,000 gross volume or $50,000 outflow or inflow, direct or indirect. (Sioux Valley Empire Electric Assn., 1958, 43 LRRM 1061) (This standard applies to retail power, gas, and water companies. It also applies to rural electric cooperatives, Clay Elec. Coop., Inc., 1955, 35 LRRM 1429. Wholesale utilities are subject to the general nonretail standards; Central Elec. Power Coop., 1955, 36 LRRM 1403.)

Restaurants—The retail standards (see above) apply to restaurants. (Bickford's Inc., NLRB, 1954, 35 LRRM 1341)

Shopping centers—In 1961, the Board decided to extend the standard for office buildings (see above) to the owners and operators of shopping centers. (Carol Management Corp., 48 LRRM 1782)

Symphony orchestras—The NLRB will assert jurisdiction over any symphony orchestra which has a gross annual revenue of not less than $1 million from all sources, excluding only contributions which, because of limitation by the grantor, are not available for use for operating expenses. (Jurisdictional Rule, 1973, 82 LRRM 1519, NLRB Rules and Regulations, § 103.2, LRX 4141)

Taxicab companies—The retail standard (see above) is applied to cab companies. (Red & White Airway Cab Co., NLRB, 1959, 43 LRRM 1062)

Transit companies—The NLRB will assert jurisdiction over all transit systems, including local public transit companies, which do a gross volume of business of at least $250,000 per year. (Charleston Transit Co., NLRB, 1959, 44 LRRM 1123)

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I have been very interested in this activity this morning; and the only regret I have is that this amendment does not do anything but maintain the status quo. Certainly, nobody should be deceived by that.

Frankly, I feel a little bad that in the zeal of the proponents of this amendment to be fair to small business, they did not accept the Office of Advocacy recommendation that businesses with less than 50 employees be exempt from this awful bill.

Second, I might add that the zealous desire to maintain the present state of the law, which this amendment would do—it would do nothing more, incidentally—would be better put in maintaining the present state of the law by doing away with this bill; because this bill still is just as detrimental to small business, if this amendment is adopted, as it was last week, without this amendment being offered.

This zealous desire to maintain the present state of the law does not do away with the offensive aspects of the bill, which, according to the only economic impact analysis done on the bill, will create excessive inflation and aggravate the inflationary spiral in our society, and will hurt the 76 percent to 80 percent of all employees of small business and other businesses who are not either sole proprietors or businesses with two or less employees. The reason is that even with this amendment, we still have in this bill the quickie election procedures which are unfair to the employers and certainly unfair to the employees, who will not have enough time to understand the issues involved.

Under the equal access provisions, if the employer talks to his employees about unionization, on his premises, on his time, at his expense, in the exercise of his rights of free speech, he still will have to open his premises, at his time and his expense, and allow union organizers to come in and preach to his employees—something which I do not feel is justified across the board under the present state of the law. In the zeal to maintain the present state of the law, one would think they would be interested in that.

This bill also continues to maintain the packed Board, the whole array of punitive measures, all of which are detrimental to small businesses and 80 percent of the employees in this country today. So nobody should be deceived by this ploy. All I can say is that it is a good try.

With respect to the ombudsman, it might be unnecessary, in that each regional office of the Board appoints current employees on a daily basis who act as "officers of the day" and who perform the same kind of informational services to the public which an ombudsman would perform. These employees meet with the public, answer mail, provide Government forms if necessary, provide advice on how to fill them out, and so forth.

The ombudsman, it seems to me, may mean adding employees to the Board, thereby increasing the bureaucracy of the Government. This would add to the already $28 million, plus $2 million for the two additional Board members, plus $3 million for the additional attorneys that this bill presently calls for, plus the $12 million that the President has said he would add on top of all that—or better than a 51 percent gain in 1 year over last year's budget. It hardly seems that we are trying to balance the budget or curtail the bureaucracy.

Also, the Board, in Washington, has a rather substantial Division of Information which already performs services in the nature of an ombudsman for the entire Nation.

I think that is all the comment these two amendments deserve. I am not saying whether I will agree or not agree to these amendments, or whether anybody else will agree or not agree, because the amendments do not do much and do not change anything. As a matter of fact, all they do is create even more bureaucracy. So much for this ploy today.

I will now go into something that is more important and gets us back to the real debate at hand.

This morning, in the Washington Post—and I commend the Post for a number of articles it has published recently on this matter—is an article with the caption "Under Court Order, Union Organizers Enter Stevens Plants for First Time." It is written by Ed McConville, from Durham, N.C., and it reads as follows:

Union organizers entered J. P. Stevens and Co. textile plants for the first time yesterday, under terms of a federal court order.

Union spokesmen said Stevens' management officials showed them "civility, not hostility," and that workers were unafraid to greet organizers openly.

Stevens, the country's second-largest textile manufacturer, has been found guilty by the National Labor Relations Board of illegally firing at least 285 workers for union activity, and of numerous other unfair labor practices, in its 15-year struggle to repel organized labor from its 80-odd plants.

"They didn't seem to have any fear," said veteran organizer Louis Washington, who walked into Stevens' White Horse No. 1 Plant in Greenville, S.C., as part of a one-day "experiment" to see if the court order would be complied with.

"Four or five [workers] came right up to me, just hauled off and shook my hand and said, 'It's wonderful that you're here. Maybe we'll get somewhere now,' " he said.

The organizer said 14 workers asked for union buttons and put them on in sight of their supervisors and that one worker actually signed a union authorization card.

In past years concern about firings and other harassment had been so great during organizing campaigns at Stevens that workers did not want to be seen accepting union leaflets from organizers at plant gates.

One provision of the court order required the textile firm to post public notices in the plants that there would be no further company reprisals for union activity.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals in New York found Stevens in contempt of court last August for continuing to flout the National Labor Relations Act. The U.S. Supreme Court refused to hear a company appeal of the appeals court ruling in January, setting the stage for the organizers' entrance into the plants yesterday.

Ordinarily union organizers have no legal right to bring their message to employes inside a factory. But as part of its "remedies" to compensate for the effects of past unfair labor practices by the company, the court ordered Stevens to allow organizers to speak to workers in "nonworking areas" of the plants on "nonwork time."

Nonworking areas include cafeterias and smoking areas.

In addition to the Greenville plants, organizers of the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union went into Stevens' mills in Great Falls, S.C., and Wagrim and Aberdeen, N.C., for two-hour periods yesterday. Two organizers entered each plant.

Further visits are expected at these and other Stevens plants in the future.

The companion column to that, right immediate to the left of that column, is entitled "NLRB Aides Rap Textile Union on Stevens Accord." And it says:

The Chairman and general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board have accused the textile workers union of "unwarranted and irresponsible" criticism of the NLRB's recent out-of-court settlement of a suit against J. P. Stevens & Co.

Last week AFL–CIO President George Meany and top officials of the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union criticized the NLRB for reaching an agreement under which the board would drop its petition for an injunction against Stevens in exchange for a promise by the firm not to violate labor laws.

In a letter to Amalgamated officers, NLRB Chairman John H. Fanning and General Counsel John S. Irving said the agreement would provide "virtually the same" relief as the injunction without the delay of litigation, including reinstatement of 11 discharged employes. "Finally," they said, "we note that your representatives participated in the negotiation of the settlement."

The reason that is interesting is that this matter has been resolved under the present law. We do not need this new supposed bill which, in the words of small business leaders all over this country, will crush small business, will be devastating to small business, not only in their words, but in the words of Dr. Pierre Renfret, the noted economist, the Small Business Administration through the Office of Advocacy Report, and a number of other entities and organizations which have agreed that this bill is going to be devastating to small business and, I might add, it will be, even though this ploy has been attempted here today.

I happen to have a copy of the letter from Mr. John S. Irving, the General Counsel, and Mr. John H. Fanning, the Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board. It is dated May 24, 1978, and it is directed to Mr. Jacob Sheinkman, secretary-treasurer, and Mr. William DuChessi, executive vice president of the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union of the AFL–CIO at 15 Union Square, New York, N.Y. 10003. This is what they have to say:

GENTLEMEN: We were surprised and deeply disturbed by the tenor of your somewhat belated public denouncement of the Board's recent settlement of the preliminary injunction proceedings it initiated against J. P. Stevens & Co. While we regret being impelled into a public dispute regarding our litigation strategy and policy determinations, we feel constrained to reply to the serious charges directed against the Board in your press statement of May 17, 1978. Specifically, we consider your accusation that the Board has "chosen to abrogate its duty to effectively enforce the [National Labor Relations] Act" to be wholly unwarranted and irresponsible.

Incidentally, this letter is not coming from someone who believes just in business. This letter is coming from the Chairman of the National Labor Relations Board who characteristically is always on the side of labor.

So that makes it even more significant, this chastisement that he is giving to the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union of the AFL–CIO.

They go on to say:

In essence, you complain that the settlement agreement does not finally resolve the several unfair labor practice complaints currently outstanding against Stevens and that the settlement agreement will not "undo overnight" the effects of this conduct or of prior adjudication conduct.

The most fundamental and egregious flaw in your attack is that it is based on a premise that you know to be incorrect, namely, that the injunction proceeding itself was intended to be the sole means of remedying such violations as have occurred. While others not so intimately familiar with the injunction proceedings and the ensuing settlement negotiations may have been misled as to their true character, you well know that the injunction proceeding itself was never designed to, nor could it, finally resolve the outstanding unfair labor practice complaints or "undo overnight" the cumulative effects of Stevens' prior unfair labor practices. As you are fully aware, the law is well established that the injunction provisions of the Act, by their terms, permit the Board to seek only temporary, interim relief from charged unfair labor practices, and that the charges may be finally resolved and fully remedied only after full litigation before the Board. Thus, even had we rejected settlement of the matter and successfully prosecuted the injunction petition in the Federal district court, any injunction order granted by the court would have provided virtually the same affirmative relief as was obtained through the settlement agreement, but only after substantial delay attributable to prolonged litigation. We believe that this immediate relief was important to the eleven employees who were reinstated and to the many other employees to whom disciplinary action is being revoked. With respect to ultimate relief, you know that the General Counsel is continuing vigorously to prosecute the unfair labor practice charges before the Board and to seek full and final relief from any violation found.

Moreover, as you noted in your press statement, there are outstanding court decrees and contempt orders covering all of Stevens' plants in North and South Carolina. Indeed, as you know, this Agency recently secured a very strong contempt order covering those plants—a victory by the Agency that was widely hailed by the Union. And, you fully understood that because Stevens was already under judicial restraint at its North and South Carolina plants, those plants were excluded from the scope of the petition. Accordingly, the injunction we sought did not contemplate even a temporary remedy for unfair labor practices occurring at those plants.

To be sure, an injunctive order directing Stevens to cease and desist from committing further unfair labor practices at its facilities covered by the injunction petition would have placed Stevens under the supervision of the court and subjected it to contempt liability for violations of that order. However, as you yourselves observed in your statement, the settlement stipulation specifically provides that if Stevens breaches its obligations under the agreement or engages in further violations of the Act, the Board may renew its petition for a temporary injunction. And, as you also remarked, in such proceedings Stevens has agreed not to dispute that there is reasonable cause to believe the charges enumerated in the original petition are true. Thus, if further proceedings become necessary, the Board will be relieved from the evidentiary burden of proving that reasonable cause exists to believe that Stevens was engaging in widespread violations of the Act. The threat of protracted litigation in any such future proceedings is thereby minimized, while the prospects of obtaining prompt injunctive relief are immeasurably enhanced.

Furthermore, your press statement failed to mention that Stevens has presented at least some of the "concrete evidence of reform" you desire, and that this evidence was an important element in the Agency's decision to accept the settlement. Thus, Stevens has instituted a company-wide educational program for its supervisory and managerial personnel regarding the rights of its employees under the Act, and has issued directives to those personnel not to unlawfully interfere with its employees' rights. In addition, Stevens has adopted a program of progressive discipline for its managers and supervisors who disregard those directives. While the effectiveness of those programs has not yet been finally demonstrated, it is our view that they should at least be given an opportunity to prove their efficacy. And, as already observed, if the programs are not successful in terminating the unlawful conduct at Stevens' facilities, the Board may return to the district court and renew its request for injunctive relief. Thus, we agree with you that "only time will tell" whether Stevens complies with the agreement and we will be closely monitoring compliance with its terms.

In sum, the settlement agreement has achieved immediate remedial actions by Stevens for the charged unfair labor practices underlying the injunction petition and, in our view, provides reasonable assurances that Stevens' employees will be free to exercise their statutorily protected rights without fear of unlawful reprisals. Accordingly, it was the judgment of the Board and the General Counsel that the settlement of the injunction proceeding on the terms incorporated in the stipulation provided an effective resolution of the injunction proceeding. Significantly, in the Monday, May 1, 1978 issue of the Wall Street Journal, a spokesman of your Union was quoted as characterizing the settlement as a "win" for the Union. Although noting that the spokesman expressed disappointment that the settlement did not have the force and effect of an injunction, the article attributes to him an acknowledgement that the settlement "possibly was a major change of attitude on the part of the company." Similarly, a New York Times article dated April 29, 1978 indicated that the Union hailed the agreement as a victory. Neither does the May 6, 1978 edition of the AFL–CIO News, recounting the settlement, reflect dissatisfaction with it. Finally, we note that your representatives participated in the negotiation of the settlement.

While you are cerainly entitled now to disagree with our judgment, there is absolutely no justification for your action in highly publicizing a completely unfounded charge that the Board evaded its statutory duty to enforce effectively the policies and remedial purpose of the Act. Whatever the motivation for your attack, it does a profound disservice to the Agency and to the public.

This letter has especially profound effect because it comes from one of the most partisan members who has ever sat on the National Labor Relations Board, who is known as a representative, in fact, of organized labor, and who has consistently ruled in organized labor's favor. I think that the dressing down he has given to the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union is a very, very important step, and I commend him for it.

Let me just say this: I think it also shows that regardless of what we do here on this floor the big labor union leaders in New York and Washington will never be satisfied until they have basically total control over the work force of this economy.

I might also add that the Irving-Fanning letter is evidence that the NLRB consent order involving the J. P. Stevens nationwide injunction case is eminently fair and remedial in all respects relative to the alleged violations of law. Yet the unions involved, although they participated in the settlement discussions, in the negotiations, without objection, have shown their insatiable demands and their unreasonable approaches to the board's remedial processes.

I think it also shows that the union leaders are exercising their venom against the J. P. Stevens Co. and will not be satisfied with the Board's effort because they know that action undermines their argument for this particular bill, S. 2467 or H.R. 8410.

As a matter of fact, what really is significant here is that there is an insatiable demand—that is what this bill is, an insatiable demand—to tilt the scales which have been reasonably balanced, albeit tilted in favor of labor, and I am not so sure that that is wrong—they want to tilt the scales completely in favor of labor and, I might add, to the detriment especially and specifically of the small businesses of this country, and at least 76 to 80 percent of all employees of this country.

I might mention that this bill basically goes far beyond even what J. P. Stevens has had to undergo in prostrating itself, on its knees, in front of the whole world and, specifically, the whole country, in compliance with not only a nationwide injunction procedure pursuant to the present law, but to a stipulated settlement pursuant to the present law, which should solve any difficulties that formerly have taken place.

I think it is pretty important for us to stop and think about what we are talking about here. We are talking about a bill that is devastating to small business, harmful to small business, very inflationary, and which has punitive remedies that have never been called for in light of the fact that punitive remedies have been utilized under present law against J. P. Stevens and, I might add, others, and this bill, in the final analysis, does not do anything to curtail some of the labor abuses, a few of which I have been discussing in the last few days.

A noted small business economist today predicted a sharp rise in food prices if Congress enacts a bill to make it easier for labor unions to organize.

The comment came from Herman Director, Chief Economist of the National Small Business Association.

Pending in the Senate is S. 2467, the labor law "reform" bill of 1977, to assist unions in their organizing efforts. Most small businesses oppose the bill.

Director pointed out that 9 million workers are tied to the consumer price index:

According to the Department of Agriculture with every 10 percent in increase in wages in food processing there is a 3 percent increase in food prices.

He said wage agreements already negotiated this year are sharply higher than a year ago boosting wage costs for business and industry.

The whopping 31 percent—

I think that should be changed to 39 percent—increase for the coal miners means other unions will come to the bargaining table this year, and next, determined to win highest possible increases in wages and benefits. This means still higher wage costs with a result of increase in the CPI—and consumers will pay the bill.

Director said the inflationary spiral feeds on itself. According to a recent study:

Each rise of one percentage point in the CPI means the payment of roughly one billion additional dollars in income to workers covered by cost of living escalators.

The CPI also adjusts pensions for 31 million social security beneficiaries, 2.5 million retired military personnel, Federal civil servants, and 20 million individuals getting food stamps.

Director said, 20 percent of spending by Americans is for food. Director said:

Giving unions greater bargaining power will mean a tremendous increase in inflation, particularly in food prices.

Director said other segments of the economy will feel the sharp inflationary impact too, if the new union organizing bill is passed. He mentioned transportation, and the service industries.

He said adoption of the legislation will lead to—

Something pretty tremendous in inflationary wage increases, for unions already organized.

The National Small Business Association and the Small Business Legislative Council earlier sent Congress a petition signed by 350 small business associations representing 13,700,000 employees. The petition urged Senators to reject S. 2467, because it would "result in the failure of many small businesses which cannot afford the heavy financial penalties proposed in the legislation."

In March, the Department of Agriculture reported on developments in food marketing in 1977.

It said, direct labor is the largest cost of processing and distributing farm foods, with 1977 labor costs totaling $58 billion, or 47 percent of the total marketing bill. This does not include costs of labor in transportation or in manufacturing and distributing supplies used by marketing firms.

In 1977, labor costs rose 7 percent, continuing a long-term upward trend. In 1977, labor costs were the largest single component of expenditures for farm foods, accounting for nearly a third of the retail value. Labor also exceeded the farm value for the first time.

I might add, the people who are going to be hurt are the laboring people of our society, whether they belong to unions or whether they do not, they are going to be hurt by this bill and its inflationary impact on our society. That is why 51 percent of the labor union members in our society do not want any more power given to the labor union leaders in Washington.

Today in the Wall Street Journal, May 26, 1978, on the front page is a very, very fine article entitled "No Picnic Ahead."

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this Wall Street Journal article be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NO PICNIC AHEAD: FOOD-PRICE SURGE IN '78 NOW IS SEEN TOPPING CARTER 6%–8% FORECAST; SOME PRIVATE PREDICTIONS GO AS HIGH AS 10%; MOVES TO HELP FARMERS BLAMED; ARE PRICE CONTROLS COMING?

(By Paul Ingrassia)

Food-price inflation is shaping up as a far more serious problem than the Carter administration seems to have realized—or at least has publicly admitted. Moreover, some of the government's own actions are pushing up food prices rapidly.

The chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, Charles Schultze, has said repeatedly that the forces raising food prices are "transitory" and that "the overall rate of food-price increase should subside after a month or so." President Carter himself repeated that theme at a news conference in Chicago yesterday, saying that the overall 9.3% annual inflation rate in the first quarter was "a temporary aberration brought about primarily by high food costs due to bad weather."

The Agriculture Department is estimating food-price inflation for all this year at 6% to 8% even though prices in the first quarter soared to a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 16.4%. (The April consumer price index figures are due out next Wednesday.)

Forecasts of food prices by many private economists, however, start at the high end of the Agriculture Department's range and go up from there.

Mr. Schultze has argued that "severe winter weather" is the main culprit for food inflation so far. The sole long-term problem that he has cited is the drop in the nation's cattle herd; that decline already has increased beef prices 25% to 30% from a year ago. Agriculture Department officials, for their part, note that food prices jumped at a 14.6% annual rate in the first quarter of 1977, but then slowed enough so that for all last year they averaged only 6.3% ahead of 1976.

OTHER FACTORS CITED

But the problem goes beyond cows and cold weather, food-industry economists and officials say. They cite a number of government steps to raise crop prices for farmers. And they note increases in the costs of transportation, packaging and labor, due in part to the federal minimum-wage boost last January.

Pillsbury Co.'s economists forecast a 9.2% increase in food prices this year. Chase Econometric Research Associates, a unit of Chase Manhattan Corp., says 8.5%, and possibly more. Economists at Quaker Oats Co. see an 8% to 10% rise. And Darrell M. Runke, presi- of International Multifoods Corp., says "8% to 9% is very realistic, and may be conservative."

At Pillsbury, Richard Crowder, the top economist, explains: "There are fundamental differences between this year and last year, and they go beyond meat prices. Food-price inflation is much broader than is generally thought."

Indeed, wheat, flour, butter, sugar, steers, hogs and broiler chickens all are bringing higher prices in commodities markets than a year ago. And higher U.S. farm prices, the Agriculture Department says, will provide only half of this year's food-price inflation, with 40% coming from higher processing and distribution costs and the other 10% from price increases on imported foods.

LOW-PRICE YEARS

Howard Hjort, the department's top economist, says the farm price increases are needed to make up for the low prices of the past few years. He notes that for the second consecutive year the cost of labor needed to process and sell food will exceed the total cost of food at the farm level. However, some observers already are speculating about a consumer revolt and government price controls.

"We'll see housewives striking instead of farmers," predicts Edwin A. Jaenke, an agribusiness consultant and former governor of the Farm Credit Administration. "The headlines about agriculture will do a complete flip-flop in the next nine months." And as for price controls, "I wouldn't be surprised to see them this summer," says Samuel D. Addoms, president of Monfort of Colorado Inc., a meat packer. "The Republicans tried controls once, and the Democrats probably will, too."

Other observers disagree. They say that consumers are too attuned to inflation to "strike" and that the Carter administration is serious about its disavowal of wage and price controls. Even so, rapid food-price inflation would leave consumers with less money to spend on other goods and services and could undermine President Carter's new anti-inflation drive.

FEDERAL PROGRAMS

Some parts of the problem—higher beef prices, for instance—stem simply from supply-and-demand factors, and the President can't do much about them. Ironically, though, the administration's own actions have helped push wheat and feed-grain prices higher recently. The first federal production-cutting program since 1972 is swinging into effect, and a newly established grain-reserve program is helping farmers keep grain off the market to bolster prices.

Unlike earlier programs, the new cropland set-aside plan doesn't directly pay farmers not to plant (although it can work that way in some cases). Instead, farmers choosing to set aside a certain portion of the land they normally plant (20 percent for wheat and 10 percent for corn and other animal-feed grains) become eligible for federal price support loans, target-price payments and other benefits. Newly increased benefits and poor planting weather have eroded some of the farmers' early resistance to the program.

The set-aside plan is a response to the huge crop supplies that sent farm prices plunging and drew farmers to protest parades last year. But some observers say the surpluses aren't likely to be as big as expected.

"If crop problems develop around the world—and we have some in this country already with the wet spring—our stocks could disappear very quickly," says Phillip F. Sisson, economist with Quaker Oats. "The risks are fairly high, and that's why prices are rising in the commodities markets."

The wheat situation is a prime example. Current U.S. stocks are the largest since the early 1960s, but the dollar's drop against some key currencies and poor weather elsewhere have made export demand unexpectedly strong. Agriculture Department figures show that a poor crop year could cut U.S. stocks by next May to below their 1972 levels. Back in 1972, crop shortages around the world sent demand for U.S. wheat soaring and helped drive U.S. food prices skyhigh.

It's too early to gauge accurately the size of the winter-wheat crop that will be harvested in June or the spring wheat crop currently being planted for harvest in August. But the Agriculture Department recently estimated the winter-wheat harvest will be down 16 percent from a year ago, a greater decline than had been expected. And heavy rains in the nation's breadbasket have put spring wheat planting behind schedule; the delay could reduce the August harvest.

Agriculture Department officials profess to be unworried about the grain stocks outlook, though. The department's forecast of wheat exports "looks on the money," Mr. Hjort says. "There isn't any reason to change the set-aside policy in view of foreign demand."

Milk is another story, but one that isn't very different. Surpluses are large; on April 30, government stocks of nonfat dry milk uncommitted for use in any government program totaled 551.1 million pounds, one of the highest levels on record. Yet milk and dairy-product prices are rising because the government boosted its price supports to dairy farmers about 5 percent on April 1.

CHANGE IN THE LAW

Before last year, that increase mightn't have occurred, because the Secretary of Agriculture was required to review and adjust the milk price support only once a year. But the 1977 Agriculture Act installed twice-yearly price-support reviews, in April and October (the October review is expected to produce another increase in the 3% range). The 1977 law also restricted, until next April, the Agriculture Secretary's leeway to hold down price supports.

With sugar, too, government action is sending prices higher despite ample supplies. World sugar stocks at the end of 1977 were one-third of total world consumption for the year, the highest percentage in a decade.

But last fall, following the just-passed Agriculture Act, President Carter reinstalled sugar price-support loans for the first time in three years, and he raised duties on imported sugar. Now the Agriculture Department is about to increase the price-support for U.S.-produced sugar, because under last year's law the support rises as prices in general increase.

Recently, however, the administration opposed pending legislation to increase the sugar price support even higher than otherwise is likely. "That was a sign that the administration is beginning to take food-price inflation seriously," Pillsbury's Mr. Crowder says.

BEEF QUOTAS WATCHED

Another such sign, some observers say, would be given if President Carter removed the quotas on imported beef. The President already decided not to include that step in his anti-inflation package, but as beef prices continue to rise he might change his mind.

And they will continue to rise. The U.S. cattle herd has dropped 12% to 116 million head since 1975, when prices turned disastrously low for ranchers. Next January, the head count will be down to about 112 million, because ranchers now are avidly selling animals to pocket their first solid profits in three years.

Hamburger, which sold for 85 cents a pound last year, now costs about $1.07 a pound, and probably will rise to the $1.20 to $1.25 range a year from now, says economist Tommy Beale of Cattle-Fax, the marketing service of the National Cattlemen's Association. That group's recent supermarket survey also found choice beef cuts selling for an average of $1.78 a pound, up from $1.35 a pound last year, and Mr. Beale predicts about $2.10 a pound next year. "But the real bad years for consumers will be 1980 through 1983," he adds.

That's because cattlemen, encouraged by higher prices, will start rebuilding their herds by keeping more cows and heifers for breeding stock. Otherwise, those animals would go to market and add to the beef supply. The squeeze on hamburger supplies will be especially tight, because that's what old cows are used for. Some packers say that chuck cuts are likely to be used for hamburger and that chuck roasts may become extremely scarce.

PORK OUTPUT LAGGING

Aggravating the beef squeeze is the unexpected lag in pork production. Output dropped slightly in the first quarter from a year earlier, and the Agriculture Department now expects total 1978 production to barely top last year's 13.1 billion pounds.

Pork production can be stepped up far faster than beef output because each year sows can produce two litters of some half-a-dozen pigs each, while a cow can have only one calf a year. But farmers surveyed by the Agriculture Department in March projected an actual reduction in the number of pigs to be kept for breeding stock this spring.

That doesn't augur well for the department's June pig-production report, which some experts see as critical because higher pork supplies could help fill the gap being left by beef. "Food-price inflation could hit 9% if the hog numbers aren't good," says economist Ray Daniel of Chase Econometric.

Broiler chicken production, at least, is up. In the first quarter it was 8% ahead of a year ago, and it's expected to be up 6% in the second quarter. However, more chickens alone don't guarantee price relief, because demand is likely to rise as consumers seek alternatives to costly beef and pork.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, in conclusion of my remarks this morning—and I ask unanimous consent that this not be considered a second speech, in accordance with the rules of the Senate——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATCH. In conclusion of my remarks, I would just like to say that when a noted economist like Pierre Rinfret, who has been acceptable to Presidents on both sides from President Kennedy's time right on down to today, has conducted what appears to be a very thorough economic impact analysis, and concludes that with every 10 percent rise in unionization there is a 5 percent rise in the consumer price index and a 3 percent rise in inflation, and coupling that with a 7 percent admitted inflationary trend that they cannot go below, according to the President of the United States, this means we are going to be in double-digit inflation as a result of this bill.

This is only one push toward that end. If you add all the other pushes along with this one, it means this bill has to be defeated, not only because it is detrimental to small business, but because it is detrimental to everybody in America, specifically the employees, and I might add the union men and women of America as much as anybody; and I believe that a lot of them are starting to realize this. Most of them already do realize it, and I think if they listen to the debate and read about it, hopefully, in the media, and consider it, I think they will realize what a power grab this is, rather than a reasonable attempt to decide and resolve certain conflicts in the law.

If it was reasonable, we would be resolving them on both sides, and we would be resolving the real conflicts, not the imaginary ones this bill raises.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, my remarks shall be directed to the thrust of the bill itself, rather than to the pending amendment.

Mr. President, H.R. 8410 transforms the National Labor Relations Act from a remedial to a punitive statute.

First, the bill would subject any employer found by the Board to have willfully violated a Board or court order to debarment from all Federal contracts for a period of 3 years. Second, the bill provides that employers who unlawfully refuse to bargain during initial contract negotiations will be subject to a make-whole remedy measured by Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) figures relating to collective-bargaining settlements in units with 5,000 or more employees. Finally, H.R. 8410 provides that employees who are unable to work as a result of unfair labor practices occurring during certain specified periods of time may receive an award of back pay in an amount equal to "one and one-half the employee's wage rate—less the wages the employee has earned" during the back-pay period. The extraordinary relief is available during periods when the employees are: First, seeking to certify a union, second, seeking to decertify a union, third, seeking to rescind a union security agreement, and fourth, prior to execution of an initial collective-bargaining agreement.

These punitive remedies defy the original intent of the Congress to restrict the NLRB's power to undoing the effect of the unfair labor practices committed. The U.S. Supreme Court first defined the limits of the Board's remedial jurisdiction in 1938, stating:

> The power to command affirmative action is remedial, not punitive, and is to be exercised in aid of the Board's authority to restrain violations and as a means of removing or avoiding the consequences of a violation where those consequences are of a kind to thwart the purposes of the Act.

Although the application of this formula has undergone minor modifications through the ensuing years, as the circumstances of particular cases have dictated, the general principles stated therein have retained their validity and their applicaiton.

For example, the Supreme Court has often upheld Board decisions which have the legitimate purpose of removing or avoiding the effects of an unfair labor practice. Thus, in 1943, the Court approved remedies purported to restore the status quo as a means of depriving the violator of the advantage gained by the unfair labor practice. And in Phelps Dodge Corp. against NLRB, the Court in 1941 fashioned a remedy directed toward returning the parties to the position which would have existed, but for the illegal conduct, showing that the purpose of the act was to be remedial rather than punitive. This bill would change the whole thrust of the act. Alternatively, the Board's relief may be justified on the grounds that it prevents the consequences of a violation from thwarting the purposes of the act.

But these permitted remedies were not without limit, and in 1940, the Supreme Court held that a Board order, which directed the employer to pay to appropriate governmental agencies an amount of money equal to that which had been earned by discriminatorily discharged employees on work relief projects and to credit that amount of money to a backpay award, was an order beyond the Board's remedial authority. Such payments, the Court claimed, had neither the effect of making employees whole nor of assuring them of their right to bargain collectively. Hence, the remedy served no statutory purpose.

Significantly, in its holding, the Court also rejected the Board's argument that the remedy was permissible since it would have the effect of deterring others from violating the act. Although a remedy may incidentally act as a deterrent, the Court noted that if the NLRB was permitted to impose remedies solely on the basis of acting as a deterrent, the Board would be free to set up any system of penalties which it could deem adequate to that end. The Court's holding reflects the principle that the rational relationship between unlawful conduct and the relief which is granted is not satisfied when the remedy purports to achieve ends other than those contemplated by the statute. Moreover, the remedies which the Board has fashioned have, with few exceptions, proven quite adequate in remedying flagrant, repeated, or widespread unfair labor practices.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to talk for a moment about cease and desist orders. The most common of all NLRB remedial orders is the "cease and desist" order; that is, an order directing a party found to have engaged in an unfair labor practice to cease and desist from the particular conduct which has been found unlawful. Sometimes, the Board goes further and orders the offender also to cease and desist from "any other conduct" violative of rights guaranteed in the act.

In the very early history of the NLRB, the Supreme Court set out the doctrine that the Board must consider the nature and seriousness of the unfair labor practices found, the offender's past history of violations, and the probability of recurrence. These guiding principles, still valid today, are the bases upon which the Board can rely in order to justify its issuance of a broad cease and desist order.

Pursuant to that doctrine, the Board may justify a broad order where the additional violations restrained bear some reasonable resemblance to the violation or violations found. For example, the Court has held that a broad order can be justified where, in addition to one violation of one section of the act, there is evidence of other misconduct violative of another section. In another case, Marshfield Steel Co. against NLRB, decided in 1963 in the 8th Circuit, the employer in the case had challenged an order directing him to cease and desist from discouraging membership in the United Steelworkers of America "or in any other labor organization," on the grounds that the company had not engaged in violations against members of any union other than the Steelworkers. The Court stated that, although the Board could not restrain an employer from committing "other unfair labor practices in which it has not been found to be engaged," the Board could order the employer not to conduct against other labor organizations the same unfair labor practices which it had been found to have been engaged with respect to any labor organization. The Court concluded that the order was fully within the guidelines of past law because the restrained violations bore complete resemblance to those which the employer had already committed.

Furthermore, because many employers have several plants and multistate operations, and unions often operate on a regional or national basis, the Board has often ordered remedial action that extends beyond the immediate units involved in the case. Thus, where it had been shown that the employer had instituted a systemwide, centrally directed and coordinated policy to commit unfair labor practices, the courts have found that the Board may properly include all the employer's plants within an order of the Board.

Moreover, the Board may properly consider that, if not deterred, the employer would pursue the same discriminatory policies at every unit within a certain geographic area. The cases demonstrate that when employers, who have such a coordinated systemwide policy, do commit flagrant unfair labor practices, the courts have not hesitated to find the application of NLRB orders to plants other than those at which the violations actually occurred. When the employer controls several corporations, or one corporation with separate divisions, Board orders applying to more than one division or corporation have also been upheld.

The great importance, Mr. President, of the Board's cease and desist powers cannot be overestimated, considering that the employer may thereafter become the target of contempt of court proceedings for future violations of that order.

Next, Mr. President, I will discuss NLRB remedies which mandate the posting of notices because, in addition to the negative, or cease and desist, provisions of an NLRB order in an unfair labor practice case, the Board's remedy almost always includes an affirmative requirement covering the posting of notices. Compliance usually requires that, for a period of 60 days, the respondent employer or union will post, and maintain in a conspicuous location, a signed notice which sets forth the terms and conditions of the cease and desist order.

Generally, the provisions covering notification simply stipulate that the notice be posted in conspicuous places, such as bulletin boards, time clocks, department entrances, meeting hall entrances, or dues payment windows. If, however, flagrant and gross unfair labor practices are involved, the Board may require extraordinary notification provisions in addition to the normal posting requirements. In an attempt to neutralize the effect of aggravated unfair labor practice conduct, the Board has also ruled that the respondents mail a copy of the notice to each employee. And, in other cases, the Board has also required the employer to make his bulletin board available to the union for a specified period of time. Similarly, the Board has granted the union the time of the company for presentation of its petition to employees. The Board has also ordered individual notices where the unlawful conduct involved individual contact between the employer and the employee.

Finally, where the unlawful conduct involved widespread and flagrant violations of the act, the Board has deemed it necessary on occasion to order that respondent or an agent of the NLRB read the contents of the notice to the employees. In Southern Athletic Co. and the Paymaster Corp., the Board in 1966 even took the particularly unusual step of requiring a specific agent of the employer to sign the notice because that agent was personally identified with the employer's unlawful conduct. The reasoning was that without that agent's signature, the employees might not recognize that the notice contained a bona fide commitment by the employer to refrain from committing similar unfair labor practices in the future.

Now, Mr. President, I also have a few remarks on the effects of existing law on attorneys' fees and litigation expenses.

It is true, Mr. President, that in 1972 in Tiidee Products, Inc., the NLRB did note that litigation expenses normally are not recoverable by the charging party in Board proceedings even though the public interest is served when the charging party protects its private interest before the Board. But, Mr. President, the Tiidee decision further indicated that the Board would order payment of attorneys' fees and litigation expenses when the respondent's defense is "frivolous." The Board stated:

We agree with the court, however, that frivolous litigation such as this is clearly unwarranted and should be kept from the nation's already crowded court dockets, as well as our own. While we do not seek to foreclose access to the Board and courts for meritorious cases, we likewise do not want to encourage frivolous proceedings. The policy of the Act to insure industrial peace through collective bargaining can only be effectuated when speedy access to uncrowded Board and court dockets is available.

I might say parenthetically, Mr. President, I do not believe this bill is going to clear the clogged dockets either of the courts or of the Board.

Accordingly, in order to discourage future frivolous litigation, to effectuate the policies of the Act, and to serve the public interest, we find that it would be just and proper to order Respondent to reimburse the Board and the Union for their expenses incurred in the investigation, preparation, presentation, and conduct of these cases, including the following costs and expenses incurred in both the Board and court proceedings: reasonable counsel fees, salaries, witness fees, transcript and record costs, printing costs, travel expenses, and per diem, and other reasonable costs and expenses. Accordingly, we shall order Respondent to pay to the Board and the Union the above-mentioned litigation costs and expenses.

The policy is not generally to order the payment of these expenses, but since this was a frivolous action the court did order the respondent, the employer, to pay these necessary expenses.

The Board's policy set forth in Tiidee was approved by the Supreme Court in 1974 in NLRB against Food Store Employees, Local 347 (Heck's Inc.). In language suggestive of the Board's rationale in Tiidee, the Supreme Court explained:

It cannot be gainsaid that the finding here that Heck's asserted at least "debatable" defenses to the unfair labor pratcice charges, whereas objections to the representation election in Tiidee were "patently frivolous", might have been viewed by the Board as putting the question of remedy in a different light. We cannot say that the Board in performing its appointed function of balance conflicting interests, could not reasonably decide that where "debatable" defenses are asserted, the public and private interests in affording the employer a determination of his "debatable" defenses, unfettered by the prospect of bearing his adversary's litigation costs, outweigh the public interest in uncrowded dockets.

(Mr. MORGAN assumed the chair.)

Mr. ALLEN. After the Heck's decisions, the District of Columbia Circuit reviewed the Board's Tiidee decisions in 1974 in Electrical Workers (IUE) against NLRB. Although it found that the Board had properly ordered the employer to reimburse the union for attorneys' fees and litigation expenses, it found that the NLRB had erred by ordering the employer to reimburse the Board for such expenses. The court noted that such remedies were inappropriate, because the employer was a "stranger" to the processes of the Board and because the scope of the initial court remand limited the Board to considering whether to award legal expenses to the charging party. But the point is, Mr. President, an award of legal fees to a charging party is permissible in the event of a frivolous defense.

Also apparently available to a charging party—and I give these instances to show that machinery is available to the union or to the charging party—is an award of reimbursement for lost union organizing expenses, dues, and initiation fees. When union organizing campaigns have been subject to employer unfair labor practices, the Board has on occasion been requested to require the employer to reimburse the union for losses in organizing expenses and dues.

In Heck's, the case to which I referred, the Board held that the union had not established that the respondent's conduct had contributed to the loss of any dues or fees.

Following the Heck's decision, the Board issued its decision in Tiidee Products, Inc. in which it denied a similar request for organizing expenses and lost dues and fees. However, Mr. President, the Board did not state that such a remedy should never be granted, but rather held that there was "no nexus" between the employer's unlawful conduct and the union's preelection organizing expenses. On remand of its original decision in Heck's, the NLRB did not deal directly with the merits of the union's claim for organizational expenses. Rather, it determined, as it did with the union's request for legal expenses, that the employer's defenses were debatable rather than frivolous. Thus, apparently, where the employer has a frivolous defense, organizing expenses may be ordered if the union can show a nexus between the employer's illegal conduct and an increase in the union's organizing expenses.

Now, Mr. President, what other remedies are available once a court enforces a Board order pursuant to section 10 (e) of the NLRB. First and foremost, the employer may be subject to contempt of court proceedings. This makes available powerful sanctions beyond the purely remedial power of the Board.

It is well established that the courts should impose whatever sanctions are necessary under the circumstances to grant full remedial relief, to coerce the contemnor into compliance with the court's order, and to compensate fully the complainant for losses sustained. Thus, in NLRB-related civil contempt proceedings, the courts will routinely order respondents to pay the Board all fees, costs, and expenditures incurred during the contempt proceedings. These include counsel fees incurred in investigation, preparation, presentation, and final disposition of the contempt case. Further, in order to assure that the respondent complies with the terms of the decree, the courts consistently order a fine for each further violation plus a fine for each day violation continues.

When the employer has refused to bargain in good faith with the union, the employer can be required to pay a fine which is to be returned if the employer can present, usually within 60 days, satisfactory evidence of compliance with a particular court order.

In contempt proceedings involving employer refusals to bargain, the fifth circuit—my own Federal circuit court of appeals—the fifth circuit has devised remedies which surpass those employed by the Board in similar violations. In NLRB against Schill Steel Products, Inc., a fifth circuit case decided in 1973, the employer was ordered to bargain until full agreement or bona fide impasse was reached. The existence of such impasse was to be decided by the court, and the failure to find such an impasse was to be considered a failure to bargain in good faith. Such a failure would subject the employer to compliance fines of $5,000 for the violation, plus a fine of $1,000 for each day the violation continued. That is a not inconsiderable fine. In addition, the employer was not permitted to refuse to meet with the union at reasonable times, or to withdraw recognition from the union until further order of the court. Also, unless the union gave written permission otherwise, bargaining sessions were to be held at least 15 hour per week. Sworn reports signed both by the employer and union were to be filed with the court clerk and the Board every 30 days detailing the nature and course of the bargaining. If the Board determined that the employer was not bargaining in good faith, it was required to submit a report and supporting brief to the court and propose appropriate sanctions. If the company was found to have engaged in bad faith bargaining, the compliance fines mentioned above would then be imposed.

Other cases astoundingly suggest even further alternatives available to the court in dealing with the persistently recalcitrant violator. The court may issue a writ of body attachment under which the appropriate officer or agent of the offending respondent will be confined to jail until compliance with the court's decree is forthcoming.

That is under the present law, Mr. President. It seems to give plenty of machinery for enforcing the act.

Finally, if it can be shown that the respondent "knowingly, willfully, and intentionally" violated the court's decree, the Board may petition the court to find the respondent criminally liable for his conduct. Sentences for criminal contempt include monetary fines and imprisonment.

As shown, contempt of court proceedings provide powerful sanctions to use when employer and unions violate Board orders which have been enforced by the courts of appeals. I do not see the need for additional sanctions.

Now, Mr. President, throughout my remarks, one basic legal principle has constantly recurred: The NLRB has been granted broad authority by Congress to fashion unfair labor practice remedies in order to effectuate the policies of the National Labor Relations Act. This power is subject to the stipulation that its use be restricted to undoing the effects of unfair labor practices found to have been committed. Stated in another and perhaps more conclusionary fashion, Board orders must be remedial and not punitive or confiscatory.

For the most part, the remedies utilized by the Board are accepted by the users of the Board's processes as appropriate manifestations of the Board's remedial powers. For example, bargaining orders, back pay, reinstatement, notice posting, and cease-and-desist orders are all considered to be "traditional" remedies which the Board may apply with flexibility and discretion.

NLRB and judicial decisions have also recognized that respondents who engage in repeated or flagrant violations, or who advance frivolous defenses to unfair labor practice charges, deserve to receive harsher and more imaginative remedies. Thus, the Board has fashioned remedies designed to confront the particular circumstances of the violations found. For example, where a respondent has demonstrated a proclivity to violate the act, and where it can be anticipated that further violations will occur, the Board will issue a broad order which typically requires that the act not be violated "in any other manner." Also, special notice provisions may be ordered to inform the employees that an unfair labor practice has been found and is being remedied. The respondent may be required to mail the notice to the employees, give the union access to company bulletin boards, or read the notice aloud to the employees. Where a flagrant unfair labor practice is unaccompanied by a debatable defense, the respondent may be ordered to pay attorneys' fees and litigation expenses.

The act also provides the NLRB with authority to seek injunctions to prevent the continuance of unfair labor practices where it can be shown that such relief is "just and proper." If such an injunction issues, the unfair labor practice will be restrained until the Board issues a final order which will then contain the appropriate NLRB remedy. Under section 10(l) of the act, the General Counsel is required to seek an injunction from a U.S. district court against certain specified union unfair labor practices. Injunctions against other unfair labor practices are covered by section 10(j). While the injunction is in effect, a breach of the injunction will subject the defendant to powerful contempt of court sanctions.

Other contempt sanctions are available for use against a respondent who violates a Board order which has been enforced by the appellate courts. The NLRB order has then become the order of the court and as was stated by the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in 1963 in NLRB against Vander Wal, a refusal to comply with the NLRB order, or the commission of a similar future violation, will subject the contemnor to "whatever sanctions are necessary under the circumstances to grant full remedial relief, to coerce the contemnor into compliance with the court's order, and to fully compensate the complainant for losses sustained." These sanctions in almost all NLRA civil contempt cases will include payment to the Board of fees, costs, and litigation expenses incurred. Additionally, the court can coerce compliance by fining the contemnor and even placing his responsible officer or agent in jail through a writ of body attachment. Willful violations may be prosecuted by way of criminal contempt, with its attendant penalties of fines and imprisonment.

As shown, harsher remedies presently are available for use against the flagrant or recalcitrant violator. But availbility is not the only touchstone for their utilization. In dealing with requests for these extraordinary remedies, the Board and courts have recognized that when the severe remedy is ordered, they must address questions involving the fundamental fairness of the proceeding. One basic problem is the possibility that harsh remedies and penalties tend to coerce respondents with potentially meritorious claims into settling the case in order to avoid the remedy. In order to minimize this chilling effect on the assertion of possibly valid defenses, the Board and courts have rejected requests for attorneys' fees, litigation costs, union organizing expenses, and "make whole" remedies for refusals to bargain, where the respondent has been able to present a "debatable" or nonfrivolous defense—drawing the distinction between frivolous and debatable defenses.

The potential unfairness of the imposition of harsh penalties in other circumstances becomes even more pronounced when considering that high financial penalties will most affect litigants with small financial resources. A flagrant violator with a sound economic position, however, may be able to pay the price and continue violating the act. If such a violator is undeterred by potential contempt of court compliance fines and jail terms, the possibility of paying double backpay may not deter him either. While valid reasons exist from concern about those respondents who repeatedly commit serious unfair labor practices—and I do not say they do not exist in certain circumstances—those concerns should be balanced by recognizing as the Board and courts have done, that certain proposed remedies in this area are unacceptable, because they may unfairly coerce settlements and hinder a full determination of whether the alleged violation actually occurred.

Cogent arguments have maintained that certainty in the application of remedies and promptness and efficiency in their administration would provide better deterrence than would increasing the severity of the remedies, and I think that goes right to the heart of the bill. Former Board Chairman Edward B. Miller has addressed this problem several times and his views deserve full examination. Miller argued in his work "The NLRB—Hero or Villain? 1970 Labor Relations Yearbook" that—

> The other criticism—that our remedies provide too little, too late—is doubtless sometimes valid. But I think the emphasis is more properly placed on the "too late" rather than the "too little". It is important to remember that the primary purpose of our remedial orders is to bring persons and entities into compliance with our law, in the hope that the compliance will extend to the spirit as well as to the letter of our law.
> It will, for example, accomplish precious little if an employer, at our command, enters upon a bargaining relationship with the union, convinced in his own mind that he is there only under protest and determined only to go through the motions of bargaining because he has been forced to do so. On the other hand, if he goes there, perhaps not liking it, but determined to follow our directives in good faith and to learn to live with his new situation, then there is hope that we have achieved genuine, rather than superficial, compliance.
> Similarly, a union which abandons picketing which we have found to be a prohibited secondary nature but remains determined to find some means, legal or otherwise, to bring improper pressure to bear upon the protected neutral employer, may honor the letter of our law but by subsequent conduct may very well frustrate the law's objective.
> Thus we must always be conscious of the fact that our remedial orders are not designed as penalties, and should not be evaluated in a penal context. They are, rather, part and parcel of an administrative effort to shape viable and continuing relationships among the parties who appear before us and who must often live together long after our file on their case has been sent to the archives.
> The empirical data which is available is not as comprehensive as I would like, but such as there is seems to bear out the wisdom of this caveat. It tends to show that a Respondent, whether union or employer, who is so hostile to the requirements of our law and our processes of implementing it that he will deliberately and repeatedly engage in improper conduct both before and after he has appeared before us is not likely to achieve the kind of industrial stability that our Act envisions, even after having been the target of the full thrust of our remedial powers.

In other words, Mr. Miller is suggesting that a little more give and take on the side of labor and management would accomplish a great deal more than stricter and harsher remedies:

> While it is possible to conclude from this data—and some have—that we therefore need bigger and better monetary remedies, I am more inclined to conclude that we must face up to the fact that big monetary remedies—or penalties—are not really effective in deterring the true recalcitrant in this field.

I might say, parenthetically, that depriving an employer of Federal contracts for a period of 3 years certainly is not going to help that employee; because without work, there cannot be any employment.

I think that those who support this bill and support these penal provisions are thinking less of the employees and more of the union. That is one of my objections to this bill—that there is much more in it for big labor and for inducing employees to join unions than there is for the employees themselves. If a company is deprived of Government contracts, it could well go under, and all the employees would lose their jobs.

I feel that the bill provides a lot more for big labor than it does for the average worker.

I continue with Mr. Miller's comments, and it should be borne in mind that he is the chairman of the National Labor Relations Board:

Our experience has been, however, that when we are able to move with both firmness and dispatch, the results are much more encouraging. . . .

The emphasis, therefore, in my view, should be more heavily placed on prompt and efficient case handling than on belated expanded remedies—

How expanded, by a bill such as this?

The emphasis, therefore, in my view, should be more heavily placed on prompt and efficient case handling than on belated expanded remedies, no matter how imaginative or inventive those remedies might be.

To conclude, Mr. President, I emphasize to the Senate that while there is good reason to be concerned about serious violations of the act—I do not say there is not—and to be concerned about the mounting caseloads of the Board and the courts, we should refrain from embracing hasty solutions which could become the basis of chilling the assertion of rights reasonably held in good faith.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ALLEN). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order, notwithstanding the Pastore rule concerning germaneness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ACTION IN ZAIRE

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, President Carter made an important statement on foreign policy in Chicago yesterday, reviewing the recent events in Africa.

The President's action on Zaire was, as he stated yesterday—and as I stated last week—"an appropriate and measured response to the situation," taken in cooperation with our allies and in consultation with Congress.

The President's comments about the irresponsible role played by the Cubans in training and equipping the forces which crossed into Zaire are right on the mark. It is apparent that Cuba knew of the Katangan plans to invade Zaire, and obviously did nothing to restrain them from crossing the border.

The large-scale Cuban presence, supported by the Soviet Union, remains a matter of major concern. Certainly this involvement may have serious implications for future United States-Soviet relations.

The responsibility for the slaughter in Zaire rests not only with the rebels, not only with Angola—but also with Cuba and the Soviet Union. Policies formulated in Moscow and Havana resulted in the murder of innocent Africans and Europeans in Zaire.

In his Chicago statement, President Carter discussed the matter of legislative restrictions on Presidential authority to assist foreign policy and conduct foreign operations. It is my position that there are no real impediments to Presidential action, particularly in regard to assistance to friendly governments seeking to oppose Communist incursions or attacks.

As President Carter noted, the action in Zaire was taken pursuant to present law and was not restricted by congressional limitations.

In those situations in which friendly governments seek assistance from the United States in resisting Communist attacks from without or within—there is a way out for the President in the existing legislation, the President only needs to certify that U.S. assistance is in our own national security interests and by his making a report to Congress on his actions.

The administration does intend to continue to review legislation governing our foreign assistance programs and I am certain that, if the President determines that his authority to act decisively in international affairs is unduly restricted, Congress would give serious attention to the matter.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may speak briefly, out of order, notwithstanding the rule of germaneness.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I appreciate very much the remarks of the distinguished leader with regard to the policy in Africa, for I had in my hand at the time a clipping from today's Washington Star which I will insert in the RECORD.

Like all Americans, we in the Senate are concerned about Africa. I am concerned about our policy in Africa. I am not sure that we have a policy in Africa. I sometimes find myself frustrated and confused by how we can speak out so vigorously and vehemently against minority rule in South Africa and at the same time fail to speak out against the lack of majority rule or against minority rule in such areas as Equatorial Guinea as well as many others.

Almost every day, we read of massacres taking place in Africa; we read of Cubans participating in various areas. Yet, I think we are confronted with the so-called Clark African policy, which was adopted in the Senate in 1976, when we restricted President Ford and his administration from rendering any kind of financial or military aid, by way of equipment, to the non-Communist factions in Angola.

I disagree with my majority leader when he says there are no legal restrictions in other areas. I think the practicality of the matter is that there are.

I wish that this Senate will carry on a debate on what kind of policy we are going to pursue in Africa. I think we should resist the spread of the kind of tyranny that is being carried on by the Soviets and their proxies, the Cubans.

I think if we cannot do it with a united voice, it might be better not to do it at all.

Mr. President, in today's Washington Star there was a front page article entitled "Equatorial Guinea: Where Brutality Reigns." And it points out that since the country won its independence from Spain in 1968, under the bloody rule of Macias, as the dictator, Equatorial Guinea's postcolonial history has been studded with mass executions and fatal tortures of an estimated 50,000 people. These included vice presidents, governors, cabinet ministers, high court judges, army generals, senior civil servants, leading churchmen, parliamentarians, and women intellectuals.

Mr. President, it has been so brutal that the President of Equatorial Guinea is quoted as having said that "Guinea is poor and bullets are expensive," and, therefore, they club these people to death. But not one single time have I heard anyone who espoused the African doctrine in the Chamber speak out against such brutality. I think it is time that this Senate take a look at the Clark African policy and see if we are pursuing the right policy there.

So, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article that I have alluded to from the Washington Star of today, May 26, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EQUATORIAL GUINEA: WHERE BRUTALITY REIGNS

(By Eric Robins)

NAIROBI, KENYA.—In a world populated by dictators and tyrants, there seem to be few countries today more ripe for revolution than the Maryland-sized Republic of Equatorial Guinea in West Africa.

Equatorial Guinea is composed of two provinces: the island of Macias Nguema Biyogo (formerly called Fernando Po and now named after the country's brutal dictator) plus its sister isles in the Gulf of Guinea and mainland Rio Muni, sandwiched between Cameroon and Gabon. The country won independence from Spain in 1968.

Since then—under the bloody rule of Francisco Macias Nguema Biyogo, a dour, deaf, ex-civil servant, a Catholic and rabid leftist—Equatorial Guinea's post-colonial history has been studded with mass executions and fatal tortures of an estimated 50,000 people. These included vice presidents, governors, cabinet ministers, high court judges, army generals, senior civil servants, leading churchmen, parliamentarians and women intellectuals.

Some two-thirds of the republic's elite have been put to death as suspected—often on the flimsiest evidence, or none at all—opponents of the regime of Nguema, 56-year-old president-for-life and "Grand Master of Education, Science and Culture."

Many have been clubbed to death. "Guinea is poor and bullets are expensive," says the president.

Slavery as ghastly as that practiced on their ancestors is the lot of tens of thousands of Equatorial Guineans who are condemned to work, beaten and half-starved, on the country's run-down cocoa, coffee and timber plantations.

Enjoying the support of Russia, China and Cuba (the United States broke with him in 1976), Nguema has abolished parliament, the courts and general elections, and there is a rigid censorship of the mails and media.

A couple of years ago, 45,000 Nigerian contract workers, mainly Ibo tribesmen, were flown home from the island by their government after sustained allegations of "barbaric" treatment on the plantations.

At about the same time some 30 Equatorial Guinean exiles, armed with hunting guns, made an abortive bid to overthrow Macias by an "invasion" of Rio Muni. They hoped, in vain, to start a full-scale rebellion both on the mainland and in the islands.

Macias reacted with typical ferocity. There was a new wave of wanton killings, repressions and public executions. More than 150 political prisoners were publicly hanged or shot on the president's orders on Christmas Eve in the football stadium of Equatorial Guinea's torrid little capital of Malabo, formerly Santa Isabel. As shots rang out and men and women mounted the gallows, loudspeakers blared a recording of "Those Were the Days."

And there was renewed inter-ethnic group violence involving the comparatively wealthy Bubis on Macias Nguema Biyogo island and the Fangs of Rio Muni, a tribe of which the president is a leading member. The Bubis have long been the main targets of Macias' cruelties.

The paranoid president then decreed that individual murders by his henchmen were not enough to terrorize would-be political enemies. The state police are still regularly carrying out his orders to burn down entire villages (after men, women and children have been herded into their mud-and-thatch huts) where suspected dissidents were born.

And Macias ordered that all boys between the ages of seven and 14 must undergo Cuban-supervised military training for the "Youths Marching with Macias" movement, or their parents and relatives would be shot or imprisoned for life.

He sent all workless persons over 15 into the plantations and phosphate mines. He gave active encouragement to gangs of hoodlums running amok, killing, looting and raping.

A year ago, all adult males—some 4,000—from the island of Annobon, part of Equatorial Guines, were rounded up at gunpoint and taken to Macias Nguema Biyogo island to become slave laborers on their country's cocoa plantations in place of the Nigerian workers who had quit and been taken back home.

Annobon is now virtually a dead isle.

About half of Equatorial Guinea's 400,000 population has fled Macias' reign of terror.

"My country is morally and financially bankrupt," said a former aide of the president now in Gabon. "It is a member of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity, which have human rights enshrined in their charters, but both of these bodies avert their eyes from the continuing horrors in the Gulf of Guinea. And U.N. agencies have given the country millions of dollars in aid.

"The late Papa Doc (Francois Duvalier of Haiti) was paternalist compared with Macias. He is a fascist monster who uses leftist rhetoric to keep himself in power."

Per capita, the republic's political execution rate is one of the highest in the world.

There are records of hapless prisoners having their eyes gouged out by torturers of the notorious "Macias Youth" organization.

Other victims are allowed to die of gangrene from the wounds of constant beatings in soundproof dungeons. Some are starved to death.

Other prisoners are force to stand in a pit, up to their necks in mud and filthy water, for 24 hours at a time.

Some "enemies of the state" are forced to watch the bludgeoning to death of their friends.

Catholic priests who refuse to eulogize Macias during Mass are kept in solitary confinement cells (Macias has proclaimed a "Hymn of the Republic" which opens with the line: "God has created Equatorial Guinea through the will of Papa Macias").

Refugees tell of burly soldiers standing on a man's neck and feet while he is beaten with stout wooden poles until they break.

Orgies of rape in secret prisons and concentration camps are reported, and the tendons of men and women detainees are slashed to prevent any escape attempts.

In this "Haiti of Africa," too, bodies are whipped raw and prison guards, for their own amusement, force their charges to battle each other senseless with clubs.

And torture in Equatorial Guinea has taken on a national flavor. Victims are made to stuff their mouths full of burning-hot chilis grown on the islands, and swallow them with a cup of water. This causes excruciating agony.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me briefly?

Mr. MORGAN. I am delighted to yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. President, the chairman of the African Subcommittee in the Foreign Relations Committee is Senator CLARK. He is a very able chairman. I do not believe anyone has ever done a more thorough job than he has. I hope that sometime when he is in the Chamber this subject might be brought up again so that we may get his comments on it.

Mr. MORGAN. I shall be delighted. I do not doubt the Senator's sincerity. I just question his judgment.

I questioned it here in the Chamber when we voted to cut off aid to the non-Communist factions in Angola in 1976. And I must say that I continue to be puzzled when I fail to hear the chairman of the Subcommittee on African Affairs speak out against such brutalities that I have described here today when we give so much emphasis to other areas.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am not always willing to accept everything I read in the papers. There have been some articles in the papers in the last few days referring directly to Senator CLARK with reference to certain reports of developments concerning Africa. I am sorry that the Senator is not present in this Chamber at this time. I have not understood some of the implications, and I have not been able to——

Mr. MORGAN. Does the Senator mean my implications?

Mr. SPARKMAN. No; I mean implications arising from the press reports. I hope very much that the facts about what took place can be made clear eventually.

Mr. MORGAN. I am delighted that my chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee has mentioned this for this is exactly what I am pleading for. I heard Senator CLARK on the NBC program called "The Today Show" yesterday and again on another program last night, and I think it is time that the Foreign Relations Committee conducted a debate in the Chamber so that the rest of us who are not members of that committee can have some access to the knowledge that the committee has and its thinking without having to refer to public news forums on TV, radio, and newspapers.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Let me say to the Senator that there was some discussion in the meeting of the Foreign Relations Committee this morning with reference to the African situation. I believe it was Senator MCGOVERN who brought the question up. Secretary of State Vance was with us. I announced at the meeting that just as soon as this recess is over we plan to have some of the people from the intelligence community to come before us and give us what I might say is called the lowdown. I look forward to that. When it comes about, if the Senator from North Carolina is interested, I shall be very glad to have him sit in with us.

Mr. MORGAN. I thank my distinguished chairman and my good friend, and I welcome that. I might say, though, that I would hope that the discussion would be extended beyond the Foreign Relations Committee because I remember well the debate in the Chamber on Africa in 1976 when there was not a real dissenting voice in the Chamber from the Foreign Relations Committee. Much of the testimony had been taken in secret sessions and then, the Senator will recall, we had a closed session here in the Chamber in which only Senator DOMENICI, who was not a party to the closed hearings in the Foreign Relations Committee, myself and others, resisted the so-called Clark amendment, but we found ourselves lacking in information because we had not been parties to the Foreign Relations Committee briefings. I understand the chairman's concern and I hope that after he has those briefings they will be made available to those of us who serve on such committees as Banking and Housing, and others, who do not have access to it. When I go back to my constituents in North Carolina they are asking me what is our African policy, and I cannot really tell them because I do not really know except that I know that we adopted the Clark amendment, which does restrict aid only to Angola, but I think the direct effect of it has been to restrain any efforts on our part to assist other areas. Rightfully or wrongfully, I think that has been the case.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I will yield in a minute when I get through.

I think it is time that 100 Members of this Senate learn something about it. Not one single time have I heard the debate on such matters as this in the Chamber.

Yes, I am glad to yield.

Mr. SPARKMAN. If I may take just another minute's time, let me say that I welcome the comments the Senator from North Carolina has made and certainly will be very glad to pass on any information that we have regarding it.

Mr. MORGAN. I certainly do not mean to imply improper implications by my remarks. I simply say I differed in 1976 with the Clark amendment. I might say that I wrote a letter to the President following he debate on the sale of arms to Saudi Arabia and suggested that maybe this administration might do like the last administration did and try to inform some of us who are not on the Foreign Relations Committee. Back during the Ford-Kissinger days, when I served here, quite often Dr. Kissinger would have a half dozen or dozen Senators down for a round-robin discussion at an early morning breakfast.

Quite often he would call up and say, "Could you get a half dozen or a dozen Senators who are not on the Foreign Relations Committee for a little luncheon so that I can come up and tell you what happened?"

As I expressed my concern to the administration, I was called on to vote on the sale of planes to Saudi Arabia without any kind of briefing except the report of the Foreign Relations Committee, which you know, came very shortly before the debate.

Of course, I made an effort to inform myself, and I did. But I hope there will be a greater exchange with the administration concerning foreign affairs, a greater exchange between the Foreign Relations Committee and the Members of the Senate concerning foreign affairs.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I certainly agree with the Senator.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, I yield.

Mr. SARBANES. I think the Senator's suggestion that there be a greater exchange between the administration and Members of the Senate is well taken.

Let me simply say I think there has been a great deal of misunderstanding and, maybe even bordering on misrepresentation, with respect to the so-called Clark amendment. All that amendment says is that the U.S. Government will not engage in military operations in Angola without coming to Congress for approval of such activities.

The amendment has been cited erroneously as restricting the President's ability to act in Zaire. That was and is not the case. The President was able to act. All the President had to do under other provisions of law, since the Clark amendment did not even touch Zaire, was to certify that it was in our national security interests, which he did, and he proceeded to act.

So there has been a great deal of misunderstanding about this matter. The administration has acted. It was not restricted, it was not limited.

I do not have any trouble with an examination of the various limitations that exist that the Congress has required. Some of them, it seems to me, are prudent and wise. In all fairness to the very able Senator from Iowa, I think the purport and thrust of his amendment ought to be clearly understood. It dealt at the time with the particular situation in Angola, and it dealt with the question of military operations without congressional approval.

Now, that question can be directly put and Members may reach different judgments. A Member of the Senate may reach, I guess could reach, the judgment that he wants the Executive to be able to conduct military operations without the Congress even knowing about them, and that he is really willing to look the other way and let that go on.

But, of course, what was said, at least in this amendment with respect to this particular country, was that you could not do that without coming and getting congressional approval.

But the citing of that amendment as having relevance with respect to providing assistance in the Zaire situation was totally erroneous and, in fact, the President was able to act and provide assistance.

Mr. MORGAN. I could not disagree with the Senator more because, much to my chagrin, when I came to Washington I learned that legislative history may be much more important in the interpretation of legislation sometimes than even the words of the statute. I disagree with that because in my State we do not cite legislative history. We interpret legislative acts from the four corners of the documents.

But, Senator, I sat here on the floor of the Senate and listened to the debate on the Clark amendment, and it was not limited to Angola. I heard the statement made from right here in the back part of the Senate, "So what if the Communists dominate all of Africa? We still have the Atlantic Ocean between us."

I heard another statement made right here on the floor of the Senate to the effect that, "Oh, the Soviets, the Communists, cannot dominate Africa. No one can dominate Africa."

Well, I agree we cannot, because we subscribe to high moral values. We value human lives. But my experience is such that it teaches me that the Soviets do not have that same regard, and neither do their surrogates.

So I do not think it is unfair, and I do not think it is unreasonable to say—it certainly was not unreasonable for the President to feel—some types or some kind of restraint in trying to aid Zaire in light of the debate that actually took place on the floor of the Senate.

I see the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. DOMENICI) who led that debate, as I said earlier, Mr. Chairman, without any inside knowledge of what went on in the Foreign Relations Committee.

So I think the President would be extremely unwise to carry on military aid or assistance—I am not talking about manpower but equipment—in light of the debate that went on on the floor of the Senate on the Clark amendment.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MORGAN. I would be delighted to yield.

Mr. SARBANES. First of all, I am not about to assume the burden for any and all statements made on the floor of the Senate. I think that is a reasonable position for me to take, and I would hope the Senator from North Carolina would concede that.

Mr. MORGAN. I think I would.

Mr. SARBANES. If we are going to be put to the task where, in any debate, you have to carry the burden for all of the statements, whatever they may have been, made with respect to the issue pending, then you are going to be carrying an extraordinary burden.

Second, it is clear that the Clark amendment did not impede or prevent assistance to Zaire because the President went ahead and provided it, and no one has contended that his action was illegal or contrary to law.

All I am trying to say is that the Senator from North Carolina may want to get into a broad debate about policy in Africa, but I at least want to be fair to the very able Senator from Iowa in terms of the impact of his amendment.

It is clear his amendment did not affect the situation with respect to providing assistance in Zaire; the President went ahead and provided it, and no one has contended that his action was illegal or contrary to law.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I am going to have to leave, so may I make just one statement on this? One thing that caused me to wonder just a little bit was a press report which implied that the President had considered asking for a change in the Clark amendment, and then he changed his mind. I do not know just where that leaves it.

Mr. MORGAN. I suspect that the President considered its repeal because of the implications brought about by the legislative history.

I would say that I think the President did hesitate in giving aid to Zaire. I do not know the exact time period because here again I am not on the Foreign Relations Committee and I have not had access to that information. I can only go by what I get from the media. But I would suggest there was some delay, and that probably was brought about by a feeling of restraint.

I would say in all candor that if he does not feel some restraint then the administration has not read the legislative history of the debate that went on, on the floor of the Senate, and that is why I really think those of you who are on the Foreign Relations Committee someday in the near future should have more than a colloquy on this matter, perhaps, a morning debate or so, a series of debates or discussions, on where we are and where we are going, because I do not know, and I am not sure that anyone else knows where we are on this subject.

Mr. SARBANES. Let me just conclude by saying to the Senator that I think it is extremely important that it be understood what the amendment provides. If one of the President's advisers is going to perceive mistakenly that the administration's ability to act is restricted by some amendment that does not restrict their ability to act, I cannot answer for that adviser, except to note he is giving bad advice.

It is also clear that when their mistake was perhaps pointed out to the administration, it went ahead and took acts with respect to Zaire. Acts that were in no way inhibited or affected by the Clark amendment; an amendment which dealt only with Angola and addressed the question of military operations, without the approval of Congress. The question of whether the Executive should be able to engage in such operations without the approval, or in some instances even the knowledge of Congress, is a legitimate issue for discussion.

The Senator from North Carolina and I may come out on different sides in that discussion; I do not know that until we have been through a discussion of it; but that is a different matter.

I think it is very important, in fairness to Senator CLARK, who is one of the ablest, hardest working members of the Foreign Relations Committee and indeed the Senate, and to the supporters of the Clark amendment, to make the point that the Clark amendment had no applicability to the Zaire situation. It has been misstated and misconstrued in the context of the recent problems in Africa.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, of course, the Senator is entitled to his own opinion, and I to mine.

Mr. SARBANES. That is the hallmark of the Senate, I would say to the Senator.

Mr. MORGAN. That is exactly right. I would differ with the Senator, and I would say that I suspect had the President moved swiftly and quickly, immediately after the invasion of the Shaba Province and before massacres had taken place, he probably would have been called to task here on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. SARBANES. Does the Senator, when he says "moved swiftly and quickly," mean with American men, as the French and the Belgians did?

Mr. MORGAN. No, I am talking about with the kind of aid that we later gave.

Mr. SARBANES. I do not think anyone would contend that the supply of materiel alone would have adequately responded to that situation; and, therefore, I think the Senator, in considering an adequate response, is going to have to confront very directly the involvement of men.

As it developed, that problem was met by the French and the Belgians, but I do not think the Senator should delude either himself, the rest of us, or the country that the situation could have been responded to by materiel alone.

Mr. MORGAN. I am not sure about that, but the fact is that we did not, as I understand it, supply materiel for some time; and I think the Senator, if he is inferring that an adequate response meant men, was wrong. But I think our colloquy indicates there is a clear lack of understanding about what our African policy is.

Mr. President, I will return, now, unless there is some further discussion, to the matter which is before the Senate, the Labor Reform Act, S. 2467.

The Senate continued with the consideration of H.R. 8410.

Mr. MORGAN. So far I have addressed the Senate about the labor law reform bill in terms of the motivations behind the bill, of the functioning of the National Labor Relations Board and of my concern over the specifics of the bill. Many of my remarks have been general in nature, almost academic. I have expressed by concerns for our Nation and for our system of labor-management relations.

Mr. President, I want to talk today in a more personal vein about North Carolina's perspective on S. 2467. I want to tell you about my home State and about my concerns for my State if this bill is passed as it is now written.

In North Carolina, we have enjoyed unusual benefits and we have been blessed by a favorable climate, abundant natural resources, and a tradition of hard work. We have certain problems remaining, like every other State, and in some areas we have a long way to go. But I am proud of North Carolina, of the progress it has made and of our favorable attitude towards the future.

This past year has been unusually good for our State, by using a combination of tax incentives, aggressive marketing by our State government, and the attraction of a balanced State budget, which is mandated by our State constitution, North Carolina enjoyed its greatest industrial development ever.

If I may digress for a moment, I cannot overemphasize the beneficial results of a balanced State budget in attracting new industry and instilling confidence in investment. I believe that, perhaps, this one factor alone is the greatest asset that we have toward bringing new industry into North Carolina. We are responsible fiscally. Our State revenue bonds have always enjoyed the highest financial rating because we are responsible fiscally; and I hope that Congress can benefit from the model set by North Carolina in its fiscal management.

The result of the State's efforts have paid off. Last year, new and expanded industrial growth was valued at $1.4 billion. One hundred and sixty-three new companies settled in North Carolina and 631 expanded their operations. North Carolina finds itself in the top 10 of just about every rating of favorable business climates.

The benefits of this growth has not been limited to industry. North Carolina has had an unemployment rate of about 4 percent. I want to repeat that. We have an unemployment rate of about 4 percent, and we have been very lucky. I can also state that the intangible things, which we have come to call the quality of life, are excellent in North Carolina. As I said yesterday, North Carolina by some accounts has a very low per capita income. Other analyses, made by repected economists show that in terms of disposable income, we rank 17th in the Nation, ahead of New York, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Vermont. We have a good and hard-working people and their physical drive and moral fiber are great.

As I mentioned in an earlier address, one of the great pharmaceutical companies of the world has plants in North Carolina, and one day the president of that company came by to advise me that they were going to expand their facilities.

Being in a somewhat facetious mood, I said to him that I was not sure I would like that, especially if they were going to bring outsiders into North Carolina.

He told me, "We're not going to." He said:

> We export workers from North Carolina to our other plants. Our productivity in North Carolina is the highest of all our plants around the world.

Mr. President, that is one factor that attracts industry to North Carolina. We do have good, hard-working people.

Now I do not want to simply praise my home State, but I did want to give you a picture of our situation. I wanted to let you know the conditions in North Carolina as a means of explaining my State's reaction to this bill.

THE PUBLIC DEBATE

Mr. President, since January of this year, I have returned to my State at least once a week. I have traveled from the coast to the mountains, and I have never been approached more often and with more intensity than on this legislative proposal on labor law reform. Businessmen, disinterested constituents, employees and union members have talked to me about one issue—the labor law reform bill. Every citizen in the State appears to be aware of the bill, and is taking part in the struggle on this issue.

The discussion has at times been difficult and rough. Early on, there was a lack of understanding, but now I believe there is an almost unified voice speaking against this bill.

I have traveled to the State and I have sought the input of business groups, of unions, and of North Carolinians who have no direct involvement in labor-management relations. I have listened to both sides. Both have expressed their basic support for their Senator. I can compliment the unions in my State for their reasoned arguments and understanding, and I can compliment the union leadership in my State. It is a progressive leadership. The leaders not only seek and strive to improve the plight of our union members and workingmen in North Carolina, but they have worked many times, and most times, hand in hand with the Government and with business to improve productivity, because of that basic work ethic which exists in my State. They know and we know that we have to work together, and that business has to make a profit for labor to profit. So, while we differ on this particular bill, I compliment them for their very logical and reasoned arguments on behalf of it. I believe that our unions, either native to North Carolina or brought in by new industry, are honest and responsible, and I am proud to count them among my friends. I have explained my position to them and we have had a good give and take.

Now let me briefly set forth my views of this bill's impact on my State.

DELAY SECTIONS

With regard to the delay sections, let me say that those sections of the bill will have their most dramatic impact on small businesses, which make up the bulk of North Carolina business. I believe that they will be hit hard by organizing efforts fostered by this bill. My fear is that many will close.

Let me relate one story to you. A group of black businessmen came to see me. They were all proud men, proud of their accomplishments and their success in the business world. Most of them had started their own businesses and made them into profitmaking enterprises by their own sweat and labor. They came to me to ask me to resist this bill. I responded that I thought this measure was aimed at increasing union organization and thereby, according to proponents of the bill, benefiting minority groups. After speaking to me for a few minutes, they showed me the error of my thoughts and of this bill. What they told me was that this bill would give additional power, or the potential power, to unions to organize in small businesses and to weaken the ability of small companies to resist. In short, they felt the bill was biased. If small businesses were forced to unionize, the impact may adversely affect, they said, black employment opportunities. They feared a doubling of the unemployment rate among blacks in North Carolina.

As an interesting observation, they feared that unionization of some of these small industries would adversely affect the mobility of blacks on the upward scale of management. Minorities are moving up into management and into supervisory and responsible positions to a much greater degree in North Carolina than they are in many of the heavily unionized States where we all know that blacks have been discriminated against.

In North Carolina, these businessmen noted that there are 91,772 small businesses. If unionized, operating costs, according to their estimates; would increase by about 9.3 percent. Primarily, the cost would go to additional staff to handle labor-management relations. Many small businesses, including minority businesses would be forced to shut down. Overall, they noted that any slowdown in industrial development would ultimately affect the black community.

Now much of what these men told me was speculative and no one can predict the future. On the whole, I do feel that this bill will give an impetus to organization efforts among smaller enterprises and ultimately drive many out of business. I am not predicting any horror stories, but I do feel that this result is inevitable. It concerns me, just as it concerned these businessmen, because small business is suffering in this country under a burden of Federal regulation and paperwork costs. Last year, it was estimated by the Commission on Federal Paperwork that small employers paid about $3,000 a year to comply with governmental requirements. I am afraid that many small businessmen will go out of business and many potential small business operators will choose not to bear the increased costs.

Let me digress for a moment, Mr. President, and say that a good many of my industrial friends could have taken a lessen from these small businessmen who came to see me. They did not come to demand that I tell them immediately how I was going to vote on any given issue involved in this bill. They came with a very clear and logical understanding of the bill, made their presentation with examples, and then asked that I consider their arguments and their presentation. I repeat that a good many of my friends in the industrial world could learn a lesson from these very effective representatives of the small business community.

EQUAL ACCESS

While the delay section will have its most important impact on small businessmen, the "Equal Access" provision will adversely impact every employer. North Carolina has a strong respect for personal property. The fact that this bill makes a rule out of a remedy, and that the remedy is governmental management of the workplace, is simply too much for our people. Uniformly, this provision has been singled out as one of the two most injurious parts of S. 2467, the bill before us.

(Mr. MELCHER assumed the chair.)

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I expressed my personal concern with this provision the other day. Now let me repeat my concerns and the concerns of my neighbors in North Carolina.

The Raleigh News and Observer noted this past Monday in an editorial, not wholly adverse to this bill, that—

> The Senate should reject the provision giving union organizers equal access to company property and equal time to talk to workers prior to an election. This broad step seems unwise, contentious and perhaps even unworkable, as well as a sweeping infringement on the uses of private property.

This, Mr. President, from a newspaper whose whole history has been the spokesman for the working people, for the average person of our State.

I would like to read to this Senate a letter I have received, one of many about S. 2467. It was hand written and expresses a very good knowledge of the issue of equal access. I am going to read it exactly as it was written.

> DEAR SIR: I am writing to voice my displeasure over the Labor Reform bill now before you. Anytime you have a quick election one side will not be fairly represented.
> Both sides and the employees need time to make up their minds. When a short period of time is involved a few highly emotional issues could decide the outcome of the election. Giving equal time to the union on company time and property is highly unfair to the companies. Why should the company have to foot the bill for a union who is trying to take over partial control of their company. Common sense would tell you what would happen if the NLRB is given the right to dictate monetary terms when the employer is accused of refusal to bargain.

> EDWARD WOOD.

I believe this supports the grass roots knowledge and opposition to this bill which I have spoken about. This letter is just one of the several thousand I have received. To me, it reflects a genuine concern and fear.

REMEDIES

The remedies section of this bill is considered with less concern in North Carolina. Naturally, in a State where unionization is low, concern for remedies is less severe than with those portions of this bill which deal with elections. Let me state this point clearly. Almost every employer I have met in the State has emphasized the importance of fair election guidelines. This is critical to them and they have made it clear that the election guidelines and the equal access provision are the most threatening of this bill. They have told me, and I believe them when they say, that if a union should win the right to represent their employees, then they would bargain in good faith and attempt to live with the union. This statement was made in good faith and I believe it. The only evidence to the contrary has been a few outstanding cases, perhaps, six in number, which somehow have come to condemn the entire business community.

Of all the provisions of this bill, the make-whole provision appears to be the most coercive. The fear of this remedy, even if it is as limited as Senator JAVITS feels it is, is sufficient to intimidate employers and especially small employers, in my opinion. The purpose of the National Labor Relations Act is to facilitate collective bargaining, not to coerce it, not to preempt it and not to hang a sword over the head of one of the participants. The argument that the remedy applies to both sides is very weak. If it did apply to both sides, then I must assume that a union could be forced to pay employees what they would have made but for the failure of the union to bargain in good faith. If this be the case, then perhaps there is an argument that the proposal is fair and just. I have yet to hear such an argument.

GENERAL CONCLUSION

Mr. President, I have spoken several times on this bill. I have expressed my views on the spirit of this proposal and on the mechanics of the various provisions. I can tell you that I am serious in my views about S. 2467 and that I am concerned about its impact on our labor-management relations. I stated early on that I am not favoring one side in this matter; what I am favoring is a labor law which is just, balanced and equitable.

I am against this bill because it goes too far, it makes policy determinations which I believe to be ill advised and because it simply does too much.

I shall continue to listen to both sides in this debate. The distinguished Senators from New Jersey and from New York have been courteous to me and I thank them for that. Senator JAVITS had a very good point yesterday when he noted that fear of extensive use should not deter us from creating new remedies. I agree that if there is a need, then we should create new remedies and expect them to be used. My point has been that the need is not there, that many of these provisions go against the intent of the bill, which was to cure delay, and that in creating so many remedies, we may be imposing an unreasonable burden on the National Labor Relations Board and the Federal courts.

Many of my colleagues have come to me and said that they feared that a vote on this bill would cast them in the role of being antiunion or antibusiness. I told them that, to my mind, there is only one side to consider in all this. That is, ultimately, the side of the employee. The National Labor Relations Act was created to protect the rights of employees, not employers or unions. So long as I am proemployee, then I feel that I am on steady ground.

In opposing this bill, I believe that I am working for employees. If the end product of this legislation is to harden employer attitudes toward their employees, then it will injure employees. If the bill encourages unions to create situations that result in debarments and employees lose their jobs, then it will injure employees. Both of these are real possibilities and consequences that we can avoid by opposing this particular bill.

I believe that we have a good system of labor laws which provides ample opportunity for unions to organize, and which has reduced the number of major law violators to a very small number. It has encouraged employers to turn their attention away from fighting unions and toward improving the lot of their employees.

I said I wanted to address North Carolina's concerns in this matter and I do want to end on that note.

My constituents are sincere in their concern about this bill. Their outrage has been expressed in mail to me which is easily double the mail I received concerning the Panama Canal issue.

In the thousands of letters that have been sent to me about this bill, I believe that three major sentiments have emerged. There is concern that a few extreme cases of lawbreaking have brought down a labor law reform bill aimed at stopping serious violations, but which will impact on every employer, whether that employer is guilty or not. There is outrage that this bill has been presented, both openly and in private, as a means of equalizing all conditions in the South and preventing economic growth. Earlier in my presentation this week, I quoted statements made on the floor of the House to that effect. There is also a mood of what can be called factionalism. I believe that this issue has sparked support for radicals in both the labor and business communities. This is a dangerous trend and it will inevitably injure our labor-management relations.

Mr. President, I can say to this body that I join in the distress and concern expressed by my constituents. I shall continue to listen to both sides in this debate, and I shall continue to look at these proposals from the perspective of a North Carolinian.

Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I am certain that all of us in this body appreciate the debate that has transpired, on this ninth day of debate, on labor law reform. I want to make some comment specifically about the amendment offered this morning by the distinguished Senators from Kentucky (Mr. FORD and Mr. HUDDLESTON) and the amendment to that amendment which was offered by the distinguished majority leader, the Senator from West Virginia (Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD).

Specifically, the amendments are addressed to the so-called small business problem with this legislation. It is apparent that much of our debate has centered upon the impact of Senate bill 2467 on small business in this country. As a matter of fact, it is admitted, I believe, by those who are proposing the bill, and certainly affirmed by those of us who are opposing the bill, that the legislation which we now have before us and prior to amendment, could have serious impact on small business in this country. The amendments that have been offered are, first of all, the original basic amendment by Senators FORD and HUDDLESTON to provide some counsel through an ombudsman for a small businessman who might have a case in front of him in which he needed counsel. A point made by many of us, both for and against the legislation, has been that many small businessmen cannot afford substantial legal counsel, or, at least, if they obtain this counsel, might jeopardize the whole business. Certainly, the ombudsman amendment is an attempt to try to bring about some equity with regard to the small businessman.

Certainly of importance is the amendment to that amendment offered by the majority leader, which, in essence, would put into law the standards of jurisdiction for the National Labor Relaitons Board which have become a part of procedure through various precedents, through various cases, various standards that have been discussed and brought about administratively.

I want to say at the outset, for my own part, that I believe that these amendments are constructive and, as far as I am concerned, it would appear to me that a large majority of Senators in this body would be in favor of these amendments. In fact, it may very well be that the feeling would be almost unanimous. Therefore, I suspect that we shall move fairly rapidly, when the Senate comes back on June 5, to consideration of these amendments and probably shall have a number of supportive speeches in behalf of them.

One can ask, why would there be such a feeling of unanimity with regard to these amendments? I can only reply that I think it is fairly obvious that these amendments, specifically the one of Senator BYRD on the ombudsman, may advance the state of the art somewhat. But the amendment with regard to the standards essentially ratifies the status quo. One could argue that the National Labor Relations Board could, in an arbitrary way, upset its standard and move off hither and thither. But the facts of life in terms of this bill are that essentially, both sides have been taking for granted, I believe—at least as a commonsense matter, we should have been—that 75 percent of the small businesses of this country are going to be exempt. They are, for all intents and purposes, now exempt. If codified into law, this may make it even more certain that they will be exempt.

The thing simply needs to be stated, I think, that baldly, because very clearly three-quarters of the businesses in this country—and I might add that those three-quarters of the businesses in this country approximate over 3 million businesses—have an average number of employees of less than five. We are talking about a very small business with regard to the 75 percent which are to be exempted.

I would submit, Mr. President, the argument on small business during the debate on S. 2467 has not been about three-quarters of the businesses. I know of no one in this body who has seriously been suggesting that the NLRB or that organized labor ought to be devoting substantial amounts of time to the organization of businesses that have an average of five employees or less.

What we have been talking about, Mr. President, are the 25 percent of the businesses of this country that are not exempted by the Byrd amendment that will remain grist for the mill. And that 25 percent has been what we have been talking about for 2 weeks and will be continuing to talk about, I presume, for a while longer.

Just so that we can clear the air with regard to the importance and the impact of the Byrd amendment, let me say that it is always useful to bring into legislative language what has been administrative practice. It is useful to point out for those who may not know that 75 percent of the businesses in this country are very small, five employees or less, on an average, and will not be part of this procedure.

But the small businessmen who have been writing to me are people who are going to be affected by the law even as amended.

I suspect it is just as well that we proceed back to our constituents at this point and make very clear that we are still talking about, in S. 2467, the other 25 percent.

It may be that in due course, Mr. President, constructive amendments will be offered that will deal with the other 25 percent.

If we take for granted that at some stage after a suitable hearing by our colleagues that the Byrd amendment is adopted and that the Huddleston-Ford amendment is adopted, and I would predict that is probably going to be the case without a great deal of contention, then at that stage, having established the status quo, and these amendments do more than put in print the status quo, no change except for those who believe it is significant to go from administrative language to legislative language, even then we do so in an amendment to the Senate bill. That raises a fundamental question that I simply want to leave as a part of the debate today.

On this whole idea of amendments, for my own part, I see no objection to the offering of amendments that are constructive and, for that matter, to the acceptance of amendments that are constructive. It may very well be that we shall be able to entertain and adopt a great number of amendments that make this bill a much better one than the one that now lies before us unamended.

I suspect, and I address this thought respectfully to the floor leader, the distinguished Senator from New Jersey, and to others who are proponents of the bill, those of us who are in opposition to S. 2467 still have very real doubts about the conference procedure. By that I simply mean that we are in a parliamentary situation in which the House of Representatives has passed a bill. It is a bill that we do not find appealing, to say the least.

Before us, we have a bill which is unamended and which may be amended at some point, which may lead to differences that the conference committee would consider.

The entire establishment, and I use this word advisedly, in quote, "the establishment" with regard to labor law and procedure in this city of Washington, D.C., the Nation's Capital, comprised, of course, of the committees that deal with labor affairs on the House and Senate sides, with the Department of Labor itself, and in this case with the support given by the President of the United States and the White House, and the rhetoric that has come with regard to this legislation from all these groups, has had a very strong tilt toward the organization of employees and a very adverse tilt to small business.

This morning, in the amendment offered by the distinguished majority leader, there is an initial doffing of the cap to small business, even a hope on the part of the distinguished floor manager of the bill and the ranking Republican member on the Human Resources Committee (Mr. JAVITS), that this sort of clears up the small business issue. Obviously it does not clear it up. It recognizes that it is there, sort of puts in the status quo situation as it stands.

But I would hope that Senators would understand, I am certain the country will understand, why those of us who are skeptical about the amendment procedure as we take a look at the composition of the Human Resources Committee, the strong sense of commitment, idealism and advocacy of the members of that committee as they meet with their counterparts, not simply with regard to this bill, but with a lifetime of advocacy, that we would have some disquieting thoughts about how much of the work and deliberation we may have here might come about.

For my own part, I am perfectly willing to take a wait and see attitude, to see with regard to amendments that are offered by the proponents of the bill as they attempt to obtain greater support. But I think it is fair to say that, as of the moment, the particular amendments offered today have not changed the votes, not made a difference with regard to those of us who are in favor of or opposed to this legislation in total.

I would say that we are delighted we have moved on to a constructive spot. But we are hopeful that will be the harbinger of a good bit more because simply to put in the status quo language does not make a whole lot of difference, aside, conceivably, from a toe in the water, a first stirring around to see if anybody will move, wiggle, or take any other activity at this stage.

We would suggest, after the first stir was over, it appears this is something which we can settle back and begin to wrestle again with the substantive issues of the bill.

I shall not take the time of my colleagues to reiterate all of them again today.

But we do look forward to continued debate following the recess. I am most hopeful we can be given some greater reassurance with regard to the final resolution of amendments in the conference committee, what assurances there are that any action that might be taken on this floor might find its way into law, and I would say that that is the heart of the matter with regard to acceptance by those of us who are in opposition at this point to S. 2467 that we see before us.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, first and very briefly, I would like to make some comments addressing the most recent statements of the Senator from Indiana.

It does not surprise me, knowing and feeling as I do about what our bill does, that he minimizes this amendment.

In debate here over these many days, the opponents of this bill have recited many extreme consequences that would follow upon enactment into law. There are many themes. Let me just deal with one, and that is the projection of expanded jurisdiction, of the National Labor Relations Board reaching out and encompassing more and more small businesses.

The record is replete with these predictions. First, it is argued that if this Board is expanded from five to seven members, we can expect, it is said by some of the opponents, a packing of the Board with pro-labor members. We also hear that with these additions to the Board, and with Mr. Fanning's statement of sometime ago, we will have a change of jurisdiction guidelines and standards, and there will be this reaching out into an area not now jurisdictionally accepted by the Board.

We have heard all this and we tried to use logic and the record to ease those fears, but it came back like waves upon us. The floor manager of the opposition, the Senator from Utah, was eloquent on many occasions. He described, at long length, the Board's jurisdiction arising out of the commerce clause, and National Labor Relations Act, and said:

All small business is covered under the National Labor Relations Act. There is no one that is exempt, not even the sole proprietors, even businesses with less than three employees. Everyone is covered.

Then he develops the real possibility, not just once but over the period we have been debating, that this Board—with that authority, is going to reach out and encompass those small businesses not now under the jurisdiction of the Board.

I should like to cite an exchange that the Senator from Utah had with the present occupant of the chair, the distinguished Senator from Montana (Mr. MELCHER). The Senator from Utah said:

> The present chairman of the National Labor Relations Board has been on the board for in excess of 20 years. He is on record as being for expanded jurisdiction. In other words, he wants to expand the board's jurisdiction by narrowing these guidelines. I believe we are going to find that, regardless of what happens here, the guidelines will be narrowed; but if they are not, 76 percent of all employees in the United States are covered by this bill.

The Senator from Indiana says that it does not do much, but it does do much in terms of the fears we have heard expressed in this Chamber during debate on this bill. It makes crystal clear that we are not going to disturb jurisdiction, and that jurisdiction already excludes 78 percent of all enterprises. That is the way it is going to be and it is not going to be changed. Comes the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) who says, "No, no. It is going to be changed, and the record is here. John Fanning says it is going to be changed, and you are going to pack the Board with two pro-labor members."

We pointed out that President Carter has made two appointments: Fanning, a reappointment; Truesdalc, a career Board employee. There is nothing in their backgrounds of being advocates of either side. There is nothing to suggest that there is going to be any ideological difference. There never has been a union lawyer put on the National Labor Relations Board. I do not think it is quite true of the other side. I believe there have been several management background lawyers put on that Board.

We tried to persuade and we did not succeed. This amendment came in here, to make it beyond peradventure solidly the law that there is not going to be an aggrandizement of jurisdiction.

The Senator from Indiana, with good conscience, and without any blatant inconsistency, can say it does not do much. But I wish the Senator from Utah were here to say the same thing, because he knows in his mind, to be honest with himself, that he has to say that this amendment does plenty. He has to know that it should do much to allay all those hobgoblins and put them away; because this will fix the status quo, it will be fixed in law, which is not now the case.

There has been another recurring theme here, referring to another part of the discussion of the Senator from Indiana, the projection of things to come when we get to conference. The other day I was saying "when and if we get to conference." Now I am saying—because the Senator is talking about the conference—"when we get to conference with the House on this bill."

There is some idea that, if the amendments are agreed to here, those that reflect the changes that come about through the long debates we are having, that somehow those amendments will be lost in conference, because obviously the House does not come close on some of these things, such as fixing jurisdiction, the one we just discussed. So now there is the prediction that they are all going to be lost in conference.

For the new Members of this institution, I like to recall the history of this committee in conference with the House. I have been on conferences for many years and in the position of chairman of our committee for 8 years. One of the major matters we brought, when I had the chairmanship of the subcommittee—and we send our subcommittee members to conference—was the Coal Mine Health and Safety Act. As I recall, there, too, we had probably a longer period of consideration of that bill than the House did, longer discussions here, longer time in the committee, a longer period of gestation of the ideas that would go into the bill.

We got to conference. I can say—historically, I am certain of this—that we were faithful, going into that conference, to what the Senate did. Under the rules of the Senate, we had better be or we could be severely censured. Going in, we were faithful; and the House, going in, was faithful, too. But in the process of the conference, if there is going to be any result, there have to be accommodations. Call them compromise, call them what you will; somebody has to give, somebody has to add, and that is the conference.

The record will show that our processes here of developing that bill had perfected a piece of legislation with which, with earnestness and vitality and high persuasiveness, we could persuade the House; and most of those matters of the greatest difference came our way.

We started back in 1969, when I had the position of chairman of that subcommittee. I cannot recall any bill on which our committee has gone to conference with the House on which we have not been able to come back to the Senate, present our conference report, and get an acceptance by more than a majority, generally unanimously.

I am not only addressing myself to these areas of labor-management and labor conditions. Whether it was minimum wages, whether it was occupational safety and health, whether it was other conditions of employment, such as—age discrimination and mandatory retirement, we have come back here and have been able to present to the Senate a conference report that did not have to produce another filibuster, at the maximum, or long discussion, at a minimum. We presented a product; and our colleagues recognized that we had been faithful—and had been successful in being faithful—to the Senate position.

We have had an opportunity on this bill that is unlike the situation in the House. We have had an opportunity to have longer deliberations. I am now speculating, but it seems to me that our longer deliberations have made us work harder in fashioning and developing the final product.

And when we get to conference that will have a persuasive effect, I would think, on House conferees. They will have known that we have had to finally look at every provision harder and longer than the process in the House of Representatives permitted. So I would think that if there are real anxieties, while we cannot write a contract and we cannot put in an amendment that we will say every word of this Senate bill will be the conference report, I think we can say that people can put to rest that hobgoblin, fear, and anxiety that all that is fashioned here will be lost in conference. I can be sure it will not be.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am happy to yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I just wish to associate myself with the Senator's remarks.

I shall not take more of the Senate's time. I have said the same thing time and again. It bears repetition, in light of the fact that we are moving into the amendment stage with the amendment which has been introduced today, and I express my every intention to carry out the responsibility which I consider to be a prime responsibility of a conferee, to wit, the fidelity, insofar as it is humanly possible, to the measure which has been passed by the body which one represents in the conference.

I join Senator WILLIAMS in these sentiments.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thank the Senator.

Mr. President, I do not think that anything is more frustrating to the victims of illegal conduct than to take their case to the agency of the Government which is established to protect them, and then have to wait for years while their Government struggles to get them relief.

This is particularly so with the National Labor Relations Board, victims of illegal conduct must wait for years while the Board ties itself up in bureaucratic redtape, and then disentangles itself. And perhaps, the most bureaucratic of the Board's procedures is the backpay process, as J. C. Hindsley of Tennessee was to find out.

WHY AMERICA'S WORKERS NEED LABOR LAW REFORM, CHAPTER 8

This is the eighth of a series of personal experiences of workers who have suffered under the present bureaucratic procedures of the Board. I wish to bring this case to the attention of the Senate.

In 1969, the employees of McCann Steel Co. of Nashville, Tenn., voted to have the Ironworkers' Union represent them in collective bargaining. The company, however, refused to bargain with the union, and on May 14, 1970, the workers went out on strike.

J. C. Hindsley was a draftsman, and was not in the unit represented by the union. On June 3, 1970, Hindsley was fired after he refused to do some welding, which was normally done by one of the striking workers.

Hindsley filed an unfair labor practice charge that same day, and on July 14, 1970, the Board's regional director issued a complaint against the company.

There was a hearing before an administrative law judge, who ruled that Hindsley's discharge was illegal. The full National Labor Relations Board affirmed the law judge on April 23, 1971. The Board ordered the company to reinstate Hindsley and give him backpay.

On May 12, 1972, almost 2 years after Hindsley's illegal discharge, the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit enforced the Board's orders.

But J. C. Hindsley's ordeal was just beginning. He still had ahead of him the torturous path toward his backpay.

Since the decision of the circuit court, enforcing the Board's reinstatement and backpay order, Hindsley's backpay has been subject to two hearings before an administrative law judge, three more decisions by the National Labor Relations Board, and three more decisions by the court of appeals.

I will not relate for the Senate the torturous movement of Hindsley's case through this bureaucratic nightmare.

But, I will discuss for the Senate, the issue that has been holding up the simple matter of Hindsley's backpay for nearly 6 years.

Under the current law, Hindsley, who was the wronged party, had the duty to mitigate the backpay liability of the employer who had illegally fired him and the issue is whether he willfully increased McCann's damages by not accepting enough overtime work from his new employer.

And the issue which has separated the Board and the employer for 6 years the issue which has been up and down between the law judge and the Board and the court for all this time, is who has the burden of proving that Hindsley did not accept all the overtime he could have, Hindsley, the Board, or the employer.

That is right, Mr. President, J. C. Hindsley has been through a 6-year ordeal, because the Board and the employer are haggling over who has the burden of proof on the mitigation of damages—Hindsley or the employer who had illegally fired him.

And, Hindsley's ordeal is not over, he has still not received his backpay.

Mr. President, how can our citizens have respect for the law, when they see how long it takes to get simple redress of a wrong? How can our law deter illegal acts when the wrongdoer can delay redress, seemingly forever, and the party suffers on?

If H.R. 8410 had been the law, this would never have happened. H.R. 8410's backpay remedy cuts through this bureaucratic nightmare. It provides a simple measure of damages, and the only deductible is what the discharged employee actually earned in the interim. There would have been no need, under this bill, for the Board and the courts to wrestle for 6 years over the question of who had the burden of proving what the wronged party might have earned.

Mr. President, I submit that it is cases like J. C. Hindsley's that labor law reform is all about.

I yield the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I appreciate the comments of the distinguished floor manager of the bill in response to my comments earlier, and I simply say in defense for a moment of my colleague from Utah, Senator HATCH, that the quotation he quoted on expanding Board jurisdiction by John Fanning, Chairman of the Labor Relations Board, was not an old quote, although Mr. Fanning may have made similar comments in the past, but this particular speech was given on May 11, 1978, which is not too long ago.

And I think it is fair to say to the Senator from New Jersey that his characterization of my colleague's comments was correct based upon, in part, Fanning's statements, and others, so to that extent, of course, the Byrd amendment does relieve those fears.

I suppose we have this predicament still, and as my colleague from New Jersey has mentioned it may be a very difficult procedure to bring about the degree of assurance that is required of conference procedure. As my colleague from New Jersey suggested as we talked about the conference, I was suggesting that a conference is almost in the offing, and I am not one to misinterpret it in that respect. It would appear to me that is some ways down the trail depending on whether the bill passes, but at the same time clearly even the Byrd amendment, and that may finally be adopted by all of us with some acclaim, is not certain in terms of its path through that conference. I think it has a pretty good shot at it, all things considered, given the author and the steam that he would have in both Houses. But our predicament, I think, on this side of the issue, not necessarily on this side of the aisle, is that the Human Resources Committee of the Senate has a pretty strong viewpoint on this bill. The bill came out of the committee 13 to 2.

One of the reasons why those of us who are not members of the Human Resources Committee and who have been involved actively in this debate have something less than overwhelming confidence about the conference committee is it is customary that people who are members of the committee of jurisdiction to form that conference, and I suppose that some greater assurance is going to be needed for all of us to be happier about the prospects of this bill than a recitation of previous pieces of social legislation in which the distinguished Senator from New Jersey and others have been involved. I do not think that really ultimately is going to be convincing to those who are opposing this bill.

I would hope that constructively the floor managers and others might be thinking ahead as to what sort of assurances really are possible or whether, in fact, we must accept on blind faith somehow that the House might acquiesce and the beliefs of the proponents on the Senate side might be adequate, because that might be judged not enough and we might have no bill.

So we are hopeful, and I appreciate very much the colloquy we have enjoyed this afternoon.

I yield the floor.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I rise in support of S. 2467, the Labor Reform Act of 1978, and in support of unprinted amendment No. 1323 offered by the distinguished majority leader, Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD, and of which I am a cosponsor.

In doing so I intend to address in some detail several issues which, in my judgment, have become a central focus in the debate concerning the bill's relative merits.

To summarize briefly, as I understand S. 2467, the primary purpose of this legislation is to expedite the procedures and augment the remedies under the National Labor Relations Act. The National Labor Relations Board is expanded to enable the agency to meet its increasing caseload, and the Board's operations are restructured to reduce delays in unfair labor practice proceedings. The Board is directed to utilize its rulemaking authority in an effort to speed the resolution of unfair labor practice cases and of representation cases, and to establish fair campaign procedures.

Further, the bill requires the Board to seek preliminary injunctions where employees are discriminatorily discharged during an organizing effort or a campaign to deauthorize or decertify a union, and to fully compensate such employees. I would point out, Mr. President, that under existing law the Board is under a mandatory duty to seek preliminary injunctive relief to abate certain unlawful actions by unions, most notably secondary boycott cases. The bill therefore, would provide some balance in the area of extraordinary relief mandated to the Board. The bill also provides a "make-whole" remedy for employees when an employer unlawfully refuses to bargain with a newly certified union.

It should be noted, however, that the bill does not change in any respect the present rules regulating the relationship between already organized employees and their employers. This separate complex body of law whose purpose is to set an even balance between employers and organized employees is left undisturbed. As the Washington Post so aptly editorialized, S. 2467 merely provides "fine tuning" to an existing machinery.

Mr. President, before embarking on a substantive discussion of these issues, I feel compelled at the outset of my remarks to make an observation which, I regret to say reflects poorly on the legislative process and perhaps even sets an unfortunate precedent of things to come in the months ahead. As you know, Mr. President, no other piece of legislation proposed during this session of the 95th Congress has generated more constituent interest than this bill. As I continue to monitor and review the comments contained in communications which pour in from practically every State in the Union, it has become increasingly clear to me that several "grassroots" pressure groups, in their zeal to defeat the proposed labor reform legislation, have blanketed the country with a blizzard of irresponsible and distorted misinformation about the bill—what it does, who it will effect, and how much it will cost the American consumer.

In point of fact, Mr. President, I have received literally thousands of cards, letters, and telegrams from sincere and well meaning Americans asking me—and I think rightly so—to vote against any bill "* * * that promotes compulsory—pushbutton unionism." For the record, let me state very emphatically that, I for one, will oppose any bill that comes before this body for consideration proposing "pushbutton-compulsory unionism." I am certain that the opponents of "pushbutton" unionism will be pleased to learn of my position on this matter and I am sure they will be greatly relieved to hear—correct me if I am mistaken, Mr. President—that such a bill is not now pending on the floor of the Senate and subject to debate here today.

The bill currently before us, S. 2467, the Labor Law Reform Act of 1978, represents in my judgment, a very modest, straightforward, but long overdue revision to the National Labor Relations Act. Simply stated, its enactment is needed to maintain the integrity of the existing body of law governing labor-management relations and collective bargaining in the private sector.

Unfortunately, Mr. President, the real issues of rights denied to workers, of widespread avoidance of existing law, and of the lack of its effective enforcement are being lost behind a cloud of rhetoric and denunciation that is becoming more and more heated as it becomes less and less factual, I am particularly concerned, Mr. President, over the strident tone and emotional intensity of the voices outside Congress which orchestrate the opposition to this bill.

In the months since this bill was introduced, the public debate on the question of labor law reform has been to a great extent derailed. What began as a low key, very modest effort to strengthen a good law, has been turned into a major legislative confrontation. The issue is no longer reform of a good law. For many it has become an out and out opportunity to crush the institution of trade unionism. Mr. President, I am very deeply troubled by the tactics being instituted by the opponents of this measure to bring about its defeat.

The campaign to denigrate the unions and those who support labor law reform is regrettably characterized by the effective use of extreme rhetoric and emotion-laden words and phrases.

I ask my colleagues to direct their attention for a moment to just a few examples of these statements: Is the bill which we are debating here today really a "monstrosity"? Is it a "vicious" bill? Is is "reprehensible"? Will it really give "excessive new power to union bosses"? Will it "force hundreds of thousands more working men and women into unions against their will"? And how about small businesses? If the National Action Committee is to be believed, the bill is a "rip-off," and the U.S. Congress is intent on "killing small business as we know it today."

I wonder if it would add anything to the quality and integrity of this discussion if I stood here today and made a desperate plea that "sinister anti-democratic, ultraconservative forces are right now marshaling their resources for a final 11th hour attack to defeat this bill"? What purpose would be served by the use of such language? Mr. President, I am certain that you and my colleagues will agree that words and phrases such as these have no place in this debate and we diminish the respect for this body when we resort to their use for purposes of emphasis and dramatic effect.

Mr. President, the efforts of the National Right to Work Committee and the National Action Committee to mobilize small businessmen against this legislation, I believe, are most instructive in this regard. Permit me if I may to highlight a recent interchange that took place here on the floor of the Senate on Thursday, May 18, 1978 between the bill's floor manager, the distinguished Senator from New Jersey, Mr. WILLIAMS, and the opposition leader, my colleague from Utah, Senator HATCH.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wonder if the Senator (from Utah) will agree with this statement? The bill you have before you is a bill that will put more small businesses out of business than anything else that Congress has ever done in the last 50 years.

Mr. HATCH. I believe that approaches the truth. I think this bill is devastating to small business. Dr. Rinfret says it. Small business says it. Yes, I think that is true.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That was said on June 19, 1935, by Representative Blanton of Texas, and he said it when the Wagner Act, establishing the National Labor Relations Act was being debated.

Mr. HATCH. I am not debating the Wagner Act but debating this act.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was after the Wagner Act that small businesses mushroomed, tripled, quadrupled. Your idea today is the idea that Blanton had in 1935, and I tried to explain that this is not a bill that is going to crush small business because 78 percent of small business is not even covered in the National Labor Relations Act.

Mr. President, I call attention to this dialog because I feel it serves to illustrate the plain fact that the opponents of this bill outside the Congress are determined to destroy it and will say almost anything their imaginations and their public relations personnel conjure up to discredit it, no matter how far off the mark they may be.

Let me be more specific. I have found that there are several dominant themes that run through the more thoughtfully written letters I have received in opposition to this bill. Almost without exception the constituent's objection to the proposed legislation is based on a misconception or misunderstanding about the legislative intent of the bill.

For example, as noted earlier, one of the most frequent misconceptions reflected in my mail is the suggestion that this bill will have a devasting impact among small businesses. The fact is, there are no provisions in S. 2467 which affect small businesses more than large businesses. The size of the firms over which the National Labor Relations Board asserts jurisdiction is not changed by this legislation. Recent figures supplied by the National Labor Relations Board show that only 22 percent of all firms are covered by the NLRB.

However, Mr. President, in view of the continuing concern that somehow this bill might adversely impact small businesses, our distinguished majority leader today has wisely introduced—and I have joined him as a cosponsor—unprinted amendment No. 1323, to printed amendment No. 1768. This amendment will accomplish two significant objectives. First, it will create within the Office of the General Counsel of the NLRB an ombudsman charged primarily with the responsibility for gathering and disseminating information to persons covered by this act and particularly to small businesses.

Second, it will have the effect of codifying those jurisdictional standards administratively set by the NLRB as of May 1, 1978, thus precluding the Board from expanding its jurisdiction beyond that which it currently exercises. Therefore, Mr. President, the current situation whereby 78 percent of the country's employers, notably small businesses, are not being covered by the Board, would be embraced by statute.

A second misconception widely believed is that the bill will allow unions to force representation elections so fast that the employer will never get a chance to tell his side of the story. The fact is that S. 2467 sets time limits for the holding of NLRB elections at 21 to 30 days when a majority of the employees request an election, and the unit is covered by a Board rule; 45 days in other cases where less than a majority request an election; and no more than 75 days in any case. The aim of this provision is to expedite the election process, and, in particular, prevent the international delay of representation elections for the purpose of discouraging the exercise of employee free choice.

Opponents claim that the time limits amount to "quickie" elections that will lead to "pushbutton unionism." However, the facts tell a different story. The time limits will not drastically change current practice in most election cases. The establishment of time limits, however, will curb the cases of international abuse and delay of election procedures. According to NLRB records, in fiscal year 1977, 82 percent of all representation elections were held in a median time of 45.3 days. Consent elections, that is, elections in which the employer and the union agreed to the definition of the unit and eligible employees, and agreed to abide by the regional director's decision in the election, were held in a median of 37.6 days, or only 8 days beyond the proposed limit which would apply to cases in which a majority of the employees requested an election. Under current practices, no one is calling them quickie elections or talking about pushbutton unionism. Thus, in many cases, there would be little change from the current election timetables. The deadlines would apply particularly to the cases in which the election process is drawn out or delayed far beyond what is necessary.

I would point out, Mr. President, that employers currently enjoy under existing law the right to obtain an expedited election in certain situations.

Section 8(b)(7) of the NLRA prohibits recognition picketing if there is a lawfully recognized union or if there has been an election within 12 months. In addition, that section prohibits a union from engaging in recognition picketing for more than 30 days without an election petition being filed. The petition for an election can be filed by either the union or the employer and the picketing may continue while the petition is being processed. If the employer files an 8(b)(7)(c) charge, the Board handles the petition in accordance with expedited procedure. These expedited elections triggered by an employer's unfair labor practice charge have taken a median of 19 days. However, there is no comparable way a union can trigger such an expedited election.

In all the rhetoric we have heard over the so-called quickie elections, I have not heard, Mr. President, any of the opponents of the bill contending that the above "quickie election" available to employers alone ought to be abrogated.

A third misconception which is commonly voiced is that the bill will force employers to permit union organizers on their property any time they choose and disrupt business and production while they address the employees during working hours. The fact is the equal access provision of S. 2467 does not require that an employer subsidize the union's election campaign. It merely requires that the employees be given the same opportunity to hear both sides of the issues, and I would point out, Mr. President, that the bill would give the union no new rights at all unless the employer triggers such right by its own action. This means that if the employer chooses to stop production and make a speech to his employees concerning the election campaign, the union would then be given a similar opportunity to make a speech to the employees, under the same circumstances (i.e., if the employer paid the employees to hear an antiunion speech, then he would pay them to hear the union speech). Just as Federal election laws require equal time in certain elections, this provision would require that the employees receive information on a union election campaign from both sides.

Such a provision as the "equal access" provision is even more necessary in the small firm because it is those smaller work places where the employer has had personal contact with the employees, and the employees are probably very much aware of the employer's views on unions. Thus, the employer has already very likely had ample opportunity to talk about unions to the employees. All this provision does is to give employees an opportunity to hear both sides, the employer's and the union's, under similar conditions.

A fourth misconception I observe seeping into the dialog on this bill is that by expanding the NLRB from five to seven members the Carter administration will assure a prolabor majority on the Board for the foreseeable future. The fact is that the bill also contains a provision which would statutorily assure what has always been the practice, that no more than a simple majority of the Board members be from the same political party. The contention that this will create a biased NLRB is unfounded. The Board has always been held in the highest esteem by labor and business adherents, and has always been nonpolitical, regardless of what President has made the appointments.

The proposal to enlarge the Board is not new. It was originally part of the Senate NLRA amendments in 1947 and was vigorously endorsed by Senator Taft. Recently, the American Bar Association Labor Law Committee—made up of lawyers representing labor and business—advocated expanding the Board from five to nine members to help deal with the rising caseload.

As noted in the committee report (95–628), the number of contested unfair labor practice decisions issued by the National Labor Relations Board has increased from 115 in 1947 to over 1,100 in fiscal year 1977. This increasing workload has resulted in substantial delays in deciding individual cases.

The fifth misconception I perceive surfacing on this bill is that it will allow the Federal Government to set wage scales for unionized employees. The fact is that S. 2467 will in no way impose a federally mandated wage and fringe benefit settlement on the parties to a collective-bargaining agreement. The so-called make-whole provision would only allow the Board to impose a remedy for a "refusal to bargain" unfair labor practice prior to the first contract. Currently there is no effective remedy for this type of unfair labor practice. The remedy would "make whole" employees who have been denied the benefits of a collective-bargaining agreement due to an illegal refusal to bargain by the employer. Under present law, once a "refusal to bargain" violation under NLRA section 8(a)(5) has been found, the only enforcement remedy available to the NLRB is to issue a bargaining order to the employer to do what he should have done in the first instance. There is no remedy for the employees who have been denied the benefits of a collective-bargaining agreement.

Furthermore, the make-whole remedy as defined in S. 2467, is in no way an imposed wage or benefit rate. Rather, it is a method by which a fair and equitable monetary amount can objectively be arrived at by the Board to award employees who have suffered due to the illegal acts of others. The amount is fair because it relates to actual bargaining situations in the time period during which the employer should have had the benefits of bargaining. It is administratively expeditious since it will not require additional litigation over the amount, and it is modest, since it represents a percentage amount of what the employees were already earning. Also, it applies only in the period in which the refusal to bargain unfair labor practice occurred. As soon as the employer begins to bargain in good faith, its liability will cease to run. And, as indicated earlier, the remedy is available only in first contract situations.

It should also be noted that this remedy is in no way a Government-imposed agreement because the statutory language of NLRA section 8(d) is left intact as follows:

> * * * but such obligation (to bargain collectively) does not compel either party to agree to a proposal or require the making of a concession * * *

The sixth misconception raises the question of why there are no penalties in the bill for union violations of the labor laws while it imposes stiff penalties on employers. In dealing with this issue it is important to recognize that while S. 2467 does make additional remedies available to the Board in unfair labor practice situations, it should be emphasized that these remedies will be imposed only after the normal processes of review and appeal by the regional staff, an administrative law judge, the Board, and, if necessary, the courts. And all of these levels of administration must have found someone to have broken the law by committing an unfair labor practice. If no violation of law occurs, then no remedy, new or old, need be imposed.

Also, the remedies which are provided for in this legislation will apply equally to employers and to unions. If a union causes an employer to discriminate against an employee, then the union could be liable for a 150 percent backpay award. If the union is a willful violator of a final court or Board order, it, too, will lose Government contracts. I am advised by the Labor Department that for fiscal year 1978 alone, that agency held contracts with labor organizations totaling in excess of $36 million. In order to specifically list each of the unions and the amount of the Government contracts, I ask unanimous consent Mr. President, that the table which I shall submit at the conclusion of my remarks be inserted at the appropriate place in the RECORD. Moreover, debarment is not the only remedy available since in appropriate cases the Board could still elect to seek court contempt citations against a willful union violator.

Furthermore, these modest amendments to the National Labor Relations Act must be seen in the overall legislative history of the act. The original NLRA (Wagner Act of 1935) was aimed mainly at protecting the right of workers to organize, and established five unfair labor practices of employers. In 1947, the Taft-Hartley Act virtually rewrote the NLRA and placed sanctions on union activity that were not part of the labor law previously. These amendments added six specific unfair labor practices, including recognitional and organizational picketing, and additional secondary boycott prohibitions. Other titles of this legislation, (title I through VI) are concerned with such matters as: Union member rights (title I); union reporting requirements (title II); union trusteeships (title III); election of union officers (title IV); safeguards for labor organizations (bonding) (title V); and miscellaneous provisions (title VI).

It is evident then, that the development of our Federal labor laws has been an evolutionary experience. This evolution has often been in response to particular problems and needs which the law was not equipped to handle. To argue that the amendments of S. 2467 are one-sided and deal only with employer violations is to ignore the entire body of labor laws, and particularly the Taft-Hartley and Landrum-Griffin amendments to the NLRA, which dealt almost exclusively with violations by or perceived problems caused by labor organizations.

While on the subject of penalties provided in the bill for violations of the law, there is one other aspect of the issue which needs to be addressed that is quite separate and distinct from the question of unfair labor practices. That is the matter of labor racketeering and labor violence. Opponents of this legislation have asserted that the bill is one-sided because it does not adequately address these problems.

As discussed above, there are several current provisions of labor law (particularly under various titles of the Landrum-Griffin Act) which govern the administration of labor unions. In addition to this law, there are at least nine current Federal statutes which are applicable to labor racketeering and pension fund abuse. The fact is, there is no dearth of laws covering problems in this area. The problems may lie in enforcement.

Recently the Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee heard testimony from the Departments of Justice and Labor to the effect that an additional 80 to 120 persons working under the Labor Department will be assigned to the President's strike force against organized crime.

While recent hearings have highlighted problems of labor racketeering, the headlines should be put in perspective. Deputy Attorney General Benjamin Civiletti, in testimony before the Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee (April 24, 1978), estimated that 300 union locals across the country are severely influenced by racketeers. Certainly, this is a serious problem. But the 300 union locals from less than one-half of 1 percent of all union locals in the United States. Those responsible for enforcing the labor-racketeering laws should do so more forcefully, while the extent of such illegal activity should not cloud the name of the 99.5 percent of union locals that have no such problems.

A recent publication by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, Congressional Action (May 5, 1978) stated that—

> . . . It is reasonable to expect that the enactment of S. 2467 will increase the amount of labor violence across the country.

It is hardly reasonable to expect an increase in violence as a result of this legislation. Even if there was a serious problem of labor violence, this is not the purview of the labor-relations laws or of the NLRB. Violent activity is by and large governed by State and local law and enforced by State and local jurisdictions. If Congress saw fit to extend Federal responsibility into the area of violence during labor disputes, the proper place would be amendments to the Hobbs Act, not to the National Labor Relations Act.

Still another misconception—the seventh—I would like to address, involves the charge that the bill will cause skyrocketing inflation. Various predictions and a few studies have been made claiming that this legislation will greatly increase the rate of inflation. Such arguments show, Mr. President, just how far afield from the issue and the substance of this legislation the critics of S. 2467 have gone.

The fact of the matter is that the essential element of this bill is to preserve and guarantee in practice employee free choice on the matter of union representation. If employees truly desire to be represented by a union, they should have that right—A right which is currently part of Federal labor policy, and which has not changed since it was first established in the Norris-LaGuardia Act of 1932. The right of workers to form or join a union, is not at issue in this debate.

The so-called economic studies of the impact of this bill on inflation rest on the grossly overstated premise that this legislation will result in major increases in union memership. One study—by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce—bases its economic impact on an increase in unionization of from the current 25 percent of the employed workers to 37 percent. This would be a 51 percent increase in union membership, or an increase of nearly 10 million persons.

I should hasten to point out that this would be a larger increase in union membership than that which occurred between 1935 and 1940 following passage of the Wagner Act when union membership increased by only 5,133 million. Obviously, such projections are simply unjustified.

On the other hand, Mr. President, if we take the Chamber's figures at face value, it occurs to me that passage of this legislation is all the more essential because—according to the Chamber's own projections—there are apparently millions of employees in the work force today who want to join unions but are reluctant to do so under the current conditions that exist for fear that they may lose their jobs. Surely, Mr. President, if this is true, Congress would be remiss if it failed to provide these millions of workers with the necessary protection to exercise their rights as spelled out in the 1935 Wagner Act.

The eighth and final misconception continually coming to my attention concerns repeal of section 14(b) of the National Labor Relations Act so that the so-called right to work laws of several States will be nullified. In ads and statements many opponents of the labor law reform bill have stated or implied that if this legislation is passed it will repeal section 14(b) of the NLRA (which allows State law to preempt the NLRA on union security clauses in collective bargaining contracts and thereby prohibit union shop agreements. One ad placed in several publications nationwide by the National Right to Work Committee began: "The Public Be Damned", it stated, "Union organizers will have a massive array of new legal weapons with which to blackmail employers into signing compulsory unionism contracts. Hundreds of thousands more workers will be forced to join or support unions against their will * * * most Americans strongly oppose the sort of forced unionism that S. 1883 would promote."

Such rhetoric is totally unfounded. The fact is, S. 2467 in no way deals with or attempts to modify section 14(b) of the current NLRA, the so-called right to work clause. Union security is not an issue in this legislation. As a matter of fact, section 12 of S. 2467 will lessen somewhat union security clauses. It would allow religious conscientious objectors whose beliefs require that they not support a labor union to pay an amount equivalent to union dues or initiation fees to a separate fund from the labor union.

Mr. President, it is clear to objective analysts of this legislation that the debate has gone far from the mark, the rhetoric is overkill. Two quotes from the May 5, 1978 Congressional Action (U.S. Chamber of Commerce) serve as examples:

S. 2467 is an outrageous and arrogant move to give unions special advantages in representation elections and collective bargaining.

They represent elaborate efforts by the big union bosses and the Meany crowd to save their plummeting union membership across the country by forcing unionization on business.

Such inflammatory rhetoric does not clarify; it clouds the issues involved. Unions are not given special advantages by this bill. Employees will be assured the right to vote, free from coercion and free from intentional dilatory tactics of the modern day union buster. This legislation will not affect the parties who sit at the collective bargaining table. It gives no additional power or rights to either side in collective bargaining relationships. It does, however, attempt to insure that the rights currently afforded to employees are in practice guaranteed. This legislation in no way forces unionization on business. In the unique and intricate U.S. system of representation elections and NLRB certification, it is the employees who decide by secret ballot whether or not they desire union representation. This system is not altered in any way by the pending bill.

In summary, I believe S. 2467 legislation represents a reasonable, fair, and balanced reform of the National Labor Relations Act. Its authors have rightly attempted to improve various aspects of the labor laws that have proved to work too slowly, or to be too cumbersome to guarantee the purpose of the law. Furthermore, based upon testimony presented to Congress during the course of hearings on the proposed bill, it was clearly established that a surprisingly large number of employers have found it cost effective to repeatedly and flagrantly violate the law as it relates to employee rights and collective bargaining. Indeed, it is particularly disturbing that these violations appear to be on the increase as more and more companies conclude that when it comes to collective bargaining, there is a positive cost-benefit ratio derived from litigating with a union's attorney in court rather than negotiating with a union's spokesman across the table.

It is my well considered judgment that this bill, S. 2467, as reported, will strengthen the protection against economic coercion of employees and emphasize the holding of prompt and democratic elections when employees clearly desire such an election. Furthermore, because the proposed legislation focuses on these specific problems, I believe its passage will enhance the collective bargaining process and ultimately work to the betterment of management, labor, and the economy of the Nation as a whole.

Mr. President, for the reasons stated I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this important labor law reform measure.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that I may have printed in the RECORD a table, at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Union contracts: Fiscal year 1978

Amalgamated Clothing & Textile Workers Union	$507,000
Anchorage (Alaska) Building and Construction Trades Council	160,000
Appalachian Council	2,201,000

Total	36,756,000

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, on behalf of the distinguished senior Senator from Oregon (Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD) I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Jeff Boothe of his staff be granted the privilege of the floor during continuation of the debate and vote on the pending business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

WORLD BANK SPURS OIL SEARCH IN THIRD WORLD NATIONS

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, the International Bank of Reconstruction and Development has just released the details of a major new program of lending and technical assistance to develop oil resources in non-OPEC developing nations. The World Bank is prepared to spend up to $500 million a year in this endeavor. According to the Washington Post article which appeared on Wednesday, May 24, the Bank projects that Third World nations will be able to increase their oil production levels from a present level of 3.8 million barrels a day to 10.3 million in 1990 as a result of this program. I wholeheartedly commend the World Bank for its initiative.

The implications of this projected increased oil production are enormous and the benefits to the United States substantial. Increased oil production by non-OPEC developing nations would diversify the world's energy sources thereby lessening the hold of OPEC on oil supplies and pricing. It would also substantially ease the financial problems of the non-OPEC developing nations who are presently importing up to 80 percent of their oil at $13 a barrel cartel prices.

I do believe, however, that the World Bank should also examine the possibility of establishing a companion program to harness the Sun's energy in Third World nations. The long-term benefits of such an initiative would be even greater than those of the oil program. While oil will greatly help these nations develop in the near term, their long-term energy needs must ultimately be met, as must ours, by renewable energy resources.

The developing and developed world cannot afford to wait to develop solar energy until oil shortages reach crisis proportions. Major solar development programs must be initiated now. I believe that the World Bank is an ideal institution to launch such an international effort. I urge it to move expeditiously on this front.

Mr. President, I ask that the Washington Post article entitled "Bank Spurs Oil Search in Third World Nations" be printed in the RECORD.

BANK SPURS OIL SEARCH IN THIRD-WORLD NATIONS

(By William Greider)

A new and promising frontier for world oil production, potentially larger than the Alaskan and North Sea fields combined, is being developed with financial help from the World Bank.

The frontier lies in roughly 50 of the world's poorer countries, the underdeveloped nations of Africa, Latin America and Asia, which were long neglected as potential sources for new oil but are now regarded as rich in possibilities.

World Bank officials yesterday announced details of a broad program of lending and technical assistance of up to $500 million a year, intended to help 50 to 60 oil-importing nations become self-sufficient oil producers in the next decade.

This would greatly ease the financial strains on those nations, which now import as much as 80 percent of their oil at the $13-a-barrel cartel prices. Those countries suffered most when oil prices soared five years ago.

But Third World oil development should also benefit Western Industrial nations, like the United States, by easing some of the pressure for increased production and higher prices on Saudi Arabia and other members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries cartel.

According to the World Bank's "cautious" projections the less-developed countries are expected to increase their oil production levels from 3.8 million barrels a day to 8.5 million by 1985 and 10.4 million in 1990.

At present, these nations together import about 2 million barrels daily from OPEC producers. By 1990, they are expected to be net exporters, taking care of their own growth in oil consumption and selling 1.5 million to 2 million barrels to the rest of the world.

So far, the bank has made one loan of $150 million to India for the development of an offshore field. By the end of next year, it hopes to have eight projects under way totaling $500 million, which will be "seed" financing to generate $3 billion to $4 billion in other investment capital.

Bank-assisted projects are under discussion in Bangladesh, Pakistan, Turkey, Thailand, Syria, Tunisia, Egypt, Zaire, Argentina, Colombia, Chad and Bolivia, among others.

"In five years," said Efrain Friedmann, energy expert at the World Bank, "we will be doing twice what we did in the last 30 years."

The new trend rests upon two premises. The high world price engineered by OPEC now makes it possible, even mandatory, for smaller nations to develop less promising exploration areas. And according to recent studies, these areas in underdeveloped countries have a potential for new oil two or three times greater than the conventional wisdom has long predicted.

"These things turn around so fast," Friedmann said. The estimates and projections of potential new oil, he added, have historically proven to be "unbalanced on the conservative side."

Mexico is currently the world's startling example of this phenomenon. A few years ago, Mexico was importing oil; now it is developing production and will enter the ranks of major exporters—more than 2.5 million barrels a day—within a decade.

In the pre-OPEC past, as the World Bank experts explain it, there was little or no incentive for either major oil companies or individual nations to develop their domestic oil and gas. Oil cost $3 a barrel and the major multinational companies spent less than 7 percent of their exploration capital in the non-OPEC developing nations.

The major companies were discouraged from exploration elsewhere by political instabilities or nationalistic hostilities. Some nations were content to develop their own fields slowly and exclude the international companies. Since 1973, that has changed in nations such as Brazil, Argentina, Chile and Columbia.

The World Bank portrays its role in these arrangements as "honest broker"—reassuring the corporations of political stability and helping the poor nations to assemble the financing from various international lending organizations and private investment.

In some instances, the oil fields will be too small to interest the multinational giants. In those cases, the World Bank hopes to provide the technical assistance which would help national oil companies to develop their own resources.

Many of the more promising geological areas are in countries that lack the technological expertise to develop their own resources and, therefore, should be more attractive to the international companies.

These include Bangladesh, Guatemala, Nicaragua, the Philippines, Thailand, Vietnam and most countries on the West Coast of Africa.

The World Bank's policy is based on part on a global study by Bernardo F. Grossling of the U.S. Geological Survey, who concluded that the potential for oil discoveries in the less-developed nations is two or three times greater than the pessimistic estimates of conventional reserve figures.

Grossling determined that the main reason not much oil has been found in those countries is that relatively little drilling has been done on those continents over the years. In Africa's 5 million square miles of prospective areas, only 12,850 wells had been drilled by 1975—compared with 2.4 million wells drilled in the United States.

The traditional explanation for the lack of drilling activity in underdeveloped countries included the claim that past explorations yielded poor results. But Grossling's study discovered that the reverse was true. Over the years, more oil was discovered per foot of drilling in Africa and Latin America than in the United States or Western Europe.

Based on his calculations of drilling and potential discovery areas, Grossling concluded that the developing countries represent about half of the world's prospective areas but only about 4 percent of the world's exploratory drilling has taken place in those countries.

None of the experts claim that another Middle East, which has 45 giant fields, awaits to be discovered somewhere in the world. But Grossling predicts that Africa, Latin America and Asia each has three to eight giant fields yet to be found.

CONCERN ABOUT THE OMI WALDEN NOMINATION

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, I wish to call to the attention of my colleagues an unfortunate situation involving the consideration of a nominee for a post in the Department of Energy. By oversight or for other reasons, the White House is failing to expedite the consideration of its nominee for Assistant Secretary of Energy for Conservation and Solar Applications, Omi Walden of the Georgia Energy Office. This post remains open 8 months after the creation of the Department of Energy. As a consequence, sound management of important conservation and solar initiatives is being impaired.

The White House nominated Omi Walden on January 25. Yet it is now May 26, and there has yet to be even a hearing on her nomination. Mr. President, I wish to inform my colleagues of the chain of events since December that have prevented the disposition of this nomination.

In January an investigative reporter, Mr. Charles Thompson, published some extremely serious charges about Ms. Walden's administration of several energy programs. Since that date, there have been other rumors of scandal. These allegations prompted the Senate Energy Committee to expect a full report on Ms. Walden from the White House.

Initially, the White House responded that it would take some time to provide such a report, as investigators at the Justice Department were conducting a criminal investigation of federally related energy activities in Georgia at the time of the 1973 oil embargo, well before Ms. Walden's tenure in office. There was some confusion as to whether the White House, Justice, or the Department of Energy was to be responsible for the report on Ms. Walden.

On April 12, the Walden report came to the Hill. It consisted of a 10-line memo from then-Assistant Attorney General for the Criminal Division Benjamin Civiletti, stating that Ms. Walden was guilty of no criminal wrongdoing, and contained no details of the investigation. Senators JACKSON and HANSEN indicated in an April 12 letter to the White House that this would be unacceptable, and requested full disclosure. The ball went back in the White House's court, where it still rests.

Mr. President, I find it unfortunate that this nomination has become bogged down by the allegations of scandal. The Conservation and Solar Applications Administrator of DOE oversees programs which are our best hope to meet energy needs at reasonable cost and with minimal environmental risks. This is a rapidly expanding program area as the Nation makes up for past neglect of conservation and of renewable resources. It is important that a competent administrator be in place to provide management for this program area for several years.

Instead, Conservation and Solar Applications has had an Acting Assistant Secretary for the 8 months since DOE's birth on October 1, 1977. His status as an interim administrator inevitably gives him less leverage in DOE policymaking. He is unable to start initiatives which he will not be in a position to direct a few months from now, and he cannot establish the final organization for his division. These latter decisions must be reserved for a Senate-confirmed Assistant Secretary.

Mr. President, I call upon Secretary Schlesinger and the White House to move quickly to settle the question raised about this nomination. I do not imply that the charges should be forgotten. In fact I expect that they will be fully aired, either in Energy Committee or in another congressional forum. I do want to see things move quickly on this nomination. It would be an unfortunate occurrence indeed if there were no Assistant Secretary for Conservation and Solar Applications in place when Congress adjourns in early October, especially since that will be DOE's first birthday.

THE ALLIANCE TO SAVE ENERGY AND THE IMPORTANCE OF ENERGY CONSERVATION

Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, for the benefit of many of my colleagues in the Senate and House who have a relationship with ASE, on April 27, 1978, the board of directors of the Alliance To Save Energy held its first annual meeting. This meeting gave the board an opportunity to meet my distinguished colleague from California, Senator CRANSTON, who recently replaced the late Senator Humphrey as cochairman of the alliance. I am delighted, as is the board of directors and the alliance staff, that Senator CRANSTON has decided to become involved in the alliance's vital efforts to promote energy conservation.

April 27 proved to be an extremely full and educational day. After a morning session in which alliance business was discussed, the board of directors went to the CIA Headquarters for a briefing by Admiral Turner on the CIA's projections for the international energy situation to 1985.

Basing his remarks on the April 1977 CIA analysis of energy supply and demand, Admiral Turner stressed that, without greatly increased energy conservation, projected world demand for oil will substantially exceed capacity supply by 1985. Moreover, Admiral Turner feels that, between 1979 and 1985, "increasing world demand and stagnating oil production in the major consuming countries will result in increased reliance of OPEC oil."

While I am aware of the controversy surrounding some aspects of the CIA energy analysis, I do believe that its basic conclusion that oil demand will soon exceed oil supply cannot be refuted. Therefore, whether the shortage comes in 1985 or 1990, it is clear that energy conservation is absolutely critical.

The Alliance To Save Energy, as a private and independent entity, is well suited to bring the energy conservation message home to the American people: It champions no special interests, and has no ideology to espouse other than the self interest of individuals and the Nation in saving energy. I am very pleased that the alliance has made considerable progress in spreading this message.

In its first year, the alliance evolved into the country's only nonprofit organization dedicated to reducing energy waste. The alliance to date has a number of accomplishments under its belt.

It has cosponsored 25 conferences around the Nation involving businesses, trade associations, policymakers, and concerned citizens, with a total attendance of 30,000 people. It assisted in the preparation of a report on industrial energy use that will be published this month by the conference board. The alliance is developing training programs for members of the National Home Improvement Council and the National Lumber and Building Material Dealers Association.

The alliance is producing monthly news features on energy conservation. Over 570 newspapers and 930 corporate publications subscribe to this service.

Several million copies of a new alliance publication, "101 Ways to Save Money by Saving Energy," are expected to soon be distributed by the Boy Scouts of America.

I am especially enthused about taking the message of the alliance into every American home. To deliver the conservation message, the alliance is working with the advertising council to produce a series of energy conservation television ads for use later this year.

I am confident that the alliance's second year will be even more productive.

Mr. President, I ask that the executive summary of the proceedings of the annual meeting of the Alliance To Save Energy, my annual report to the board of directors of the alliance, and the summary of the CIA briefing be placed in the RECORD at this time.

The material follows:

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY OF THE PROCEEDINGS OF THE ANNUAL MEETING OF THE ALLIANCE TO SAVE ENERGY

"There is an even greater need for the Alliance today than when we formed it a year ago," said Senator Percy at the Annual Board meeting. That opinion also was expressed by Richard McGraw and the Board members, committee chairmen and guests agreed that solving the nations energy problem must be done in large measure by the private sector and the Alliance is the private sector.

The Board, and particularly the new co-chairman, Senator Cranston, expressed their enthusiastic support for the activities of the Alliance and took special note of the several first year accomplishments.

Noting that the financial development of the Alliance had proceeded in an ad hoc manner the first year, the Board expressed strong support for active leadership and participation in the fundraising strategy presented by Daniel Parker. Specifically, Mr. David Packard and Senator Cranston recommended the Alliance identify 200 to 250 corporations who would make an annual commitment of $10,000 and $25,000 and then identify those members of the Board who can lead a campaign to get those funds. All agreed that such leadership and participation is necessary in order to raise the funds to meet the $1.76 million budget for the balance of this year and the estimated $2.5 million budget for 1979.

The audited financial statement shows the Alliance to be an efficient organization with approximately 71 percent of the funds being spent on program development and execution and 29 percent on administrative costs.

There was also strong support for more active leadership and participation by the Advisory Board committees in developing, planning and executing Alliance programs and projects.

As he pointed out the great need for the Alliance, Senator Percy said oil imports are up 20 percent over 1976 levels, demand for electricity grew 4.6 percent last year, total energy demand grew 3 percent in 1977, and domestic energy production has remained constant since 1975. He also said the Alliance had made substantial progress in its first year and most notably had a significant educational impact on the Congress.

Richard McGraw highlighted the Alliance's progress over the first year in his annual report. He said the Alliance now has a full time staff of eight, there are now 721 people and organizations associated with the Alliance, even though there has been no membership campaign; three state Alliances and one community Alliance have been formed; the Alliance raised and spent $336,000 on programs to improve energy efficiency in 1977, and the Alliance now has more than a dozen programs underway and operating. Most notable among them are the Ad Council Campaign and the Boy Scout project of distributing "101 Ways to Save Money by Saving Energy."

In other actions, the Board:

Nominated Messrs. John deButts, American Telephone and Telegraph; William Hewitt, Deere and Co.; Don Perkins, Jewel Tea; and Marvin Davis, Davis Oil Co., to the Board subject to their being willing to and enthusiastic about serving. Additionally, Mr. Reginald Jones, General Electric, was nominated to the Board pending a vacancy occurring. The Executive Committee was increased to 11 and Mrs. Marjorie Benton, Mr. Charles Hitch and Mr. Gene Pokorny were elected to the Executive Committee.

Reelected Mr. Richard McGraw and Mr. Mike Runde as Executive Director and Secretary of the Alliance respectively, and Mr. Daniel Parker was elected as Treasurer.

Passed strong resolutions of thanks to the late Senator Hubert H. Humphrey and Carla Hills.

Committee reports were made by the Residential, Transportation, Food and Fiber, Alliance Conference, and Communications Committees.

ANNUAL REPORT BY THE CHAIRMAN OF THE ALLIANCE TO SAVE ENERGY, SENATOR CHARLES H. PERCY

In the year since the founding of the Alliance, there has been ever more dramatic evidence of the need to conserve:

Oil imports grew to 8.7 million barrels per day, up to 20% over 1976;

Demand for electricity grew 4.6% for the year;

Total domestic energy demand grew at 3.0% for the year;

Domestic energy production has remained constant since 1975.

We saw the proposal by the President of an energy policy that acknowledged conservation as its central thrust. We then saw a dismantling of these proposals by skeptical Senate members who have not yet come to realize the economic benefits of saving BTU's. The fate of the National Energy Plan remains uncertain, more than one year after the President's energy speech.

In this climate of uncertainty, there is even more of a need for ASE than there was a year ago:

To educate the general public on the economic advantages of storm windows, insulation, carpooling, and so on;

To work with industry and its trade associations to show the quick payback of furnace and boiler modifications, cogeneration of steam and electricity, and new industrial processes;

To assist state and local governments as they seek to revise outdated building codes, zoning, or tax provisions that encourage energy waste;

To work with Washington policymakers to show the advantages of energy-efficiency proposals.

Energy prices are still climbing. Residential heating oil prices rose over 8% in 1977; natural gas prices were up 29%. They will climb even more as policymakers or market forces allow them to approach replacement cost levels. As prices rise, the payback period for conservation investments shortens, and the potential for conservation energy increases.

But price is not enough. Consumers and firms must become aware of the alternatives to paying their high monthly gas and electric bills. The Alliance, as a private and independent entity, is ideally suited to educate and to bring people together: it has no axe to grind, no ideology to espouse other than the self interest of individuals and of the nation in saving energy.

In its first year the Alliance has enjoyed substantial success. From my perspective, I believe the Alliance has had a significant educational impact on the Congress, the Advertising Council program is about to get underway, we have orders from the Boy Scouts for more than 3 million copies of our booklet, "101 Ways to Save Money by Saving Energy," and there are other successful programs. I think you as members of the Board of Directors, the members of the Board of Advisors, Chairmen, the Advisory Board Committee, those who have funded the opcration and the staff can feel proud of the Alliance's accomplishments.

Two people, particularly, should be commended for their efforts.

One is the late Senator Hubert H. Humphrey, my very dear friend and Senate colleague and the founding chairman of the Alliance.

A resolution has been suggested commending the late Senator Humphrey and I should like to read it:

"Whereas Senator Hubert Humphrey was a guiding spirit behind the creation of the Alliance to Save Energy; and

"Whereas Senator Hubert Humphrey recognized the need for energy conservation long before many of us; and

"Whereas Senator Hubert Humphrey foresaw the enormous potential of solar energy more quickly than most; and

"Whereas Senator Hubert Humphrey worked diligently and compassionately to help this nation, as well as the poorest nations, to solve its energy problems: Now therefore, be it

"Resolved that the Board of Directors of the Alliance to Save Energy honors and commemorates Senator Hubert Humphrey for his services to this organization and his commitment to energy conservation."

The other person whom I feel deserves special thanks is Carla Hills. Carla could not be with us today, but this is the first meeting she has missed.

A Resolution also has been suggested thanking Carla and I should like to read it:

"Whereas Carla Hills provided invaluable leadership to the Alliance to Save Energy in its first year; and

"Whereas Carla Hills unselfishly devoted over 70% of her time volunteering for the Alliance; and

"Whereas Carla Hills will continue to aid the Alliance in her role as chairman: Now therefore, be it

"Resolved that the Board of Directors of the Alliance to Save Energy is deeply indebted to Carla Hills for her inspirational leadership and guidance and thanks her for all she has done to assure the success of the Alliance to Save Energy."

THE INTERNATIONAL ENERGY SITUATION TO 1985

(A summary of Admiral Turner's briefing to the board of directors of the Alliance to Save Energy)

"In the absence of greatly increased energy conservation, projected world demand for oil will approach productive capacity by the early 1980's and substantially exceed capacity by 1985 . . . prices will rise sharply to ration available supplies. . . .

"The underlying supply problem will be masked during the next few years because of greatly increased oil production from the North Sea and Alaska . . . Saudi excess capacity will be increasing during this period, allowing Riyadh to hold down oil prices in spite of upward pressure from other OPEC states. Since this will be a political decision the Saudis . . . could reverse it at any time for political reasons.

"Between 1979 and 1985, increasing world demand and stagnating oil production in the major consuming countries will result in increased reliance on OPEC oil. With the present expansion plans of the Saudis, their excess productive capacity will be exhausted by 1983, and with it their ability to act as a price moderator. . . ."

These conclusions from the April 1977 CIA international energy outlook continue to be the Agency's best estimate. While some aspects of the energy situation have changed in the past year, the CIA still foresees Western and Soviet Bloc economic constraints in the mid 1980's as a result of a world oil shortage and sharply rising OPEC prices in that time frame. A difficult combination of many optimistic assumptions is needed to be able to conclude that the world and the United States will not face a major oil price and supply problem by 1985.

The CIA study consists of projections of current trends assuming that present policies and attitudes do not change, rather than forecasts or predictions of what policies will be operable together with the consequent energy use patterns. The fundamental conclusion is that current policies and attitudes, when combined with anticipated energy demand and supply capabilities, result by 1985 in a world-wide demand for OPEC oil on the order of 48 million barrels per day (b/d). Even with the optimistic assumption that Saudi Arabia would be producing 12 million b/d and the rest of OPEC some 28 million b/d, that would leave an 8 million b/d shortfall.

WORLD ENERGY DEMAND

A year ago the U.S. energy demand in 1985 was projected to be equivalent to 48–50 million b/d, after adjusting the 1960–73 trend projection of 62 million b/d for a reduced economic growth rate (assumed to be between 4 and 5 percent annually) and for conservation. Now the CIA would lower this projection a bit reflecting a lower economic growth rate to 1985. The total OECD [1] energy demand is projected to be the equivalent of 99–102 million b/d. Conservation in the United States is seen, by 1985, as saving the equivalent of 5–7 million b/d of oil, and in the OECD countries the equivalent of 9–12 million b/d.

WORLD ENERGY PRODUCTION

Total OECD energy production was projected a year ago to be 63–66 million b/d oil equivalent in 1985, of which the United States would be producing 35–37 million b/d. By fuel type the U.S. energy production is:

[Million barrels per day oil equivalent]

	1970	1976	1980	1985
Oil and natural gas liquids	11.3	9.7	10.0	10.0–11.0
Natural gas	11.4	10.3	9.0–9.6	8.5–9.5
Coal	6.7	7.6	9.5–10.2	10.5–12.0
Hydro/geothermal	1.3	1.6	1.7	2.0
Nuclear	.1	1.0	1.6–1.8	2.5–3.8
Total	3.08	30.2	32.1–33.0	34.7–37.1

These projections remain pretty firm, although there is now some pessimism as to the U.S. coal estimate for 1985. No large increases from new supplies are seen between now and 1985 because of the lead times involved. The lower U.S. energy growth forecast from a year ago, together with the pessimism on coal production, leaves the net U.S. requirement for oil on the order 22–26 million b/d in 1985.

Estimates of Mexican oil reserve potential have increased in the past year. Mexico is now estimated to have 60 billion barrels, perhaps more. This should allow a significant increase in output—to 3–4.5 million b/d by 1985, with the higher figure being more likely. Exports should then be on the order of 3 million b/d.

BALANCING SUPPLY AND DEMAND

OPEC is now consuming about 2 million b/d of oil, an amount that should double by 1985. New non-OPEC supplies—e.g., North Sea, and Mexico—coming on stream this decade will allow the Free World demand on OPEC oil to remain at current levels (about 33 million b/d) through 1980. As this introduction of new, major supplies is not foreseen as continuing beyond 1980, there will be a surge demand (to 41–44 million b/d in 1985) for OPEC oil in the early 1980's (assuming no sharp OPEC price actions), because OPEC would then be called upon to supply all of the world's oil growth.

The Soviet Union will need to import for 2.5 million b/d in 1985, principally for the benefit of its Eastern European allies. Soviet oil production is anticipated to peak prior to 1982. Field-by-field analysis shows the Soviet economic plan calling for lower levels of oil production; actual Soviet production has consistently fallen below the 5-year plan target levels. Just what action the Soviets will take when faced with the switch from oil exporter to oil importer is not clear, for they are short of hard currency to pay for substantial oil imports. Stringent conservation and reduced economic growth are seen as two likely consequences.

The oil production capacity of the OPEC countries, other than Saudi Arabia, is 28 million b/d. More and more apparent are the difficulties these countries will have in maintaining maximum production at capacity levels. Indeed some countries (e.g., Kuwait) have a policy of not producing to full capacity. Saudi Arabia is seen in a balancing supply role, providing 5 million b/d in 1980, and being called upon to produce 16–19 million b/d in 1985, if world demand is to be met at current price levels. However, Saudi Arabia is now limiting its production to 8.5 million b/d and is taking a somewhat restrained course in developing future capacity. The best estimate is that Saudi Arabia could have a facility capacity of 14 million b/d by 1985, and a sustained production rate of 12 million b/d; these estimates may be optimistic.

[1] The CIA analysis does not include Australia and New Zealand in its OECD data. Thus, OECD, as used here, refers to its 19 European members, the U.S., Canada, and Japan.

OPPOSITION TO ERA TIME EXTENSION

Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent in the absence of the Senator from Utah, (Mr. HATCH) to print in the RECORD in his behalf historic official statements of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints opposing the extension of time for ERA ratification.

There being no objection, the statements were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF THE FIRST PRESIDENCY OF THE JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS OPPOSING EXTENSION OF TIME FOR RATIFICATION OF EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT

We feel that to extend the time for the ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment would be unwise as well as unfair.

The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (Mormon) has a profound veneration for the Constitution of the United States of America. We believe it was divinely inspired, and we take a serious interest in any proposed amendments to that basic document and the process itself by which the Constitution is amended. Furthermore, the Church has a very deep and everlasting commitment to the preservation and strengthening of the family, including its individual members. As a people who have in our history known the loss of our constitutional rights, we have long been concerned with the rights and interests of both men and women.

For these reasons, the Church has done what it rarely does—spoken out against a proposed constitutional amendment.

Our opposition to the Equal Rights Amendment as stated in our message of October 22, 1976 (attached) is clear and expresses genuine concern. But our concern over the Equal Rights Amendment has now been deepened by what appears to be a tampering with and an abuse of the process of amendment itself. To couple the extension of time with a restriction against reconsideration of previous ratifications would be most unwise for at least these reasons:

First, the continuation of the ERA ratification effort will increasingly divide and polarize this nation. Rather than bringing opposing sides closer together, any extension will see them grow further apart and become more set in their opposing views.

Second, to continue the divisive struggle for the ratification of the ERA is unfair to the interests of women. The additional time, money and energy which would be employed attempting to insure its passage could be more effectively used in other ways in the interest of women. If and where specific laws or practices exist which discriminate against women, we should devote our most conscientious efforts toward changing them. Each woman should be encouraged in her honorable aspirations for fulfillment and special esteem. Because all human life begins with her, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints has always held her in revered light.

Third, it seems clear that support for the ERA lacks the powerful consensus of that very large majority of people in the United States (two-thirds for action in the national Congress; three-fourths in the state legislatures) which is so wisely required by its framers to change the Constitution. Indeed, some states which have previously passed the amendment have now voted to rescind ratification. The formal procedures set up by the framers of the Constitution by which by which the Constitution is amended are part of the vitality of the Constitution. If these processes are abused, the Constitution is itself damaged and its power and influence among our people are proportionately diminished.

Fourth, we believe the Equal Rights Amendment has had its full chance to build the support that any constitutional amendment should have to secure passage. Any extension beyond seven years is unnecessary, unwise and unprecedented. The proposed amendment has enjoyed almost twice the time to seek ratification of any previous amendment which has been passed and three and one-half times longer than the average. The very careful process of amending the Constitution gives our nation time to arouse our intellects, to search our hearts, and to consult our consciences. That time has now passed.

Fifth, it would be deeply offensive to any sense of fairness to extend the deadline for ratification of the proposed Equal Rights Amendment so that some states which have refused ratification can change their mind but, at the same time, to refuse to allow other state legislatures the right to change their mind and rescind their previous acts of approval. Any such gross abuse of the democratic process and of the process of amending the Constitution could send a surge of cynicism through the land which might damage the Constitution itself. Why should there be an eccentric method of legislation applied to this one amendment?

Any extension at all is unwise, but a one-sided extension of the amending process regarding the Equal Rights Amendment would set a precedent for constitutional revision that could haunt America for years to come. Great uncertainty about the revision process would emerge if the amending process is extended over 14 years. And why not 21 years? Would the Americans of 1943 wish to have been bound by the action of state legislatures passed in 1929? Is it fair to allow a state to pass the Equal Rights Amendment in 1986 which refused to pass it is 1972, while refusing a state which passed in in 1972 the opportunity to rescind it in 1986? If the latest action of a state legislature is not valid, when is the will of the people as expressed through state legislatures not the will of the people?

Thus, changing the rules for a proposed amendment adds the possibility of great uncertainty in the amending process of the Constitution. An unduly protracted process of approval could raise doubts and encourage litigation. Once an amendment to the Constitution has been approved and is in place in that document, it would be unthinkable to let a state alter its action concerning that amendment. Prior to the formal placement of an amendment in the Constitution, states should be equally free, within a relatively short period of time, to approve or rescind their actions concerning any proposed amendment.

It would be tragic indeed if an amendment which claims to bring constitutional equality to women ended up injuring our Constitution. Our political process and institutions have, from time to time, been tainted and corrupted. However, when our nation has followed the procedure outlined in the Constitution to amend that document its integrity has been preserved. When thus amended, our Constitution has reflected a sufficiently strong will of the people that an issue is settled rather than being in doubt. This wise process permits our Constitution to remain safely above the fray and beyond the reach of corruption and manipulation, and hold the special place it enjoys in the hearts and minds of the people.

In affirming our allegiance to the United States of America, we express confidence that this nation is sufficiently strong and fair to be able to resolve any problems of inequality and unfairness to women, or any other group in our society, without abusing the amending process for our most basic document, the Constitution, and without undermining our most basic institution, the family.

STATEMENT OF THE FIRST PRESIDENCY OF THE CHURCH OF JESUS CHRIST OF LATTER-DAY SAINTS OPPOSING RATIFICATION OF THE EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT

From its beginnings, The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints has affirmed the exalted role of woman in our society.

In 1842, when women's organizations were little known, the Prophet Joseph Smith established the women's organization of the Church, the Relief Society, as a companion body of the Priesthood. The Relief Society continues to function today as a vibrant, world-wide organization aimed at strengthening motherhood and broadening women's learning and involvement in religious, compassionate, cultural, educational, and community pursuits.

In Utah, where our Church is headquartered, women received the right to vote in 1870, fifty years before the Nineteenth Amendment to the Constitution granted the right nationally.

There have been injustices to women before the law and in society generally. These we deplore.

There are additional rights to which women are entitled.

However, we firmly believe that the Equal Rights Amendment is not the answer.

While the motives of its supporters may be praiseworthy, ERA as a blanket attempt to help women could indeed bring them far more restraints and repressions. We fear it will even stifle many God-given feminine instincts.

It would strike at the family, humankind's basic institution. ERA would bring ambiguity and possibly invite extensive litigation.

Passage of ERA, some legal authorities contend, could nullify many accumulated benefits to woman in present statutes.

We recognize men and women as equally important before the Lord, but with differences biologically, emotionally, and in other ways.

ERA, we believe, does not recognize these differences. There are better means for giving women, and men, the rights they deserve.

LDS OPPOSE ADDITIONAL TIME FOR ERA APPROVAL

SALT LAKE CITY.—The First Presidency of The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints (Mormons) today announced its formal opposition to a proposal that the period allowed for ratification of the so-called Equal Rights Amendment to the U.S. Constitution be extended another seven years.

In a statement submitted to Representative Don Edwards (D-California) chairman of the House Judiciary Committee's subcommittee on civil and constitutional rights, the Church leaders said their opposition is based primarily on ". . . what appears to be a tampering with and an abuse of the process of amendment."

The statement was signed by Church President Spencer W. Kimball, leader of the world's four million Mormons, and his counselors in the First Presidency, N. Eldon Tanner and Marion G. Romney.

"We express confidence that this nation is sufficiently strong and fair to be able to resolve any problems of inequality and unfairness to women, or any other group in our society, without abusing the amending process for our most basic document," they said.

The Church leaders said continuation of the ERA ratification effort beyond the original deadline established by Congress "will increasingly divide and polarize this nation." They said that to continue the divisive struggle for ratification is "unfair to the interests of women" inasmuch as "the additional time, money and energy which would be employed attempting to insure its passage could be more effectively used in other ways in the interest of women."

It seems clear, the statement said, that the ERA lacks the support of the powerful consensus so wisely required by its framers to change the Constitution and that its proponents have had their full chance to build the support that any Constitutional amendment should have to secure passage.

"Any extension beyond seven years is unnecessary, unwise and unprecedented," the First Presidency said.

Finally, they reasoned that "it would be deeply offensive to any sense of fairness" to extend the deadline "so that some states which have refused ratification can change their minds but, at the same time, to refuse to allow other state legislatures the right to change their minds and rescind their previous acts of approval.

"Any such gross abuse of the democratic process and of the process of amending the Constitution could send a surge of cynicism through the land which might damage the Constitution itself."

SOVIET OIL FUTURES

Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent, in the absence of the distinguished Senator from Utah, Senator GARN, that his statement be printed in the RECORD, including an editorial from the Washington Star on Soviet oil futures and excerpts from a committee report on the Soviet oil situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATEMENT OF SENATOR GARN

It is not often that a Senate study causes a leading newspaper to "eat a bit of crow." But the recently published, "The Soviet Oil Situation: An Evaluation of CIA Analyses of Soviet Oil Production," prepared by the staff of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence has accomplished just that. At least two kudos are in order.

In the first place, the willingness of the Washington Star, as manifest in their May 23, 1978 editorial (reprinted below) to admit that they may have let their "preconceptions" skew their coverage of the CIA's oil studies of last year is a healthy sign of open-mindedness. It is difficult for any of us to admit we may have been wrong—especially a leading newspaper. The Star editorial writers are to be congratulated for being amenable to additional information.

Second, the staff of the Intelligence Committee ought to be congratulated for a study which the Star refers to as a "model government paper—incisive, interesting and judicious—a document that may reveal more about the gathering and use of foreign intelligence in 30 pages than more sensational studies do in hundreds." As the editorial says,

"The fine spadework of the Senate Intelligence Committeee staff . . . serves also to clear the way for a sober consideration of the strategic implications of the Soviet oil dilemma."

It is refreshing to see that the committee is willing to give praise where such is due, as well as expose wrongdoing where that may be necessary. The CIA and the Nation are well-served in having an objective and even-handed committee carrying out oversight of important intelligence activities.

[From the Washington Star, May 23, 1978]

SOVIET OIL FUTURES

Having poked our noses into last spring's debate about the credibility of CIA reports on Soviet oil troubles—and the use President Carter made of them to boost his energy bill—we think it only fair to eat a bit of crow.

You may have noticed that the staff of the Senate Intelligence Committee undertook a study of those CIA reports, submitting their "integrity" and quality to painstaking study. The resulting report, released this week, is a model government paper—incisive, interesting and judicious—a document that may reveal more about the gathering and use of foreign intelligence in 30 pages than more sensational studies do in hundreds.

The study is said by one reporter to "gently chide" the CIA's experts in the Office of Economic Research; and so it does. But the chiding is on a relatively minor point; and few of the parties to the discussion of April 1977 escape unchided, including the press.

On April 15th, 1977, to begin at the beginning, President Carter told a press conference that he was "quite alarmed" by "a long and detailed study of international oil supplies" recently prepared by the CIA. Three days later, this report (The International Energy Situation: Outlook to 1985) was released. A second CIA report (Prospects for Soviet Oil Production) followed some days later.

The President's citation of these reports to bolster the case for his energy bill led us—and others—to ask a number of rather insulting questions which now appear unwarranted.

We said, for instance, that "it came as a shock . . . that the CIA had moved into the tricky art of estimating international oil and gas reserves.

Almost alone, it appears, the CIA declares that the Soviet oil industry is 'in trouble,' that its oil production 'will soon peak, possibly as early as next year,' that by the mid-1980s the Soviet Union will become a net importer of oil." Other skeptical comments were in the same vein; most, including our own, were off-base.

Here, after a year's study of the CIA role in oil production (not, in this instance, oil reserve) forecasting, is the Intelligence Committee's verdict:

First, there is "no evidence" that the CIA tailored its study to suit administration political convenience. Nor (as Adm. Stansfield Turner pointed out in a letter to this newspaper last May 8) was the oil study a new departure for the CIA.

Secondly, whatever political inspiration figured in the publicity given to the CIA studies was of White House manufacture. But the Senate Intelligence Committee does not quarrel with the "political" use of intelligence, "as long as this can be done without compromising any sensitive sources or methods . . and the information is made available to the public so that others may gauge the soundness of the argument." Which is fair enough. "All of the information needed to evaluate the strength of (CIA) conclusions about Soviet oil production was made available to the public by July, 1977," the committee adds.

And what of the quality of the intelligence? Was it on the mark? Were its sources sufficiently solid? The committee's answer is a decisive yes, qualified only in one major way. In its view, the CIA experts were right to project a substantial drop in Soviet oil production (relative to need and demand), but not necessarily right in concluding that the Soviet Union (and its Eastern bloc dependents) would become large net importers of foreign oil by the mid-1980s. This prediction, it develops, assumed the improbable: that the Soviet Union would not go to extraordinary lengths to stabilize demand and thus to avoid a drain on scarce reserves of hard currency. The exchange consideration, apparently, could be paramount. The CIA's was, in other, words, "a worst case" analysis and erred only in failing to make its assumptions as clear as they might have been. "If the study is to be faulted, it ought to be faulted for its lack of clarity on that methodological point."

The fine spadework of the Senate Intelligence Committee staff, in addition to showing how easy it is for the press and public officials to discover support for our preconceptions in a detached professional study, serves also to clear the way for a sober consideration of the strategic implications of the Soviet oil dilemma.

The expert belief is that the Soviet Union does have an oil problem. The alternatives, presumably, are to stabilize demand and/or undertake conservation measures; to use American technology (now being supplied) to improve oil yield in water-saturated oil fields; or try to fix a grip on foreign sources that might be brought within its own currency area.

The latter option might, if one were given to gloomy imaginings, explain much about recent Soviet maneuvers in the oil-rich areas of the Middle East. Certainly the latest findings decisively undermine the comfortable old assumption that the Soviet Union has oil to swim in and will never become a competitor in the international rat-race for dependable oil sources.

THE SOVIET OIL SITUATION: AN EVALUATION OF CIA ANALYSES OF SOVIET OIL PRODUCTION

President Carter announced in a television news conference on April 15, 1977, that the CIA had provided him with a report showing that the world energy situation was more pessimistic than generally believed and that he was going to use the information to build up support for his forthcoming energy plan.[1]

[1] The President said the report showed that "world oil reserves" had been overstated. Technically that was incorrect since the CIA report did not go into the question of oil reserves. Rather, it covered only energy production up to 1985. Unfortunately, this distinction was lost in the public coverage.

Newsmen who contacted the CIA on the following morning were told that the report was classified and could not be released. That was later amended to state that the Agency had been directed to withhold the study until after the President's nationally televised fireside chat on April 18, since the President was going to quote extensively from the report at that time.

Within 2 weeks after President Carter's news conference, two CIA reports were made public. "The International Energy Situation: Outlook to 1985" was released on April 18, and "Prospects for Soviet Oil Production" on April 25.

On April 26 Admiral Stanfield Turner, Director of Central Intelligence, appeared before a House Energy Subcommittee and repeated the central findings of the "International Energy Situation" study but went further in stating that those findings were based on information about global energy conditions—especially in the U.S.S.R.—which were not available to other forecasters. He also repeated the one conclusion which would come under increasing criticism in the future: The Soviet Union would be a substantial net importer of oil by the mid-1980's.

On the day following Admiral Turner's House appearance, the New York Times editorialized that the CIA had been misused in that the timing of the declassification of the report suggested that it was politically motivated and that the facts had been "cooked" to fit the President's recipe.

SENATE SELECT COMMITTEE ON INTELLIGENCE INTEREST

Because of the importance of these questions, the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence decided to make an evaluation of the integrity of the analytical process and an evaluation of quality of the CIA's energy studies. The committee addressed the following questions:

1. Did the analytical or estimative process respond to the Administration's preferred outcome?
2. Was the manner and style of the release of the CIA information appropriate?
3. How was the study on future Soviet oil production received by the public and by other petroleum analysts?
4. What is the track record of the CIA on the subject of Soviet oil?
5. On what sources of information did the CIA base its estimate?

The first two questions have to do with the integrity of the analytical process, while the remaining three are an attempt to address the question of the quality of intelligence. While both of the CIA reports mentioned above directly or indirectly addressed energy matters broader than the production of Soviet oil, this committee's investigation is limited to the Soviet oil production question.

INTEGRITY OF THE ANALYTICAL PROCESS

The CIA's Office of Economic Research (OER) has been following Soviet oil production for many years. The prevailing estimate for the last 10 years in the CIA, as well as in the oil industry, has been that Soviet oil production would rise with gradual slowing into the 1990's without any significant declines. A published CIA study, "Soviet Long-Range Energy Forecasts," completed in September 1975 reflected this position. As early as 1970, however, some analysts within OER began to pick up some clues from various Soviet open sources that the future of Soviet oil production might not be as optimistic as previously believed.

These clues were mainly in the form of what appeared to be Soviet manipulations of reporting classifications in an attempt to enhance the appearance of growth. As a result of these clues, some Agency analysts began talking about a rather dramatic and immediate decline in Soviet oil production. Had there been any confirmation of this new prediction, the CIA probably would have accepted this more pessimistic view 4 years before they finally did.

The new prediction was not confirmed at this time, however, Soviet production continued to rise. It was not until early 1975 that other pieces of evidence began to fit into a larger picture which once again suggested that the Soviets were going to face declining oil production. Among other things, it was not until 1975 that the CIA understood the greatly increased pumping capacity made possible by the purchase of large numbers of U.S. made high-capacity submersible pumps.

These pumps allowed the Soviets to lift more fluid from the wells which were being flooded with water in an attempt to force more oil out of the ground. One CIA analyst estimated that these pumps alone could have accounted for an additional 1 million barrels a day. Some examples of other new information which became available early in 1975 include: A Soviet failure to meet annual drilling plans during the 1971 to 1975 period; a rapidly increasing water flooding in some key oil fields; data on maximum production capacity in West Siberian oil fields which fell short of the level of oil production planned for this region in the 1976–80 period; indications that oil production in Tatar A.S.S.R., the largest producing area in the Urals-Volga region, would begin to fall after 1975; and the absence of any Soviet reporting on the discovery of any large new oil reserves, which would have been necessary to offset the depletion of the existing reserves.

Thus, through 1975 and into 1976 there were, in effect, two sets of analysts in OER; those who accepted the more traditional view that Soviet oil production would continue its gradual growth rate, at least through 1980 with major production problems not occurring until after 1980, and those who felt the period of production shortages was more imminent. The Director of OER encouraged both groups to continue their efforts as an exercise in competitive analysis. As the two groups independently refined their analyses through the summer and fall of 1976, it became increasingly clearer to both groups that Soviet oil production was going to face some serious problem years. By the end of the year, OER accepted the notion that severe production problems were going to occur. Differences still existed over the approximate date the decline would begin. The study which eventually was published in April 1977 contained both views as a "worst case" and a "less than worst case" projection.

President-elect Carter was made aware of the general thrust of the Soviet oil studies through briefings by OER analysts prior to his inauguration. A classified version of the global energy study was made available to President Carter in April. It was this report to which the President referred in his April 15 press conference and it was the immediate interest generated by this reference which brought about pressure from the press to release the global energy paper.

The public pressure was received warmly by Admiral Turner who had already made plans to make more CIA economic and technical studies avalable to the public. At the request of Admiral Turner, OER declassified and released two studies which had not originally been planned for public use: The global energy study and the Soviet oil production study which was needed to support the controversial projections made in the global study. OER had been working toward using the Soviet oil production information in a broader paper on the Soviet economy scheduled for release later in the summer of 1977.

The prediction on Soviet oil production is speculative. No one should underplay the tentative nature of any predictions of this sort—even about U.S. oil production in the future. But the committee is of the view that in this particular effort, the integrity of the analytical process was not compromised in any way. The analysts pursued their hunches and hypotheses without any pressure to conform in any particular view.

Committee staff has traced the origins of the new and much more pessimistic forecast back through fall 1976, much too early to have been "cooked" to fit the President's receipe. The committee staff could find no evidence that the integrity and independence of the analytical process, in the case of the prediction about Soviet oil production in the 1980's, was compromised in any way.

On the question of whether or not there were political motivations behind the release of the CIA research, the answer is quite simple: There were. President Carter said he was going to use this information to build support for his energy plan. The conditions which should govern a President's timing and publicly acknowledged use of analytical work performed by an intelligence agency with access to information generally not available to others for domestic political purposes are not clear. The answer in which the President publicly cited the CIA information in this case at a time when it had not yet been released to the public, however, understandably gave rise to questions about his use of the intelligence.

The Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, its predecessor committee (the Church committee), other committees of Congress, and many public groups have advocated greater distribution of CIA information relating to economic and scientific matters. This committee believes it is proper for a President to cite publicly intelligence information in support of a particular public proposal, as long as this can be done without compromising any sensitive sources or methods used in collecting the intelligence and the information is made available to the public so that others may gauge the soundness of the argument. If an administration chooses to cite intelligence data to support policy choices in a public debate, it should be intelligence which, in a general sense, can be made public. All of the information needed to evaluate the strength of OER's conclusions about Soviet oil production was made available to the public by July 1977.

THE QUALITY OF INTELLIGENCE

Evaluating the quality of the CIA predictions about Soviet oil production is much more difficult than was determining the integrity of the analytical process. The following section is an attempt to evaluate the accuracy of the CIA predictions about Soviet oil production. After summarizing the central points of the two CIA publications regarding Soviet oil production, there follows a summary of early public reactions to the studies; the results of an informal poll of 25 private and Government oil experts as to their reactions to the studies subsequent CIA statements about Soviet oil production; the CIA track record on Soviet oil; and the committee's critique of the studies.

What the CIA studies said.—The earlier of the two studies, "Prospects for Soviet Oil Production," said that because of a variety of factors (poor production techniques, exploration delays, development difficulties, et cetera) Soviet oil production was going to peak in the early 1980's and that the Soviets may face difficulties in the mid-1980's meeting their own petroleum needs. "More pessimistically," the report said, "the U.S.S.R. itself will become an oil importer."

The CIA study acknowledged that this was a short-term problem since Soviet energy resources potentially were very large and could, in the long run, be adequate to meet Soviet domestic and export needs. The adverse climatological character of the regions in which those reserves were located, however, would delay actual production from those regions for over 10 years, according to the study.

The second report, "The International Energy Situation: Outlook to 1985," considered Soviet oil production as a part of global energy developments. It was this particular study's comments on Soviet oil production which evoked the widest criticism of the CIA studies. Building on the projected Soviet oil production shortage mentioned in the earlier study, this study detailed the specific effects of that shortage and its wider implications. "We estimate that the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe will require a minimum of 3.5 million barrels per day of imported oil by 1985. At worst, slumping production could lead to import requirements as large as 4.5 million barrels per day." These two sentences acted as a Leyden jar attracting a fairly wide range of criticisms.

Public reactions.—Even before the CIA report was made public, the Washington Post stated on April 16, 1977, that "sources" were describing the CIA work as being based on estimates of global trends in production and consumption which were furnished by private oil companies. Ralph Nader, the article said, questioned the credibility of the CIA report and said that it all sounded like collusion between the oil-producing countries and the oil industry to justify continuing price rises. The first report, "The International Energy Situation: Outlook to 1985," was released on April 18 and "Prospects for Soviet Oil Production" was released on April 25. The releases did nothing to allay the public criticism.

The Washington Star carried an Associated Press story on April 25 juxtaposing the very pessimistic conclusions of the CIA's study with, what it believed to be, more optimistic conclusions disputing the CIA figures from a U.S. group. The story is typical of the kinds of problems which many have had in trying to interpret the meaning of various oil studies.

The U.N. group turned out to be a U.N.-sponsored conference on the subject of future sources of energy whose main conclusion was that "oil would remain the world's most important hydrocarbon source of energy for many years to come." Rather than disputing the CIA study, the U.N.-sponsored conference was held 9 months prior to the release of the CIA studies and said nothing about short-term oil production in the Soviet Union.

On April 27, the New York Times editorialized that the CIA had been misused in that the timing of the declassification of the reports gave evidence that their release was politically motivated and that the facts had been "cooked" to fit the President's recipe.

A New York Times feature story of April 28 claimed that the "CIA's forecast of oil shortage is disputed in private reports." The two reports mentioned were (1) a Stanford Research Institute report issued several months prior to the release of the CIA reports and (2) a National Economic Research Associates of New York "appraisal" suggesting that the CIA reports were much too pessimistic. In both cases, there was some confusion between long- versus short-term analysis and between reserve versus production shortages. As the article commented, "the issues are complicated and the approaches taken in the various reports differ. The typical citizen or Member of Congress who is not a specialist in economics or research analysis may find it difficult to decide which of the forecasts is right."

One of the more perceptive public criticisms which appeared in the same edition of the New York Times (April 28) was a guest editorial written by Dr. Marshall I. Goldman, associate director of the Russian Research Center at Harvard University. Goldman wrote that "the general conclusion (of the CIA report) is not wrong, but parts of the analysis appear to be incorrect." He was particularly critical of two points made by the CIA. In the first place, Goldman did not believe that the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe would become a net importer of oil since he did not accept the Agency's projection of declining Soviet production. Second, even if production failed, the Soviet Union would not be able to obtain the hard currency necessary to finance imports on the scale projected by the CIA studies.

Two other studies are worth mentioning. Shortly after the publication of the two CIA studies, the Workshop on Alternative Energy Strategies (WAES), working under the direction of Dr. Carol L. Wilson, published its report, "Energy: Global Prospects to 1985–2000." The WAES study is perhaps the only study more pessimistic than the reports published by the CIA. The WAES projects, at worst, a 15 to 20 million barrels per day global shortage of oil by the year 2000. The CIA projection is to 1985 and predicts an approximate global shortage of around 7 million barrels per day. The WAES study did not make specific projections about Soviet oil production and, hence, is not directly comparable with the controversial CIA prediction about Soviet oil imports. Methodologically, both the WAES and the CIA studies project future energy needs as a function of general economic growth.

I Library of Congress study, released on June 26, was headlined in the Washington Post as "disputing" the CIA's Soviet oil forecast. The study said that "Soviet needs and planned commitments require it to be a modest exporter of oil and natural gas to the hard currency Western industrialized nations and to Eastern Europe throughout the period of the 1970's and 1980's." The report went on to suggest, however, that Soviet oil production could well begin to diminish in the 1980's unless the Russians were able to bring the Siberian fields on line.

When contacted by committee staff, the author of the Library of Congress study said that the newspapers had given a false impression through its headline and description of his study. He said that, with the exception of the 3.5 to 4.5 million barrels per day import projection, he was impressed with the CIA study and that his study generally did not dispute it.

Poll of oil experts.—Since the CIA studies in question were public reports, the committee staff contacted some two dozen oil experts from private industry, academia, and the Government and asked them to assess the CIA studies.

Most of those polled had favorable comments to make about the general work of the CIA's Office of Economic Research. The two reports in question were described as timely, important, and worthy of serious consideration but flawed by the absence of any methodological explanations.

Those most critical of CIA's oil studies felt that OER's focus was too narrow and that it did not sufficiently take into account broader questions affecting the Soviet oil future, such as pricing, conservation, and fuel substitution.

On the projection that the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe could be importing up to 4.5 million barrels per day by 1985, however, most of those polled disagreed. Nearly everyone interviewed felt that the Soviet Union would be able to avoid becoming a net importer of oil in the 1980's. Most of the experts consulted by the SSCI believed that the totalitarian nature of the Soviet system would more easily allow centralized diversion into other energy sources, rigorously enforced conservation practices, and greater control and manipulation of the economy than is possible in a free economy. As a major New York oil consultant said, "The Soviet Union does not have to function like a market economy and thus it is difficult to predict how it will react to supply and demand situations." He went on to state that "the Soviet Union could reduce consumption very quickly if they really wanted to through administrative decisions. It could also move heavily into coal or gas or other areas if it needed to."

For example, an FEA analyst felt that the 3.5 to 4.5 figures were a little too pessimistic and that they had been arrived at by assuming a "rather direct causal relationship between economic growth and energy needs into the future. This is a rather standard assumption but may not always be a safe one to make." Air oil industry analyst said that "the 3.5 to 4.5 number is just too high of a number and is not a probable outcome." But, he went on to say, "That is the only number in the study that we have trouble with."

A leading academic specialist consulted by the committee staff thought that the 3.5 to 4.5 figures were too high and that the Soviet system would be able to take appropriate steps to prevent becoming a net importer of that magnitude. On the other hand, he believed that the CIA had performed a valuable service in calling attention to the peaking and subsequent decline of Soviet oil production. He felt, as did most of those consulted, that if the CIA analysts had erred, they did so by neglecting to trace the impact this decline would have on the domestic economy as the Soviets searched for policy alternatives.

Marshall Goldman's New York Times criticism of the study concentrated on this impact. He pointed out that an implication of the prediction that the Soviet Union will become a net importer is that the Soviet Union would not be exporting its present 1 million barrels a day. That would mean a net impact on the world market of 4.5 to 5.5 million barrels per day and would, in turn, create a serious drain on the Soviet Union's scarce sources of hard currency. Goldman concluded that "the issue is not whether the Soviet Union will ever run out of petroleum—it will, but it will take much longer than the CIA says before the Soviet Union becomes the cause of the tightened market."

An interpretation of what the CIA said.—The CIA's "International Energy Situation: Outlook to 1985," which contained the 3.5 to 4.5 million barrels per day import forecast, is an examination of the relationship between global oil supply and demand up to 1985. In essence, it is a projection of global economic growth from which is derived energy consumption. The Agency analysts assumed relatively constant conservation measures and did not attempt to assess the impact of conservation or energy policy changes. They did consider the estimated size of non-oil energy supplies. Government exploration and development policies, oil reserves, existing contracts, and development time estimates.

The forecast that the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe will be importing 3.5 to 4.5 million barrels per day by 1985 must be read in light of the analytical technique used. In effect, the study said that in the absence of any significant improvements in conservation practices, in the absence of any major cutbacks in the rates of economic growth, and in the absence of the kinds of fairly rapidly enforced shifts in patterns of energy consumption of which the Soviet Union may be capable—in the absence of these kinds of developments, the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe will need to import 3.5 to 4.5 million barrels per day by 1985. In light of the analytical techniques used by the CIA oil experts, the import projection should be read as a worst case analysis with other variables remaining relatively constant.

If the study is to be faulted, it ought to be faulted for its lack of clarity on that mehodological point. It is not clear, on first reading, that the conclusion about Communist bloc oil imports in 1985 is really a tentative conclusion based on a number of assumptions which may not obtain in reality. Interviews with senior analysts in the Office of Economic Research (OER), the office responsible for the studies, support this observation.

Walter McDonald, former Deputy Director, OER, and Ronald Smith, Chief, Industrial Nations Division, told committee staff that they also agreed with the critics who have said that it is highly unlikely that the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe will be importing 3.5 to 4.5 million barrels per day of oil by 1985. According to Smith, that is the amount "they would need to import if they continued to grow at the present rate and if conservation practices and other Government policies remained relatively constant."

McDonald told committee staff that he "does not believe that the COMECON countries will be importing that kind of oil but that the data suggests that they will have to do so unless they make some other major policy decisions." He said that the Soviets "will do virtually anything to prevent them from becoming an oil importer of that magnitude."

Both McDonald and Smith said they were well aware of the hard currency problem. McDonald stressed that "the Soviets cannot afford to lose that kind of hard currency in the international oil market."

Admiral Turner, in his appearance before the House Subcommittee on Energy and Manpower of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce on April 25, 1977, after stating the less arguable prediction that Soviet production will peak by the early 1980 's, went on to state quite clearly the one point which OER analysts told committee staff they wished they had not made. "We estimate that in 1985 the U.S.S.R. and Eastern Europe will need net imports of 3.5 to 4.5 million barrels per day," said the Director. Again, there were no caveats nearby; however the sentence can still be "explained" in such a way as to fall short of predicting that such an amount will be imported.

Additional CIA Soviet oil studies.—Prompted in part by the criticism that their observations about the future of Soviet oil production were not supported by an explanation of how their conclusions were reached, and also prompted by Admiral Turner's desire to make open as much intelligence information as reasonably could be done, the CIA continued to release studies relating to the Soviet oil situation.

On May 26, 1977, a draft paper entitled "Soviet Reserves of Crude Oil," was given limited public circulation. Parts of that paper plus additional discussions of a wide number of Soviet oil-related issues, including Soviet drilling and production techniques and requirements, were put together and published in "A Discussion Paper on Soviet Petroleum Production" for a meeting of the Advisory Committee on East-West Trade on June 20, 1977.

The most significant aspect about the May 26, 1977, "Draft Paper" and the June 29, 1977 "Discussion Paper" is that, while they attempt to answer the critics' charges that the earlier papers were lacking in methodological explanations by giving detailed data and analytical techniques, at no place do they repeat the most controversial conclusion of the earlier paper that the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe will become net importers of oil up to 3.5 to 4.5 million barrels per day by 1985.

The absence of any reiteration of that point would seem to suggest that the Agency had backed off in the face of fairly widespread lack of support throughout the oil industry and the academic community. There was no backing off, however, from the logic which led to the conclusion about Soviet oil production. The draft and the discussion paper make a strong case that the Soviet oil industry is in difficulty and that petroleum production is peaking and will be declining in the near future.

When several members of the panel who had evaluated the earlier papers for the committee were repolled by committee staff about the discussion paper, they unanimously agreed that it provided needed information on research techniques and noted that it had not repeated the controversial conclusion about the Soviet bloc becoming a net importer of oil. To a considerable degree, the discussion paper seemed tailored to meet the objections of the critics of the earlier papers—it provided the "data and analysis employed in the recent CIA study on the Soviet oil industry" and it discussed the options available to the Soviet Union to avoid the adverse consequences of declining oil production. Moreover, it avoided the most controversial part of the earlier work by addressing itself to larger global energy concerns.

In July of 1977 the CIA published a more complete description of the Soviet energy situation. This study considered energy in the context of the overall Soviet economic condition. "Soviet Economic Problems and Prospects," outlined the problems created by a declining energy supply and complicated by a shrinking labor force. It also outlined the options available to the Soviet Government.

This study did what some CIA analysts said they meant to do from the beginning and what academic and industry critics said was missing in the early papers. It repeated the earlier estimate of Soviet oil production in 1958 of 8 to 10 million barrels per day, but it estimated some possible effects of conservation and fuel substitution policies on oil consumption.

According to this study, if the Soviets could reduce energy consumption through conservation by 2.5 percent (a figure the CIA estimates to be reasonable without explaining its derivation), then the U.S.S.R. could "cut oil consumption to 9.4 million barrels per day by 1985, compared with 10.1 million barrels per day under a business-as-usual regime.[2] If production in 1985 turns out to be in the upper portion of our projected range (8 million to 10 million barrels per day), domestic requirements could be covered. Even then, however, the U.S.S.R. would lose its exports of oil for hard currency and would have to cut back oil shipments to its client states in Eastern Europe. On the other hand, if production falls below 9 million barrels per day in 1985, successful conservation and substitution measures that reduced domestic demand to 9.4 million barrels per day would not prevent the U.S.S.R. from having to import a great deal of oil on its own account" (p. 14).

That statement is a far cry from the 3.5 to 4.5 million barrels per day statement in the earlier study. It makes clear that there is a range of alternatives and that such things as conservation and substitution are important variables.

Later in the study, the CIA analysts tie these production developments to the international market.

"Under any but optimistic scenarios for oil production, and in the absence of a high-priority campaign to save oil domestically, the U.S.S.R. will shift from earning to spending hard currency in its oil trade. The difference between selling 1 million barrels per day (as in 1976) and buying 2.7 million barrels per day (the projection for 1985 that assumes no conservation efforts) is $17 million in 1977 prices, more than the U.S.S.R.'s total 1976 hard-currency imports (p. 22)."

[2] The CIA apparently here assumes that if all of the 2.5-percent energy conservation reduction were to take its effect on oil consumption, the result would be savings of 700,000 barrels per day (from 10.1 to 9.4) which is a 7-percent reduction.

A footnote explains how the 2.7 million barrels per day import figure for 1985 was derived:

"Comprising 1.6 million barrels per day for reexport to Eastern Europe and 1.1 million barrels per day for domestic consumption (the difference between projected consumption of 10.1 million barrels per day and projected production of 9 million barrels per day.) An earlier CIA study, 'The International Energy Situation: Outlook to 1985' (April 1977), estimates combined Soviet and Eastern Europe oil imports in 1985 at 3.5 to 4.5 million barrels per day. This range is consistent with the base line forecast made in this paper on the assumption that the Soviet Union makes no special new effort to save oil. There is a difference in coverage, however. The earlier estimates include Romania and Yugoslavia while those in the current study do not because these two countries, unlike the others in Eastern Europe, are not considered Soviet clients for this purpose; that is, the U.S.S.R. would not be expected to make up their energy deficits. There have also been some changes in the forecast about oil in the U.S.S.R. and Eastern Europe but these largely cancel out. If Romania and Yugoslavia are included, the current base line forecast is 3.9 million barrels per day or close to the midpoint of the range in the earlier paper.

"Unlike the earlier estimate, the present forecast considers the possible impact of additional energy savings due to new Soviet policies. With additional savings of 2.5 percent, all in the form of oil, the U.S.S.R. and Eastern Europe would need to import 2.5 million barrels per day in 1985, or 2.9 million barrels per day including Romania and Yugoslavia."

In effect, the Agency did not retreat from its earlier projections but now states with greater clarity the range of alternatives and the assumptions on which those alternatives rest. It is unfortunate that it took 3 months and three additional studies to state clearly what the analysts say was intended in the first of the studies.

CIA track record.—It is not easy to determine the accuracy of past CIA forecasts. For one thing, Agency analysts have not produced an annual forecast of Soviet oil production. They have produced a number of relevant studies which relate to this area, but comparisons are difficult because of the absence of a standard format or design for the display of these data. Some publications have concentrated on Soviet oil imports, others on exports, others on the total Soviet energy situation, and other such studies. The varying focuses of the occasional reports also give rise to another problem. A paper on prospects for continued Soviet petroleum exports will focus quite narrowly on that topic to the exclusion of broader economic and political considerations. A study of Soviet production goals for power and fuels may likewise ignore other sides of relevant considerations. Occasionally a broadly based study on the Soviet economy as a whole will be produced which will integrate information drawn from wider sources and based on more complete consideration. An approximate track record, however, is possible based on Agency publications back to 1970 which the committee staff reviewed.

In 1970, the Agency forecast Soviet oil production for 1975 to be between 8.81 and 9.21 million barrels per day. Another 1970 study predicted a single 9.01 figure for the same period. In fact, actual Soviet oil production in 1975 was 9.82 million barrels per day. The CIA forecast had been low, but for an interesting reason: The Agency analysts had assumed that U.S. export restrictions would remain relatively unchanged and that the Soviets would not be able to import desperately needed Western technology, particularly submersible pumps and drill bits. As those export restrictions were lifted, the Soviets purchased large amounts of the needed equipment and their production was greater than the CIA forecast.

In 1971, the CIA did another forecast up to 1975 and this time predicted Soviet oil production would be 9.81 to 10.01 million barrels per day, if the Soviets gained access to Western technology. Again, actual production in 1975 was 9.82. A 1972 study made a forecast for "the next few years" and projected Soviet oil production would be 9.19 million barrels per day. In 1973, 1974, 1975, actual production (according to CIA collections of Soviet statistics) was 8.58, 9.18, and 9.81, respectively. Again, the forecast was fairly close.

The longer range the projection, obviously, the greater is the probable error. In 1970 the Agency made a 10-year forecast of 9.01 to 10.01 million barrels per day in 1980. Six years later, in 1976, the Agency predicted 11.8 million barrels per day by 1980. Nevertheless, there has been a tendency for OER to emphasize problems in the Soviet oil industry.

The varying and complicated nature of the data in the CIA oil studies makes evaluation and comparison difficult. All of the CIA forecasts mentioned above pertain to annual oil production. Another area of great interest is that total oil reserves, that is, oil in the ground. One Agency critic, Marshall Goldman, in an unpublished study. "Some Critical Observations About the CIA Analysis of the Need For Soviet Oil Imports," cites CIA estimates of Soviet oil reserves to show that Agency forecasts have vacillated wildly and cannot be trusted. He cites three successive CIA estimates (1975, 1976, and 1977) of Soviet oil reserves as being 73, 36, and 30 to 35 billion barrels respectively, and concludes, "it is hard to see how the CIA has suddenly arrived at the figures it now wants us to accept." His point is that no respectable forecaster could possibly reduce his estimates by half (from 73 to 36 billion barrels in 1 year) and maintain credibility.

On this point, Goldman has apparently misread a particular CIA study. He cites a 1975 Agency study on Soviet long-range energy needs as estimating that the Soviet Union has a 73 billion barrels oil reserve. Actual Soviet oil reserves are difficult to ascertain for two reasons: (1) statistics are classified as Soviet state secrets; and (2) Soviet definitions of reserves do not coincide with those used in the West.

The Soviets use six categories of oil reserves, A, B, C_1, C_2, D_1, and D_2. The reserves in A and part of the B correspond to the "proven" category used in the United States. The rest of the B reserves plus some of the C_1 reserves correspond to U.S. "probable" category. However, some portions of both B and C_1 would be called "possible" by Western standards. The other categories, C_2, D_1, and D_2 are inferred reserves not established by testing. Unlike the U.S. definitions of "proved" and "probable." Soviet definitions do not specify that the reserves must be commercially exploitable at current prices and technology.

Since the 1975 CIA study itself does not clearly state what Soviet oil reserves are, Goldman had to infer such a figure. The data from which he made his inference are data about Soviet $A+B+C_1$ reserves but he should have applied his computations to the A+B categories only, which is the normal grouping for calculating Soviet oil reserves. By applying either of the two acceptable methods for computing oil reserves, one can infer a Soviet oil reserve estimate from the 1975 study of 36.5 to 43.8 billion barrels, a range well within the realm of conventional wisdom and not out of line with the CIA's later estimates. The CIA track record for estimating Soviet oil reserves may or may not be accurate—only time will tell—but, at least, it has been quite consistent.

Sources for CIA studies.—CIA analysts rely on a number of different sources, some confidential and some open. In the latter category, the Agency is capable of an exhaustive reading of Soviet oil journals. For the recent Soviet oil study, they utilized issues of 40 different Soviet journals. Much of the early work on Soviet oil involved the tedious searching of standard Soviet literature for bits and pieces of information.

One National Academy of Sciences energy expert said that he thought this was the great strength of CIA analysis. According to him, the CIA "is the only shop in the country which has access to such a vast number of Soviet journals and has trained personnel and data processing techniques which can read, classify, and retrieve such information."

The Agency also has access to a large number of American academic, industry, and government experts who study Soviet energy developments. Many of these are called on as formal or informal consultants. Additionally, there are a variety of energy experts who occasionally travel through the Soviet Union, some of whom are willing to pass on their impressions to the Agency.

Moreover, as Soviet oil exploitation has become increasingly dependent on U.S. technology, the CIA has been able to estimate relationships between certain types of equipment purchases and oil development. The Agency has access to all U.S. exports records since these are public records.

The CIA also has access to various kinds of sensitive sources of information which remain classified. Some of this information has played a significant role in the Agency's study of Soviet oil.

CONCLUSIONS

The CIA's two unclassified studies, "The International Energy Situation" and "Prospects for Soviet Oil Production," have been generally well received. Most of the experts consulted by the SSCI had praise for the work of the Office of Economic Research; they liked the overall thrust of the two current studies about which their opinions were sought. Several of them, however, expressed both surprise and disbelief over the CIA estimate that the "Soviet Union and Eastern Europe will require a minimum of 3.5 million barrels per day of imported oil by 1985. At worst, slumping production could lead to import requirements as large as 4.5 million barrels per day."

CIA analysts have said that if they could rewrite that particular study they would definitely change that sentence. It lends itself to misinterpretation much too easily. It was meant to express the Agency's belief that unless the Soviet Union alters its energy consumption pattern, significantly increases its conservation practices, or greatly reduces economic growth and the oil consumption traditionally correlated with that growth, there will be a shortage of 3.5 to 4.5 million barrels per day of oil by 1985. No one in OEC believes the Soviet Union will import oil at that magnitude.

The later (July 1977) study, "Soviet Economic Problems and Prospects," gave OER a chance, in fact, to rewrite the "offending" sentence. This time they explained both a worst case and a best case scenario. They also considered the possible effects of conservation and substitution (a 2.5-percent reduction in energy consumption) as well as the effect of falling production on the domestic economy and international trade. There is no explanation of how the 2.5 percent was derived other than that it is a "highly subjective estimate" (p. 14).

This study reports that if all energy conservation is focused on oil consumption, then the Soviets could reduce oil to 9.4 million barrels per day by 1985. If, at the same time, oil production is on the high side of the CIA estimate (10 million barrels per day), then the Soviets would have enough oil to cover domestic needs. If, on the other hand, conservation is less successful and production is at the lower end of the CIA estimate (8 million barrels per day), then the shortfall of oil would need to be imported or, more likely, additional and more stringent steps would be taken by Soviet officials to prevent such an outcome.

Agency analysts have variously described the 3.5 to 4.5 import projection as a "terrible glitch" and a "simple error" in that normal supply-and-demand projections of the Soviet energy situation were made and, according to one analyst, an "unwarranted assumption was made that any shortfall of oil automatically would be imported."

Given the favorable reputation which the Agency has among the majority of oil experts consulted by the committee staff, it is unfortunate that the caveats necessary to arrive at the correct conclusions were not clearly expressed in the early studies and in the assessment that was made by Admiral Turner before the House committee.

This error is unfortunate because it detracts from the attention which should be paid to the more fundamental and new conclusion made in the studies relating to the prospects for Soviet oil production and the difficult options such a development is going to present to Soviet leaders. It does appear that the Soviet oil industry is facing a difficult period. Recent Pravda articles seem to bear this out.[3]

There have been a number of newspaper stories reporting increasing difficulties in the Soviet oil industry. These stories have chronicled (1) the extreme difficulties the Soviets are having in developing oil fields in Siberia; (2) a Soviet warning to bloc countries that they may need to develop other sources for oil; (3) the attempt to develop Iran as an oil supplier for Eastern Europe; (4) the Soviet announcement that 1978's oil production would be only slightly higher than the previous year despite an earlier stated production quota much higher; and (5) the Soviet difficulties in trying to develop oil wells with its own technology, and therefore its increasing reliance on Western technology.

How the Soviets deal with the oil problem could have a serious adverse impact on the Soviet economy, the Communist bloc, and perhaps, even the Western world. The Agency has not backed away from this projection and most of the experts consulted by the committee staff think that the Agency may be right. No one will know for sure, of course, until 1985.

RECOMMENDATIONS

The following recommendations are based upon the committee's evaluation of the CIA's studies on Soviet oil production. They are focused on production and dissemination of finished intelligence by the Office of Economic Research.

The release to the public of unclassified intelligence analyses is a good practice and should be pursued to the fullest extent consistent with the need to protect sensitive sources and methods. The CIA must not refrain, moreover, from releasing studies because they may run counter to the policies of a particular administration or popular wisdom. Sound, dispassionate analyses will facilitate ability of the public to evaluate both the analyses and the data on which report conclusions are based. Such public reaction as occurred in this case is healthy and should be encouraged.

OER should produce annual or periodic studies of the energy situation in the Soviet Union which include more consistent displays of relevant data. This would allow easier comparisons and would also make retrospective evaluations of OER's predictive record easier. Where possible, regularly produced reports might help avoid appearances of pressure to support particular public policies. This, of course, would not affect the frequent but unperiodic publication schedule of OER.

The practice of meeting with academic and industry petroleum experts should be continued. OER met several times with such outside experts during the course of their production of Soviet oil analyses and those meetings proved to be mutually enlightening.

Finished intelligence products which are written by highly trained specialists should be reviewed by generalists with a more multidisciplinary view. This will enhance the likelihood of avoiding projections of technical outcomes which may be politically unlikely.

The White House and the Director of Central Intelligence need to be fully sensitive to the responsibilities they bear in preserving the integrity of the analytical process and in creating confidence among Congress and the public that the substance and the circumstances surrounding the release of economic and scientific intelligence are free from undue pressure.

[3] An August 10, 1977, Pravda article was critical of those who expected oil at every drilling. It pointed out that prospectors and geologists in the Tyumen area had failed to fulfill last year's plan and were "not coping with this year's targets either." [FBIS translation.]

DESIGNATION OF PERIOD FOR THE TRANSACTION OF ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

(The following occurred earlier:)

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senator from Hawaii completes his statement, there be a period for the transaction of routine morning business of not to exceed 1 hour.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HODGES). Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, there will now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business, not to exceed 1 hour.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Chirdon, one of his secretaries.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

As in executive session, the Presiding Officer laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting the nomination of Warren Demian Manshel, of New York, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Denmark, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORT ON EMPLOYMENT AND TRAINING REQUIREMENTS, RESOURCES AND UTILIZATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—PM 178

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report, which was referred to the Committee on Human Resources:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am transmitting to the Congress the 16th annual report pertaining to employment and training requirements, resources, and utilization, as required by section 705(a) of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act of 1973, as amended. This Employment and Training Report of the President also includes reports required by sections 209, 413, and 705(b) of the same act, as well as a report on services for veterans, as required by 38 U.S.C., sections 2007(c), and 2012(c).

JIMMY CARTER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 26, 1978.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 2:35 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives delivered by Mr. Hackney, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has passed the following bills, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 7814. An act to authorize Federal agencies to experiment with flexible and compressed employee work schedules; and

H.R. 12571. An act to amend the Fishery Conservation Zone Transition Act in order to give effect to the Reciprocal Fisheries Agreement for 1978 between the United States and Canada.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were read twice by their titles and referred as indicated:

H.R. 7814. An act to authorize Federal agencies to experiment with flexible and compressed employee work schedules; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

H.R. 12571. An act to amend the Fishery Conservation Zone Transition Act in order to give effect to the Reciprocal Fisheries Agreement for 1978 between the United States and Canada; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation and the Committee on Foreign Relations, jointly, by unanimous consent.

ORDER FOR REFERRAL OF A BILL

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when and if S. 3115 is reported, it be referred to the Committees on Commerce, Science, and Transportation for a period of not to exceed 45 legislative days to consider title IV of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMUNICATIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following communications, together with accompanying reports, documents and papers, which were referred as indicated:

EC-3687. A communication from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on the extent of known and estimated compliance with the provisions of the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976 (YCMA); to the Committee on Commerce, Science and Transportation and the Committee on Foreign Relations, jointly, by unanimous consent.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a communication transmitted by the Secretary of Commerce, relative to the Fishery Conservation and Management Act of 1976, be referred jointly to the Committees on Commerce, Science, and Transportation; and Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EC–3688. A communication from the Secretary of Commerce, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on activities of the Regional Fishery Management Councils and the Department of Commerce with respect to fishery management plans, regulations to implement such plans, and other activities relating to the conservation and management of fishery resources that were undertaken during 1977; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation and the Committee on Foreign Relations, jointly, by unanimous consent.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the annual report transmitted by the Secretary of Commerce, relative to the Regional Fishery Management Councils and the Department of Commerce, to be referred jointly to the Committees on Commerce, Science, and Transportation; and Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EC–3689. A communication from the Deputy Assistant Secretary of Defense (Installations and Housing), reporting, pursuant to law, on eight construction projects to be undertaken by the U.S. Army Reserve; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EC–3690. A communication from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to repeal section 5770 of title 10, United States Code, relating to the requirement for sea or foreign service for certain officers of the Regular Navy; to the Committee on Armed Services.

EC–3691. A communication from the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to provide assistance for specific neighborhood conservation and revitalization projects, to improve the capabilities of neighborhood organizations in planning and carrying out such projects, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

EC–3692. A communication from the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to provide Federal assistance to encourage community and neighborhood artistic and cultural activities, to promote sound urban design, and to contribute to neighborhood conservation and revitalization, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs.

EC–3693. A communication from the Assistant Secretary of the Interior, reporting, pursuant to law, relating to drought loans, grants, and deferments; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

EC–3694. A communication from the Administrator, Energy Information Administration, Department of Energy, transmitting, pursuant to law, volume II of the first annual report of the Energy Information Administration; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

EC–3695. A communication from the Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, pursuant to law, an application by the South Weber Water Improvement District of South Weber City, Davis County, Utah, for a loan under the Small Reclamation Projects Act (70 Stat. 1044, as amended); to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

EC–3696. A communication from the Federal Cochairman, Pacific Northwest Regional Commission, transmitting, pursuant to law, its annual report for fiscal year 1977; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

EC–3697. A communication from the Chairman, Nuclear Regulatory Commission, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend the Atomic Energy Act of 1954, as amended, to provide for the protection from unauthorized disclosure of safeguards information, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

EC–3698. A communication from the Administrator, General Services Administration, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of a Building Project Survey for El Paso, Tex.; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

EC–3699. A communication from the Secretary of Transportation, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report on Railroad-Highway Demonstration Projects, December 1977; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

EC–3700. A communication from the Acting Secretary of Agriculture, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to carry out the obligations of the United States under the International Sugar Agreement of 1977; to protect the welfare of consumers of sugar and those engaged in the domestic sugar-producing industry; and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

EC–3701. A communication from the Assistant Secretary of the Air Force (Manpower, Reserve Affairs and Installations), transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to eliminate the requirement that a member of the Armed Forces on active duty maintain a household in the United States in order to be eligible for the earned income credit; to the Committee on Finance.

EC–3702. A communication from the President of the United States, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to provide for a National Commission on the International Year of the Child, 1979; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EC–3703. A communication from the Assistant Administrator for Legislative Affairs, Department of State, transmitting, pursuant to law, a justification of an increase in the funding level of the proposed fiscal year 1978 program in Tanzania; to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EC–3704. A communication from the Assistant Secretary (Legislative Affairs), Department of the Treasury, transmitting, pursuant to law, project performance audit reports prepared by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development (IBRD); to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

EC–3705. A communication from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report entitled "Supplemental Security Income Quality Assurance System: An Assessment of its Problems and Potential for Reducing Erroneous Payments," May 23, 1978; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC–3706. A communication from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report entitled "The Federal Role in Improving Productivity—Is the National Center for Productivity and Quality of Working Life the Proper Mechanism?" May 23, 1978; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC–3707. A communication from the Attorney General, reporting, pursuant to law, its intention to establish a new system of records; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC–3708. A communication from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report entitled "Metropolitan Chicago's Combined Water Cleanup and Flood Control Program: Status and Problems," May 24, 1978; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC–3709. A communication from the Administrator, General Services Administration, transmitting a draft of proposed legislation to amend the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended, to permit retention of surplus for use in the acquisition of motor vehicles and related equipment; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC–3710. A communication from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report entitled "Developing State Automated Information Systems to Support Federal Assistance Programs: Problems and Opportunities," May 26, 1978; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

EC–3711. A communication from the Director, Bureau of Prisons for the National Institute of Corrections, transmitting, pursuant to law, its second annual report; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EC–3712. A communication from the Chairman of the Board, U.S. Naval Sea Cadet Corps, transmitting, pursuant to law, its annual audit report for the fiscal year ending 31 March 1978; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EC–3713. A communication from the Librarian of Congress, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of the activities of the Library of Congress, including the Copyright Office, for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1977; to the Committee on Rules and Administration.

EC–3714. A communication from the Chairman, Agricultural Technical Advisory Committee for Trade Negotiations on Poultry and Eggs, reporting, pursuant to law, on the Agreement on Trade Matters Between the United States and the United Mexican States; to the Committee on Finance.

PETITIONS

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following petitions and memorials, which were referred as indicated:

POM–668. A concurrent memorial adopted by the Legislature of the State of Arizona; to the Committee on Finance:

"SENATE CONCURRENT MEMORIAL 1001

"Whereas, Internal Revenue Service interpretations of the Internal Revenue Code as amened by the Pension Reform Act of 1974 have raised the distinct possibility that State pension plans would be subject to Federal income taxation and be burdened by Federal Government reporting requirements; and

"Whereas, taxation of State pension fund income by the Federal Government would threaten the integrity and financial viability of these employee-pension plans and the future economic security of their beneficiaries; and

"Whereas, such taxation would be contrary to the Constitutional principle of nontaxation by the Federal Government of State property and income; and

"Whereas, a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 would exempt State and Local government retirement systems from Federal income tax liability and the burden of unnecessary reporting requirements. Wherefore your memorialist, the Senate of the State of Arizona, the "House of Representatives concurring, prays:

"1. That the President and the Congress of the United States protect State pension plans by passing a bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to exempt certain

State and Local government retirement systems from taxation.

"2. That the Secretary of State of the State of Arizona transmit copies of this Memorial to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, the Chairman of the Finance Committee of the United States Senate, the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives of the United States and to each Member of the Arizona Congressional delegation."

POM-669. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works:

"COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS—RESOLUTION

"Whereas, A special Connecticut River Basin program was established in nineteen hundred and seventy-two to insure the basin plan is used to guide water resources management actions at all levels; and

"Whereas, The plan for water resources management in the Connecticut River Basin reflects the desires and wishes of the inhabitants of the river valley; and

"Whereas, The Connecticut River Basin plan provides for local participation in the determination of policy in the use and development of the river's resources; and

"Whereas, The failure to enact certain legislation would create a void in river basin planning and management in which government and nongovernment interests could make decisions in their own interest in isolation and unrelated to any overall coordination or policy on river planning and development to the detriment of our vital water resources; now therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Massachusetts Senate respectfully urges the Congress of the United States to enact certain legislation in favor of a Special Connecticut River Basin program; and be it further

"Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be transmitted forthwith by the Clerk of the Senate to the President of the United States, to the presiding officer of each branch of the Congress, and to each member thereof from this Commonwealth."

POM-670. A resolution adopted by the County Board of Aitkin County, Minn., in opposition to the inclusion of the Upper Mississippi River in the Wild and Scenic Rivers Act; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

POM-671. A resolution adopted by the Lake County Board of Commissioners, Two Harbors, Minn., relating to the Federal Mine Safety and Health Act; to the Committee on Human Resources.

POM-672. A resolution adopted by the Lake County Board of Commissioners, Two Harbors, Minn., relating to the PERA pension system in the State of Minnesota; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

POM-673. A concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of South Carolina; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

"CALENDAR No. S. 1024

"Whereas, with each passing year this Nation becomes more deeply in debt as congressional expenditures grossly and repeatedly exceed available revenues so that the public debt now exceeds a half-trillion dollars; and

"Whereas, attempts to limit spending by means of the new congressional budget committee procedures have proved fruitless; and

"Whereas, the annual Federal budget repeatedly demonstrates an unwillingness or inability of both the legislative and executive branches of the Federal government to curtail spending to conform to available revenues; and

"Whereas, the proposed budget of five hundred billion dollars for fiscal year 1978–1979 does not reflect total spending because of the exclusion of special outlays which are not included in the budget nor subject to the legal public debt limit; and

"Whereas, believing that fiscal irresponsibility at the Federal level, with the resulting inflation and decline in the Nation's trading position is a growing and corrosive threat to our economy, to the well-being of our people, and to our representative democracy, that constitutional restraint is necessary to bring the fiscal discipline needed to reverse this trend. Now, therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Senate, the House of Representatives concurring:

"That Congress is requested, pursuant to Article V of the United States Constitution, to call a constitutional convention for the specific and exclusive purpose of proposing an amendment to the Federal Constitution.

"Be it further resolved that the proposed new amendment read substantially as follows:

"Proposed Article XXVII

"The total of all federal appropriations made by the Congress for any fiscal year shall not exceed the total of the estimated federal revenues for that fiscal year, excluding any revenues derived from borrowing, and this prohibition extends to all federal appropriations and all estimated federal revenues, excluding any revenues derived from borrowing. The President in submitting budgetary requests and the Congress in enacting appropriation bills shall comply with this article.

"The provisions of this article shall be suspended for one year upon the proclamation by the President of an unlimited national emergency. The suspension may be extended, but not for more than one year at any one time, if two-thirds of the membership of both Houses of Congress so determine by Joint Resolution."

"Be it further resolved that copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives and to each member of Congress from South Carolina.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The following reports of committees were submitted:

By Mr. RIEGLE, from the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, without amendment:

S. 3156. An original bill to amend the Consumer Credit Protection Act to provide consumer rights and remedies in electronic fund transfer systems (together with additional views) (Rept. No. 95–915). Placed on the calendar.

By Mr. PROXMIRE, from the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs:

Second report on the conduct of monetary policy (together with additional and supplemental views) (Rept. No. 95–916).

By Mr. BAYH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, without amendment:

S. 2937. A bill to amend the Speedy Trial Act of 1974 to provide further authorization for appropriations for pretrial services agencies (Rept. No. 95–917).

By Mr. BAYH, from the Committee on the Judiciary:

S. Res. 470. An original resolution waiving section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 with respect to the consideration of S. 2937, a bill to amend the Speedy Trial Act of 1974 to provide further authorization for appropriations for pretrial services agencies. Referred to the Committee on the Budget.

By Mr. MUSKIE, from the Committee on the Budget, without amendment:

S. Res. 450. A resolution waiving section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 with respect to the consideration of H.R. 11877 (Rept. No. 95–918).

S. Res. 453. A resolution waiving section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 with respect to the consideration of S. 3075 (Rept. No. 95–919).

S. Res. 455. A resolution waiving section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 with respect to the consideration of S. 3076 (Rept.No.95–920).

S. Res. 456. A resolution waiving section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 with respect to the consideration of S. 3067, the Civil Rights Commission Act of 1978, a bill to authorize appropriations for the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, and for other purposes (Rept. No. 95–921).

S. Res. 460. A resolution waiving section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 with respect to the consideration of S. 3112 (Rept. No. 95–922).

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. STONE:

S. 3154. A bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Human Resources.

By Mr. HATCH (for himself, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. HELMS, and Mr. BELLMON):

S. 3155. A bill to establish a commission to study the proposal that the populated areas of the District of Columbia be retroceded to the State of Maryland; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

By Mr. RIEGLE (from the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs):

S. 3156. A bill to amend the Consumer Credit Protection Act to provide consumer rights and remedies in electronic fund transfer systems. Original bill reported and placed on the calendar.

By Mr. MATHIAS:

S. 3157. A bill for the relief of Mrs. Kae Soon Sin; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DOMENICI:

S. 3158. A bill to authorize the investigation to study the feasibility of the Santa Cruz Dam and Reservoir, Santa Cruz Irrigation District, N. Mex., and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

By Mr. ANDERSON:

S. 3159. A bill for the relief of Mr. Jesus Castanos Dumagan; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GLENN:

S. 3160. A bill to provide for increased allied health personnel in medically underserved urban and rural areas; to the Committee on Human Resources.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. STONE:

S. 3154. A bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938, as amended, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Human Resources.

LEGISLATION TO AVOID IMPROPER APPLICATION OF THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT TO COMMISSARY EMPLOYEES

● Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I am introducing today legislation which will have the effect of overturning a ruling of the U.S. Civil Service Commission that baggers at military commissaries should be regarded as Federal employees for purposes of the Fair Labor Standards Act. This ruling will take place on July 30, 1978.

Many military personnel retirees, and their dependents do their food shopping at commissaries operated by the military departments. At most of these stores there are persons who help the patrons bag and carry out their purchases and are paid tips by the patrons they help. The tips are their sole compensation. These men and women are sometimes off-duty, low-ranking military personnel. Some of them are high school students. They are independent entrepreneurs offering their services according to their own convenience. They are not supervised by the commissaries and have never been considered commissary employees.

In addition, it will be necessary for increased costs of this ruling to be born by taxpayers through an increase in commissary subsidies or by increasing the taxes on goods sold in commissaries. I have been informed that commissaries in Florida are planning to increase their tax from 4 to 6 percent, because of this ruling. The present system is an efficient system. The baggers are able to work during their free hours and make much better income than minimum wage for the hours they work. They work for tips and get the job done. Increasing taxes in order to pay minimum wage to people who want to work is an absurdity and a back-door method for closing down the military commissary system.

Congressman LES ASPIN has introduced a companion bill in the House of Representatives, H.R. 6256. I hope the Senate Committee on Human Resources will act on this matter in time to stop this ruling from taking effect on July 30, 1978.●

By Mr. HATCH (for himself, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. HELMS, and Mr. BELLMON):

S. 3155. A bill to establish a commission to study the proposal that the populated areas of the District of Columbia be retroceded to the State of Maryland; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BOUNDARY COMMISSION

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, as my colleagues are aware, both the Republican and Democrat Party platforms of 1976 have endorsed the principle of representation of the District of Columbia in the Congress. Because the District is not a State, its citizens have been denied a voice in the National Legislature. In my view, the disfranchisement of District residents is more the result of accident than design, and I do not see any justification for perpetuating this mistake in the future. The privilege of participating in the electoral process is a basic principle of our system of government. It is time that the citizens of the District were represented in Congress. They bear the burdens and responsibilities of American citizenship; and they should also enjoy all the privileges of American citizenship.

To correct the problem, a number of constitutional amendments have been proposed to give District residents their own Senators and Congressmen. The House recently passed House Joint Resolution 554, which, instead of being referred to committee, was held at the desk. It is now on the Senate Calendar and could be called up by the leadership at any time. In addition, the Constitution Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee, on which I serve, having completed 3 days of hearings, is presently considering Senate Joint Resolution 65. This resolution differs in a number of respects from the House version, but in general seeks to accomplish the same purpose.

In my judgment, these proposed amendments are unacceptable from a constitutional as well as practical standpoint. Senate Joint Resolution 65 would give District residents no voice in the ratification or rejection of proposed constitutional amendments. House Joint Resolution 554 would give District residents extraordinary voting privileges that are not enjoyed by other Americans, such as direct participation by "the people" in the amending process, while at the same time taking away their right to vote in Presidential elections. Section 3 of House Joint Resolution 554, as I pointed out in my statement to the subcommittee, inadvertently abolishes not only the 23d amendment but also the newly won right of District residents to vote for electors to cast a vote in the electoral college. No less significant is the fact that neither resolution would allow the citizens of the District the right to enjoy the benefits of State citizenship.

Practically speaking, these proposed amendments are likely to encounter stiff opposition in several States.The population of the District of Columbia has been steadily decreasing since 1950. An overwhelming number of District residents are employed by the Federal Government. The geographical area of the District is small compared to that of the States, and no other city in America has its own representation in Congress. In effect, the American people would be asked to give a special interest group, Federal employees, living in a city with a shrinking population, its own Senators and Congressmen. I do not believe they will accept this.

Far preferable to a constitutional amendment, it seems to me, is retrocession of the populous sections of the District back to the State of Maryland. There are a number of advantages to this approach. First, it can be accomplished without the difficulty and delay of an amendment—an amendment that is likely to fail anyway. Second, it can be accomplished without distorting the Constitution. And third, it is the only approach to the problem that will give District residents all the benefits of both National and State citizenship.

Accordingly, I am today introducing legislation, together with Senators STEVENS, HELMS, and BELLMON, to establish a Boundary Commission that will be charged with the responsibility of studying this issue and making recommendations to Congress regarding retrocession of certain portions of the District to Maryland. This, in my view, is the only right and practical approach to the problem of representation for District residents. The only objection I have heard to this approach is that the citizens of the District and Maryland have expressed no interest in it, that is not reason enough. Before resorting to a drastic amendment, we owe it to the people involved to explore every opportunity that is available to bring the ciitzens of the District to full citizenship, in a manner that is mutually satisfactory to the people of the District and the State of Maryland.

Mr. President, I urge my colleagues to support this legislation, and ask unanimous consent that the bill I am introducing be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3155

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

PURPOSE

SECTION 1. It is the purpose of this Act to establish a commission to study the proposal that populated areas of the District of Columbia be retroceded to the State of Maryland, thus affording the residents of the present District of Columbia with representation in the Congress of the United States and the Government of the State of Maryland.

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION

SEC. 2. (a) There is established a commission to be known as the District of Columbia Boundary Commission (thereinafter referred to as the "Commission").

(b) The Commission shall consist of—

(1) five public members to be appointed by the President of the United States;

(2) five Members of the United States Senate; and

(3) five Members of the United States House of Representatives.

(c) The President of the United States shall designate on public member as Chairman of the Commission.

(d) A quorum shall consist of eight members.

(e)(1) Members of the Commission who are not regular full-time employees of the United States shall, while serving on the business of the Commission, be entitled to receive compensation at rates fixed by the Chairman, but not to exceed the minimum daily rate prescribed for GS–15 of the General Schedule under section 5331 of title 5, United States Code, including traveltime for each day they are engaged in the performance of their duties as members of the Commission, and shall be entitled to reimbursement for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in carrying out their duties under this Act.

(2) Members of the Commission who are employed by the Federal Government (including Members of Congress) shall serve without compensation but shall be reimbursed for travel, subsistence, and other necessary expenses incurred by them in carrying out their duties under this Act.

FUNCTIONS

SEC. 3. (a) The Commission shall conduct a study of the proposal that populated areas of the District of Columbia be retroceded to the State of Maryland.

(b) Aspects of the proposal to be studied shall include—

(1) the boundaries of an area which should remain a Federal enclave as the seat of the Government;

(2) the procedure for retroceding areas to the State of Maryland; and

(3) the need to provide police, fire, sanitation, and other services to the remaining Federal enclave.

(c) Upon completion of the study, but not later than July 15, 1979, the Commission shall submit to the Congress a report on the study carried out under this Act, including any recommendations for legislation.

ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

SEC. 4. (a) In order to carry out the functions of the Commission under this Act, the Chairman is authorized, with the advice of the Commission, to appoint and fix the compensation of an Executive Director and additional staff, without regard to title 5, United States Code, governing appointments in the competitive service, and without regard to chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title relating to classification and General Schedule pay rates, but at rates not in excess of the minimum rate prescribed for GS–15 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of such title.

(b) In order to carry out its functions under this Act the Commission is authorized to—

(1) hold such hearings as may be required to carry out the povisions of this Act;

(2) secure from any Federal agency, including any independent establishment or instrumentality of the United States, from the District of Columbia, or from any State or political subdivision thereof, information required in the performance of its functions under this Act;

(3) obtain the services of experts and consultants in accordance with the provisions of section 3109 of title 5, United States Code (but at a daily rate not to exceed the minimum daily rate prescribed for GS–15 of the General Schedule under section 5332 of such title);

(4) enter into contracts, grants, or other arrangements, or modifications thereof, necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act; and

(5) make other necessary expenditures.

(c) The General Services Administration shall provide to the Commission on a reimbursable basis such administrative support services as the Commission may request.

AUTHORIZATION

SEC. 5. There are authorized to be appropriated for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this Act such sums as may be necessary.

TERMINATION

SEC. 6. The Commission shall terminate upon submission of its report to the Congress as required under section 3(c).●

By Mr. DOMENICI:

S. 3158. A bill to authorize the investigation to study the feasibility of the Santa Cruz Dam and Reservoir, Santa Cruz Irrigation District, N. Mex., and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, today I am introducing legislation to authorize the Department of the Interior to study the feasibility of rehabilitating and enlarging the storage capacity of the Santa Cruz Dam and Reservoir located at Santa Cruz, N. Mex.

The Santa Cruz Dam and Reservoir was completed in 1929 with an original storage capacity of 4,615 acre-feet. This irrigation storage facility is of critical importance to the approximately 1,700 owners of small tracts of irrigated land in the district. The relatively reliable water supply the reservoir has supplied in most years has enabled district farmers to concentrate their farming efforts on fruit orchards and other crops with relatively high-income potential. However, since 1929, approximately 1,200 acre-feet of the storage capacity of the reservoir has been lost by siltation. This gradually accumulating loss of storage capacity has greatly affected the water supply to district farmers and caused them increasing economic distress in dry years. It is, therefore, a matter of the highest priority to the district to investigate the feasibility of raising the existing structure so as to recover storage capacity lost to siltation and, if possible, to increase the original capacity to better use the water supply of the Santa Cruz River and more effectively serve the highly dependent agricultural community.

Under this legislation, the Department of the Interior will be authorized to carry out and act upon an investigation into the dam's current stability and safety in relation to expanding the facility. I strongly urge the committee to respond to the needs of this community and deal with this matter as promptly as possible.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a resolution passed by the Santa Cruz Irrigation District in support of this legislation, as well as a letter from the Secretary of the New Mexico Interstate Stream Commission expressing the commission's support, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RESOLUTION

Whereas, the Bureau of Reclamation, under contract with the Santa Cruz Irrigation District, completed an appraisal report in October, 1976 covering structural stability, preliminary geology, hydrology and cost for raising Santa Cruz Dam, and

Whereas, the Bureau of Reclamation also covered a more detailed geologic analysis and report on Santa Cruz Dam in November, 1977, and

Whereas, the reports of the Bureau of Reclamation indicate, based on the limited data secured for these studies, that Santa Cruz Dam can be modified to regain the original reservoir capacity that has been lost to accumulated sediments and to provide additional capacity, and

Whereas, the Board of Directors of the Santa Cruz Irrigation District, having examined the reports of the Bureau of Reclamation, desires that a feasibility study of increasing the capacity of Santa Cruz Reservoir be made by the Bureau of Reclamation, and

Whereas, it is the understanding of the Board of Directors of the Santa Cruz irrigation District and Congressional authorization for such a feasibility study is required.

Now, therefore, be it resolved, that the Board of Directors of the Santa Cruz Irrigation District requests that Congressional authorizattion and funding be sought for the Bureau of Reclamation to make a feasibility study of raising Santa Cruz Dam to increase the capacity of Santa Cruz Reservoir.

Be it further resolved that the Board of Directors requests that such a feasibility study include consideration of potential new depletions of water for irrigation, domestic and municipal and industrial water supplies, such depletions to be offset by replacement from imported San Juan-Chama Project water.

Be it further resolved that copies of this resolution be sent to New Mexico's congressional delegation, the Governor of New Mexico, the State Engineer and the Commissioner of the Bureau of Reclamation.

NEW MEXICO INTERSTATE STREAM COMMISSION,
Sante Fe, N. Mex., March 22, 1978.

Hon. PETE V. DOMENICI,
U.S. Senate, Russell Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: The Santa Cruz Irrigation District by resolution dated March 6, 1978 requested that Congressional authorization and funding be sought for the Bureau of Reclamation to make a feasibility study of raising Santa Cruz Dam to increase the capacity of Santa Cruz Reservoir.

The Interstate Stream Commission at a meeting on March 21 discussed the Santa Cruz Dam problems and unanimously approved the following motion.

". . . that the Commission support Congressional authorization of an investigation by the Bureau of Reclamation to determine the feasibility of a project to rehabilitate and improve the existing Santa Cruz Dam and Reservoir, including the repair and stabilization of the face of the concrete dam, the enlargement of spillway capacity to insure the safety of the structure and the raising of the dam to increase storage capacity, giving full consideration to the potential for development of the project as a unit or a part of a unit of the San Juan-Chama project."

Please let me know if some further discussion of this matter would be helpful.

Sincerely,

S. E. REYNOLDS,
Secretary.●

By Mr. GLENN:

S. 3160. A bill to provide for increased allied health personnel in medically underserved urban and rural areas; to the Committee on Human Resources.

URBAN AND RURAL PARA-MEDICAL ACT OF 1978

● Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, geographic maldistribution of health professionals is one of the major problems that we face today. The costs of medical care rise constantly, we pour badly needed funds into our medical schools for training, yet many of our inner city and rural areas lack the most fundamental forms of basic health treatment. In 1975 when we considered the Health Manpower Act of 1975, the president of the AMA, Dr. Malcolm Todd stated "it will not make any difference if we have 440,000 physicians in 1980 because they will not be where we need them." The Committee on Goals and Priorities of the National Board of Medical Examiners reported in 1973 that the traditional rule that overproduction of a product leads to lower prices, supply curtailment and the automatic introduction of the product into undersupplied areas does not apply to the medical profession. The report concluded that regardless of the number of physicians serving a given population group, a physician can readily establish and maintain a thriving practice. The report attributed this to an apparent unlimited demand for and ability to pay for, health services by affluent groups in our society. For example, Boston in 1975 had 321 physicians per 100,000 population, more than twice the national average, yet there were large areas of inner city Boston and rural Vermont and New Hampshire lacking in adequate medical services. How then, can we bring basic, competent health care to our medically underserved areas?

Many have suggested scholarship incentives to medical students if they agree to practice in such areas for certain periods of time. Others have suggested that the problems will ease as medical schools become more representative of the population as a whole, that is, that blacks will serve blacks, rural whites will serve rural whites. The latter argument, aside from being patronizing, seems to me to be a terribly conjectual way to purport to deal with a major policy problem. Surely we need large numbers of young black physicians, whites from rural and low-income background, but, I, for one, want to visualize the day in this society where the black physician, or white, will practice and serve throughout the society and not exclusively to any narrowly defined racial or geographic segment. What then is a practical, viable approach that offers solid, tangible, and immediate help to our underserved areas?

Mr. President, I believe that there is an approach that would bring immediate health service assistance to these areas while at the same time perhaps providing a device that would make professional medical practice in the inner city or rural areas more attractive to physicians. As more paramedics would provide improved health facilities and support personnel to areas deficient in both, I am proposing a significant expansion of the Federal effort to encourage the training of paramedics, physician assistants, physician extenders, medics and nurse practitioner personnel. I propose that these training programs be targeted in terms of training and practice to medically underserved urban or rural areas. Training would be in conjunction with hospitals and medical schools located in or near these areas. Importantly, priority in selection of trainees will be given to residents of the target areas. This feature is very important, Mr. President, because it not only provides a viable career goal and employment opportunity to residents of areas suffering from the lack of career opportunities, it also provides a built-in incentive for citizens to not abandon their communities but to stay and help these communities develop.

There is, at present, a checkerboard proliferation of federally-supported physician assistant programs. There are programs supported in the Defense Department, the Veteran's Administration, the Public Health Service, and the Indian Health Service. There are 53 AMA-approved programs for physician assistants with a student enrollment of approximately 1,300. The association of physician assistant programs estimates that a total of approximately 5,200 physician assistants provide primary care today. There were an estimated 1,080 graduates of all federally-supported physician assistant programs in fiscal year 1977. Additionally, our Armed Forces have already trained countless individuals as paramedics. Many of these men and women are veterans who have never pursued the skills that they learned in the armed forces. These veterans should also be priority targets for an expanded corps of physician extenders.

The U.S. Army over the past 6 years has trained that following numbers of men and women in basic paramedical skills:

1974		6,513
1975		6,301
1976		11,576
1978	(so far)	2,234

During the Vietnam era, many more men and women in all of the services received paramedical training. With some additional training, many of these individuals could serve as civilian physician extenders.

COMPLICATING FACTORS IN THE PHYSICIAN EXTENDER FIELD

Mr. President, there are several reasons why physician extender services are not presently more expansive and extensive. One unresolved problem is that of appropriate Federal policy in the area of third party payments and reimbursements. What policies will encourage greater use of extenders while not contributing to inflationary expenditures in health care? Hopefully, the Social Security Administration's current study in this area will help us find answers.

Another problem is that State law relative to physician extender practice varies tremendously, thereby encouraging uneveness in this area. I include at this point a chart depicting State variances.

Totals:

54 acts were analyzed in the table.

30 jurisdictions have added provisions to their nurse practice acts which facilitate role expansion, and Virginia has revised its medical practice act.

10 jurisdictions have not added new provisions, but the nurse practice act does not prohibit diagnosis and treatment.

13 jurisdictions still prohibit the nurse from diagnosing and treating.

Hopefully, in hearings, we will analyze this question in more depth to see if there are reasonable steps that might be taken to encourage more uniformity.

SPECIFIC FACTS ON MALDISTRIBUTION OF PHYSICIANS

Mr. President, the American Medical Association's 1975 report, "Physician Distribution and Medical Licensure in the U.S." found 141 counties in the United States that had no active Federal or non-Federal physicians in patient care. Many are sparsely populated areas, however 37 of these counties are adjacent to standard metropolitan statistical areas. Although the AMA does not attempt to measure the adequacy of the distribution of physicians, citing the difficulty of finding a commonly accepted standard, we do know that the New England area has the highest ratio of physicians per 100,000 civilians in 214, while the lowest, 117, is the East South Central area. The East North Central area, of which Ohio is part, has a ratio of 146 doctors per 100,000 civilians. Among States, Ohio in 1975 ranked 24th in physician per 100,000 population. Massachusetts, New York, and Connecticut ranked at the top, Arkansas, Alabama, and Mississippi ranked last. Even within these broad figures, Mr. President, we must remember that they are averages only that are not necessarily representative of distribution problems. One need only travel through the inner cities and the rural areas of the top ranked States to discover that these good ratios are only good for certain parts of cities and States. Mr. President, I wish to make part of the RECORD a table showing the ratio of physicians to population on a State-by-State basis.

I believe that an expanded program of physician extenders has a real potential of plugging some of the health care gaps that impact so severely upon some isolated and rural communities. The long term overall solution may well be more physicians and better facilities. My bill is more of a short-term, immediate solution to a pressing, immediate problem.

SUMMARY

Mr. President, my bill proceeds from two basic assumptions. First, there is at present no coherent national policy of training physician extenders from medically underserved areas with the expectation that they would work in these communities. Indeed, roughly 50 percent of those extenders now trained practice in States other than those in which they were trained.

Second, in terms of medical manpower relative to health needs, it is clear that there is a large gap and that this gap impacts most heavily upon low-income urban and rural areas. The Urban and Rural Paramedical Act of 1978 is designed to close this gap.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD, along with a very informative article from the May 25 New York Times describing a highly successful paramedical experiment in rural areas of North Carolina.

There being no objection, the bill and article were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3160

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Urban and Rural Para-Medical Act of 1978".

SEC. 2. Subpart II of Part G of title VII of the Public Health Service Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"URBAN AND RURAL ALLIED HEALTH PROGRAMS

"SEC. 799. (a) The Secretary may make grants to public and nonprofit private entities for the purposes of—

"(1) training allied health personnel to meet the special needs of persons located in medically underserved urban or rural areas,

"(2) providing training of allied health personnel in conjunction with hospitals and medical schools located in or near medically underserved urban or rural areas, and

"(3) establishing allied health medical centers in affiliation with hospital centers.

"(b) Priority for such training and employment shall be given to residents of the medically underserved urban or rural areas and to armed services veterans who have received similar training.

"(c) There are authorized to be appropriated to carry out the purposes of this section such sums as may be necessary.".

RURAL HEALTH TEST: CLINICS WITHOUT DOCTORS

(By Steven V. Roberts)

HARRELLS, N.C.—When Mary Bland's mother went to live with her, the elderly woman was in poor health. The nearest doctors were in Clinton, 22 miles away, and they were so over-loaded that they were not taking any new patients.

So Mrs. Bland took her mother to a new clinic here that is headed by Barbara Lipsey, a 28-year-old physician's assistant. Within months, the patient was off most of her medication and back on her feet, and now she looks forward to her clinic visits as a high-point in her day.

"Barbara's been real good to mother," said Mrs. Bland, the wife of a construction worker. "She's better than she's been for years."

The clinic in Harrells, a town of 300 persons 11 miles southeast of Raleigh, is an experiment in the delivery of rural health care. Since the family doctor willing to practice in small towns is almost an extinct species, North Carolina has established 21 primary care clinics in rural areas thoughout the state.

SPECIAL TRAINING NEEDED

Only four are run by physicians. The rest are headed by physicians' assistants, such as Miss Lipsey, or family nurse practitioners. Both degrees, which are now offered by a growing number of universities, require at least a year or two of special training.

Several hundred of these clinics have sprung up around the country, and Congress recently made them eligible for reimbursement under Medicare and Medicaid. Until March, when the law went into effect, these programs paid only for care administered by a doctor.

The financial benefit will be considerable—an increase of 20 to 30 percent in most clinics' income—and should help to assure their stability.

Public acceptance of these clinics-without-doctors is growing steadily, although doubts persist. Under pressure from the medical community, many states still have laws that restrict, or at least discourage, paraprofessionals from practicing.

NEW PROGRAMS DEVELOPED

"We can't change the public's attitude toward physicians overnight," said James D. Bernstein, chief of the state office of Rural Health Services. "The mystique of the doctor is still there."

Many rural areas had a doctor until 20 years ago. But as old family physicians died or retired from small-town practice, they were not replaced.

Medical graduates now frequently become specialists and live in bigger towns, where they can enjoy a richer social and cultural life and join a group practice if they wish. At the same time, medical schools have been developing new programs to train paraprofessionals, partly to use medical corpsmen returning from Vietnam. The schools have also developed prototypes for the current clinic system, which started four years ago.

One key to a successful clinic is the involvement of the local community. Each one is run by a local board and partly financed by contributions from at least 500 families in the area. "We feel," said Gail Kelley, a community organizer for the Rural Health Service, "that if they don't want it really badly, it won't work."

Another key is that the paraprofessional is not isolated, but works as part of a team. Each clinic has close relations with nearby doctors who are available for consultations and referrals.

At Harrells the other day, T.C. Bland, Mary Bland's husband, was in for a regular blood test. At the clinic in Newton Grove, 40 miles away, 6-year-old Jamey Jones had a stomach ache that could have been appendicitis. The daily routine in both places includes physicals and allergy shots and treatment of sprains and cuts.

AN OBVIOUS ADVANTAGE

One obvious advantage of the clinics is convenience. Phyllis Jones, Jamey's mother, said that she had waited three days for a doctor's appointment in Clinton. When she called Rometta Warren, the nurse practitioner in Newton Grove, she was told to bring Jamey by in an hour.

Some patients even prefer the clinic to a doctor's care. Like many paraprofessionals, Mrs. Warren is a native of the town where she practices.

"Mrs. Warren's easy to talk to and very sympathetic," said Marilyn McLamb, who's son, Doug, had an earache and poison ivy. "You can call her up and talk to her; you can't do that with a doctor. Also, it's a more relaxed, first-name basis. They know me, and I know them."

Some critics charge that the clinics provide second-class service. Miss Lipsey says that many patients are still ignorant of what she has been trained to do, but she defends the quality of care at the Harrells clinic.

REPORT RAISED QUESTIONS

"It's second-class care only if we don't know the limits of our skills and don't refer the hard cases," she said.

In a recent report, the Council of State Government praised the North Carolina experiment but raised several questions. The bureaucracy was too cumbersome, the clinic hours too short and the salaries too low, the report said.

One sign of growing community confidence is that the patient load in most clinics is rising every month. Now officials are starting to worry how they can continue to expand and still provide the personal service that has become the hallmark of the clinics.●

ADDITIONAL COSPONSORS

S. 551

At the request of Mr. MATHIAS, his name was added as a cosponsor of S. 551, to provide for grants to States for the payment of compensation to persons injured by certain criminal acts and omissions, and for other purposes.

S. 1780

At the request of Mr. DOMENICI, the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) was added as a cosponsor of S. 1780, the elementary and secondary optional consolidation bill.

S. 2472

At the request of Mr. LEAHY, he was added as a cosponsor of S. 2472, a bill to amend the Public Health Service Act to extend through the fiscal year ending September 30, 1983, the assistance program for community health centers; migrant health services; to extend through the fiscal year ending September 30, 1981; hemophilia; home health services; to extend through the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, the assistance programs for comprehensive public health services; hypertension programs; disease control programs; venereal disease programs; genetic diseases programs; and lead-based paint programs, and for other purposes.

S. 2732

At the request of Mr. LEAHY, he was added as a cosponsor of S. 2732, a bill to reorganize the executive branch of the Government to consolidate different governmental agencies and activities with respect to energy technology, and for other purposes.

S. 2734

At the request of Mr. LEAHY, he was added as a cosponsor of S. 2734, a bill to establish a Solar Energy Development Bank to provide long-term low-interest loans for the purchase and installation of solar energy equipment in commercial and residential buildings in the United States.

S. 2735

At the request of Mr. LEAHY, he was added as a cosponsor of S. 2735, a bill to facilitate the transition to an economy based on solar energy.

S. 2790

At the request of Mr. CRANSTON, the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY), and the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON) were added as cosponsors of S. 2790, the Renegotiation Exemption Act of 1978.

S. 2791

At the request of Mr. CRANSTON, the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY), and the Senator from Louisiana (Mr. JOHNSTON) were added as cosponsors of S. 2791, the Renegotiation Abeyance Act of 1978.

S. 2941

At the request of Mr. MATHIAS, the Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS) was added as a cosponsor of S. 2941, the marriage tax bill.

SENATE RESOLUTION 242

At the request of Mr. HATCH, the Senator from Mississippi (Mr. EASTLAND) was added as a cosponsor of Senate Resolution 242, relating to proposed Internal Revenue Service rule changes on the tax treatment of employee fringe benefits.

SENATE RESOLUTION 470—ORIGINAL RESOLUTION REPORTED WAIVING CONGRESSIONAL BUDGET ACT

Mr. BAYH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported the following original resolution, which was referred to the Committee on the Budget:

S. RES. 470

Resolved, That, pursuant to section 402(c) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, the provisions of section 402(a) of such Act are waived with respect to the consideration of S. 2937, a bill to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979 in the amount of $5,000,000 for pretrial services agencies.

Such waiver is necessary in order to insure that the pretrial services agencies will be able to carry out its statutory duties during the fiscal year 1979, on the last day of which its final report is due. The authorization involved is sufficiently small that its consideration will not significantly affect the congressional budget. Further, the authorization was of a kind under consideration and contemplated in the congressional budget for fiscal year 1979. Because the Committee on the Judiciary (1) was engaged in substantial efforts to report out a nomination and (2) was conducting the initial Department of Justice authorization of appropriations hearings which were inadvertently delayed by the press of business both within the Committee and within the Senate, the Committee was prevented from giving timely attention to the authorizaion of appropriations for the pretrial services agencies.

AMENDMENTS SUBMITTED FOR PRINTING; MILITARY CONSTRUCTION AUTHORIZATIONS, 1979—S. 3079

(Ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.)

Mr. STONE (for himself and Mr. CHILES) submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, jointly, to the bill (S. 3079) to authorize certain construction at military installations and for other purposes.

LAND CONVEYANCES IN OKALOOSA COUNTY, FLA.

● Mr. STONE. Mr. President, today Senator CHILES and I rise to introduce two amendments to S. 3079, the Military Construction Authorization Act for fiscal year 1979. These amendments provide authority for the Secretary of the Air Force for the conveyance of property in Okaloosa County, Fla. The first amendment provides authority to the Secretary of the Air Force to convey to the city of Niceville, Fla., certain lands at Eglin Air Force Base, which are currently excess to military needs in exchange for certain other lands to be provided by the city and which can be militarily utilized by the Air Force. The Government lands to be conveyed provides for reversion to the Government if they are used for other purposes. Any difference in fair market value between the Government land and the land provided by the city shall be paid in cash to the United States. This land is sought by the city of Niceville for use as a cemetery and is greatly needed.

The second amendment would also provide authority to the Secretary of the Air Force to convey to a nonprofit foundation, the Air Force Enlisted Men's Widows and Dependents Home, certain lands at Eglin Air Force Base to be used to expand the facilities of the foundation's home. The lands are not currently needed for Air Force operations and the provision provides that in exchange for such lands the foundation shall transfer to the Air Force other lands owned by the foundation. If the difference in fair market values of the land exchanged should not be in the interests of the United States, it provides that the foundation should pay to the United States an amount equal to the difference in such fair market value, and it further provides that the exchange shall be carried out only under conditions and circumstances satisfactory to the Secretary of the Air Force.

The Enlisted Men's Widows and Dependents Home Foundation, Inc., is a nonprofit charitable organization formed for the purpose of establishing a residence for elderly widows and widowers of Air Force enlisted retired personnel and Air Force enlisted retired couples aged 62 years and above. There is an Air Force Officers' Widows and Dependents Home which has been operational for a number of years in San Antonio. I understand it has been very successful.

Younger widows of active duty enlisted men and their dependent children needing the foundation's help may be accepted on a temporary basis immediately upon the death of a husband. Any elderly widow or widower whose spouse was a retired Air Force enlisted person—Regular, Reserve, or Air National Guard—is eligible to apply for residence.

Mr. President, the language of these amendments is identical to the language of sections 611 and 612 of H.R. 12602, the Military Construction Authorization Act of fiscal year 1979 which has now been passed by the House of Reperesentatives. These facilities are most worthwhile, greatly needed, and the land conveyances necessary to establish them do not require a loss of value to the Government. We urge their favorable consideration during discussion on the Military Construction Authorization Act.●

NOTICE OF HEARING

SUBCOMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTION, MARKETING, AND STABILIZATION

● Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I wish to announce that I will represent the Subcommittee on Agricultural Production, Marketing, and Stabilization of Prices of the Senate Agriculture Committee at crop insurance hearings to be held in Iowa on June 2 and 3. The first round of hearings will be held in Cedar Rapids on the morning of June 2, and the afternoon session will take place near Des Moines. On June 3, I will complete this round of hearings at the Sioux City stockyards. Most of our witnesses will be farmers, and I expect that their testimony will be invaluable to the committee's deliberations on pending crop insurance legislation. Anyone wishing further information should contact the committee staff at 224–2035.●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

CIVILITY

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, "If a man be gracious and courteous to strangers, it shows he is a citizen of the world." This splendid advice from Francis Bacon came to mind the other day as I pondered "Civility," an article by Haynes Johnson which appeared in the Washington Post.

The piece recounts the disturbing and unsettling experiences of a friend of Mr. Johnson's. The gentleman is a naturalized citizen living in Washington, trying to gather information on obtaining immigrant status for his mother, "whom he wants to bring here to live permanently with his family."

At every turn, at each Government agency involved, this man was met with indifference, rudeness, and ultimately hostility. He sought no more than information. He was asking for no special favor or treatment, but only to obey the law, and understand enough to be able to do so.

At a time when the Senate is considering civil service reform, it would behoove all those in civil service ranks to read Mr. Johnson's account in its entirety. There is a lesson to be learned and one worth remembering.

Public service is a high calling. Most civil servants understand this and reflect their understanding in faithful, dedicated and truly "civil" service. Others do not. Each retains the duty to perform as required. But beyond merely toeing the line, is the duty to be a "servant." Samuel Johnson advised us that:

> More knowledge may be gained of a man's real character by a short conversation with one of his servants than from a formal and studied narrative, begun with his pedigree and ended with his funeral.

If Uncle Sam were held to this test, the above experience would tell a sad tale of his character.

It has been said that, "The small courtesies sweeten life; the greater, ennoble it." It is this spirit which should motivate those who serve the public trust and are entrusted with its care.

I ask that the full text of Haynes Johnson's article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Washington Post, May 14, 1978]

A BUSY GOVERNMENT TELEPHONE AND TREATMENT OF THE PUBLIC

(By Haynes Johnson)

What happened to a friend recently may not be of great moment in these days of profound and seemingly insoluble issues—of mindless, barbarous terrorism, of terrible dilemmas surrounding the sale of more arms to competing forces in the Middle East tinderbox of continuing examples of the tractability of inflation and the unwillingness of any group to take the first step in establishing an example of prudence.

But it does matter, for what happened to him should not have happened, and something can be done about it. His case, simply, concerns courtesy. More specifically, it involves the treatment one person receives when dealing with a part of the government bureaucracy, and how that frustrating experience affects him.

My friend is a naturalized citizen who has a good professional job in Washington. His troubles began when he sought information about obtaining immigrant status for his mother, whom he wants to bring here to live permanently with his family.

He called the number listed for the immigration and Naturalization Service, and was given another number to get information about his case. He called and called. Busy, always busy. He would try for five minutes or so in the morning, give up, and try again in the afternoon. This went on for four days. At one point, he grew so annoyed he called the federal government operator to say something must be wrong.

The answer came back, in resigned tones, "Oh, no they never answer their phones there." Try another number, was the suggestion. He did, and it too was busy. Finally my friend gave up. He decided to go in person to the downtown immigration field office.

He arrived at noon, during his lunch hour, and went up to the second-floor office. It was filled with many people who had difficulty speaking English. Vietnamese and Spanish-speaking people were particularly evident in the long line waiting for information. The place was jammed. It didn't matter what time you got there, he was told, because people always were waiting.

But, to let my friend tell his own story:

"There was only one person dealing with this long line of people. They told me that another person had gone to lunch. Well, I waited more than an hour and no one came back to help out.

"After standing there in the line for half an hour or so someone told me if I just wanted a blank form I could go right up to the window and ask for it. So I went up and asked for a blank form. And she said, in a very sharp, offhand way: 'I announced a few minutes ago that I will tell people who want a blank form when to come up.' So I went back on the line again.

"Well, it was another 45 minutes before the call came to come up for the forms. I had stood in line practically an hour and a half to get one little form. Then if you have a question—like, I'm sponsoring someone, and is there a financial statement to fill out on a form?—you get told in no uncertain terms:

"'I'm not here to answer questions. You are in this line to get a form and that's all you're going to get. If you want questions answered, you've got to go back to the end of that line.' See, what they're doing is they have one line for forms only, but nothing else. Not one question can you ask.

"Now I don't think that's necessary. They can be more polite than that. Here's only one person dealing with these typical red-tape applications, and that person has to explain to people from foreign cultures and backgrounds who are applying to be citizens, but who often don't speak English very well, who often don't understand.

"I can imagine how it must be for those people who haven't been in this country very long, who don't understand how the system works. I can imagine how befuddling it must be, how frightening it must be, to go there. You know, their whole lives depend on getting those pieces of paper filled out right. Of course they're going to make mistakes.

of course they're going to appear stupid, of course they're going to act as if they don't know what they're doing.

"There was one woman there who didn't know how to fill out a form. She didn't speak English very well, and she didn't get much help. So she was told there was nobody who could help her and to come back another day. I just try to project myself to somebody who is very frightened, who goes there dealing with the United States Government and who wants to make sure that everything he does is right and proper. And then to run into those people who are so off-hand. They don't even explain.

"Very often you get the feeling that if you don't give them exactly what they want two things could happen: either your application will get rejected or it will be delayed. In fact, they tell you if you don't fill out the form right you could be either rejected or the application delayed. So you're already under the gun when you get there, and if these people are not very helpful it's pretty bad.

"I think that a little bit of courtesy, a little bit of politeness, would go a long way with these people."

The afternoon after my friend had related this story I called the Immigration and Naturalization Service number. An operator gave me another number to call for information. I called. It rang and rang and rang—and rang and rang and rang. I hung up. Several minutes later I dialed again. This time I began counting the number of rings: brrring . . . brrring . . . brring. Five times, 15 times, 30 times, 45 times.

There's something maddeningly frustrating—and even, in time, a bit fearful—about listening to the persistent ringing of an unanswered telephone when you know someone must be at the other end of the line. What is really happening there? Does anyone care? It is all unnerving. After 50 rings I hung up, waited a few minutes, and dialed again. The same response.

That next morning I tried again, This time the busy signal sounded, and I confess that normally unpleasant sound came as something of a relief. The office was obviously open, business surely proceeding. After getting the same busy tones over the course of two hours I followed my friend's example and went to the office.

The office was crowded, all right, though not with the lengthy lines in my friend's experience. There were two windows at a counter. On one of them a hand-lettered note had been taped. It said: "Forms Only. No Questions." No one was working that window. The other window was operated by a government worker.

That scene would not fairly be described as rancorous. Most of the people wore subdued, patient looks. They filled the chairs around the room, waiting. At the counter they were dealt with briskly. One heated scene developed when a couple from an Eastern European embassy became aggressive and angered about not getting answers to their questions. Whether they actually got them or not I cannot testify. Some were told, frankly, their questions couldn't be answered there.

How those people gathered in that room really felt, whether or not their reactions were at all like my friend's. I cannot say. But then I'm not an immigrant, or even a naturalized citizen seeking information from my government.●

TELECOMMUNICATIONS POLICY

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. President, early in the first session of the 95th Congress I was joined by nine cosponsors in introducing Senate Resolution 114 which asks the Senate Commerce, Science, and Transportation Committee to hold hearings to review U.S. telecommunications policy. Since 1968, the Federal Communications Commission has allowed limited competition in the specialized common carrier and interconnect markets of the telephone industry. The impact this action has had on the communications industry has been the subject of much discussion here in Congress and throughout the Nation. I have always believed that a full and fair review of all the complicated issues regarding telecommunications policy is necessary. The Senate and House Subcommittees on Communications have made a limited effort in that direction.

Since the introduction of that resolution, I have received many letters of endorsement from interested groups in Minnesota. There is concern for the future direction of our telecommunications policies. I am hopeful that the Senate Communications Subcommittee will pursue this necessary review.

1946 LOBBYING DISCLOSURE ACT

● Mr. PERCY. Mr. President, the 1946 Lobbying Disclosure Act has proven to be nothing but a sham. It is not only ineffective, but actually counterproductive by giving a grossly false picture of efforts to persuade Congress. We have a duty to remedy this problem, and must choose between two alternatives: Replacing the 1946 act with an effective, evenhanded law or striking lobby disclosure from the books altogether.

I believe that the Congress and the American people have a right to know basic information about efforts to affect the course of our legislative process. There is nothing sinster about lobbying. It is a vital exercise of free speech and the right to petition, and should be encouraged, but not discouraged. Yet an informed public is also an essential ingredient of our democratic system. There is a compelling public interest in letting the sun shine in on organized lobbying efforts—business, labor, foreign representatives, special interest, and citizen groups alike. The Supreme Court has found that reasonable lobby disclosure requirements are fully constitutional. And I believe that promoting a realistic understanding of significant pressures on Congress will actually stimulate greater participation in Government.

In working out the specific provisions of such legislation, many questions arise. What must we know to gain a clear picture of lobbying? Who should be covered? What impact will these requirements have? I believe that a straightforward cost-benefit approach is the best means of weighing these factors.

Some have urged comprehensive disclosure of lobbying activities, including among other things, an identification of who is contacted, what is said, and an itemized listing of all expenditures. Such information would be very valuable to those interested in the legislative process, but we must also look at the costs. Disclosure of this magnitude would impose enormous new burdens which would almost certainly have a "chilling" effect on the free expression of views to Congress. After studying these proposals carefully, it became clear that the costs of such comprehensive disclosure would be too high, for outweighing the benefits and I vigorously will oppose such disclosure requirements.

Others have taken the approach that less reporting is better by definition, and that we should exempt all but the largest lobbyists. I couldn't agree more that we must tread carefully to avoid a new wave of needless Government intrusion. Yet here too we must look at costs and benefits. We have a clear responsibility to minimize the costs of this legislation, but as we reduce reporting burdens we also forego information. We must not fall into the trap of reducing the level of disclosure—in the name of cutting costs—so far that the whole exercise is meaningless. It would be far better to have no disclosure at all.

The primary bill now before the Governmental Affairs Committee is far from perfect. Certain major provisions can and should be dropped from the bill, and some fine tuning is appropriate. But I believe that the basic structure of S. 2971 comes much closer to the delicate balance of costs and benefits which should be the committee's goal than the bills originally introduced.

The first consideration in examining this bill is who would be required to register as a lobbyist. I feel very strongly that any lobbying disclosure legislation must be evenhanded. The disclosure must not be designed to give the false impression that only large business and labor interests make significant efforts to influence Congress. Communications from citizen organizations are one of the most influential forces in the legislative process—as they should be—and information on their efforts is every bit as important to a full understanding of Congress as information about those with financial interests at stake. Nor should it be any more burdensome for professional lobbying organizations to comply with this bill than for organizations that do their own "in house" lobbying.

However, it is also clear that a cost-benefit test would not be met if each person or organization which communicates with Congress were required to register and report. Such overly sweeping legislation would place far too great a burden on the American people and would be counterproductive by failing to filter out the important information.

The committee has adopted provisions which respond to these concerns by covering only those who engage in significant amounts of lobbying—

Individuals expressing their own opinions do not have to register;

Volunteer organizations do not have to register;

Organizations with paid employees do not have to register unless their paid staff engage in the threshold amount of lobbying;

Public testimony before Congress and public speeches are not counted in determining whether an organization is a lobbyist;

Communications with the Senators and Congressmen representing an organization's principal place of business are also not counted toward the threshold;

Organizations which only make a few contacts in a quarter aside from their State delegation do not have to register;

Organizations located outside of the Washington area with a total budget below $75,000 do not have to register;

Organizations which make a single lobbying effort of 6 days or less in a year do not have to register;

Lobbying through publications with general circulation or through radio and TV broadcasts—other than paid advertisements—are not counted.

Those who would be required to register and report fall into three categories:

First, organizations with paid staff which spend at least $1,750 in a quarter to hire professional lobbyists would be covered. A number of my constituents feel that it is not fair to exempt volunteer organizations which still spend this much money to hire professional lobbyists. I am sympathetic with this objection, although there are good arguments on both sides. I look forward to discussing this point with my colleagues during committee markup.

Second, organizations whose own paid staff communicate in person or by phone at least 20 times in a quarter with Members outside their home State delegation or with congressional committees would be covered. This threshold provision is further qualified by the fact that organizations with only one employee lobbying would not be covered unless that employee contacted Congress at least twice on each of 10 days in the quarter (if two or more employees are lobbying, on each of 5 days in the quarter).

It is important to recognize that any threshold which does not sweep in all those who communicate with Congress will require some amount of recordkeeping, and there will always be organizations on the borderline. We have tried to make the threshold high enough to exempt occasional lobbyists and at the same time keep the recordkeeping as simple as possible.

One frequent comment is that it would be easier to use a simple money test. While that is true in the case of hired lobbyists who are paid through a regular billing system, it is not true for organizations whose own employees lobby. Making the clear-cut determination as to whether an organization is or is not covered by the bill requires a precise calculation. Thus in addition to recordkeeping on the amount of lobbying—which would satisfy the bill's test—a financial test would require a second step of attributing expenses to that lobbying. I believe that the threshold for in-house lobbying which the committee has adopted minimizes recordkeeping while excluding occasional lobbyists.

The third type of activity which would qualify an organization as a lobbyist is spending more than $5,000 in a quarter on a single grassroots solicitation. I will explain the reasons why this provision is necessary in a moment as part of a general discussion of grassroots lobbying.

The other major consideration in reviewing this legislation is what information registered lobbyists would have to disclose. As noted above, the committee decided that disclosure of who lobbyists contact and what specifically is said would require excessive recordkeeping, and would, therefore, be too costly. S. 2971 is designed to obtain information solely on who is doing the lobbying and the scope of their activities.

In determining who the lobbyists are, it is necessary to determine whose interests are being represented. For example, a group named Americans for Better Government could be lobbying on behalf of oil companies, local citizens groups, labor, or any number of other interests. Therefore, in addition to disclosing the name and address of the organization, the names of its principal officers, the names of any formal affiliates, and the approximate number of members, the bill also requires basic information on who is funding the organization. As the Supreme Court acknowledged in its Harriss decision, it is important to know "who is putting up the money and how much."

In drafting this legislation we recognized that the identity of contributors can be sensitive, and so a number of limitations on the disclosure requirements are included. First, the bill only requires the disclosure of organizations—not individuals—who contribute to lobbyists. While this will undoubtedly let a few important contributions slip through, I believe that this step is necessary to protect personal privacy. Second, an estimate of the number of contributors is all that would be required to determine the general nature of the funding base. Third, the dollar threshold for disclosure is raised from $500 per quarter (under existing law) to $3,000 per year. Fourth, in an effort to limit disclosure to larger than average dues and contributions, only those which equal at least 1 percent of the organization's total budget need be listed. Fifth, in order to further protect privacy and to minimize the risk that proprietary information could be derived from the precise amount of dues paid to business associations, the bill provides that the value of contributions need only be disclosed by category; that is, $3,000 to $10,000, not by precise amount. Finally, if a contribution is earmarked for nonlobbying uses (such as a building fund) the contribution would not have to be disclosed.

One additional piece of information which is needed to analyze who membership organizations are really representing is the method used to arrive at positions. This does not require an extensive discussion of internal operations—simply an indication of the extent to which the members participate in these decisions. This information actually will help to protect members who do not always agree with the organization's position.

In determining the scope of a lobbyist's activities, several pieces of information are important. First, a list of the issues on which the organization makes a significant effort is needed. It is also important to know the names of any professional lobbyists who represent the organization and of those employees who spend a significant amount of time lobbying on each of the issues listed.

Another important measure of the scope of the organization's activities is the amount of money that is spent on lobbying. The bill requires an itemized listing of any gifts and receptions given by the lobbyist. On the other hand, detailed reporting of operations expenses would require extensive recordkeeping, so all the bill requires is an estimate of the total expenditures which can be directly attributed to lobbying. While this would include mailing costs, salary, advertising and the like, it would not include general overhead such as rent and utilities. This estimate should be a reasonable one, based on existing records as much as possible. For example, it would not be necessary to prorate a small portion of the salary of an employee who makes one or two contacts with Congress. Similarly, if about 30 percent of the organization's printing volume was for lobbying, 30 percent of total printing costs could be included in the estimate.

The last piece of information which is needed to obtain a reasonable understanding of an organization's lobbying activities is disclosure of significant "grassroots" lobbying campaigns. It has been estimated that over $1 billion is spent each year on this type of lobbying. It has had a major impact on Congress, and accounts for a large portion of the activities of many lobbying organizations—both large and small.

It has been suggested by some that requiring disclosure of grassroots lobbying efforts would be unconstitutional. However, the Supreme Court in United States against Harriss clearly recognized that requiring the disclosure of pressures on Congress "exerted—through an artificially stimulated letter campaign" does not violate any constitutional rights.

There has also been a great deal of misunderstanding about what these provisions would actually do. First and foremost, the bill would not prohibit or infringe on the right of organizations to engage in grassroots lobbying. In addition, those who receive these requests to contact Congress would not have to be identified or make any report, and no record need be kept of whether or not they respond to the solicitation.

The only reporting of grassroots lobbying which would be required by S. 2971 is the following basic information: First, the issue—either a descriptive phrase or, at the organization's discretion, a copy of the solicitation; second, an estimate of the number of people who received the solicitation; third, whether they were in turn asked to solicit others to lobby; fourth, how the campaign was conducted; for example, mail, telephones; and fifth, the cost of the solicitation if it is a paid advertisement which costs more than $5,000. In addition, the total estimate of lobbying costs would have to include grassroots efforts as well as direct communications—utilizing the same method of reasonable allocation discussed above—and the organization would have to give the approximate ratio of direct and indirect lobbying represented by that cost estimate.

I noted earlier that I would discuss the grassroots threshold provision at this point. Most organizations which would be required to register and report under this bill would meet the direct lobbying threshold as well as the grassroots threshold. However, there are several major organizations which specialize in lobbying solicitations which should be required to report. In addition, if there were no separate grassroots threshold, lobbying organizations could create spin-off organizations to do all of their grassroots lobbying and never report those activities. The Committee will consider whether spending $5,000 on one solicitation is an appropriate threshold level. But I believe that it is vital to have some ceiling on the amount of this activity which can go unreported.

I would like to conclude by noting two aspects of S. 2971 with which I do not agree. The first is the provision of criminal penalties for knowing and willful violations of the act. There are several safeguards built into the act to protect against improper use of these powers. Yet I am concerned that smaller lobbyists might be discouraged from lobbying out of a fear that they might somehow be charged with criminal acts. It is necessary to compensate for this change to insure that the GAO will have meaningful enforcement tools, especially in dealing with large and well-funded organizations. I will propose that the maximum possible civil fine be increased to alleviate this problem, with the understanding that the offending organization's resources will be considered in imposing fines.

The other provision of S. 2971 which concerns me is section 8, which requires lobbying organizations to report on efforts to influence the awarding of executive branch contracts worth $10 million or more. These provisions focus on disclosing instances of a revolving door a concern which needs prompt attention. However, this and other aspects of lobbying the executive branch involve numerous considerations which differ substantially from lobbying of Congress. I have for some time felt that these matters should be handled in separate legislation, and I would support an amendment to delete section 8 from the bill on those grounds.

Many concerns have been expressed by my constituents and other interested parties concerning the impact of this legislation. These conerns are real and proper. However, in many instances they seem to be based upon a misconception of the bill's provisions and what would be required to satisfy those requirements. Some of this confusion can be remedied by clarifying the bill's language, and I will insure that this is accomplished. However, it is important to remember that detailed guidelines should not be set forth in legislation. This is the role of the implementing agency—in this case the General Accounting Office—under the supervision of Congress. I intend to monitor the GAO's actions closely to insure not only that they do not subvert congressional intent by requiring tortuous compliance procedures, but also to insure that they actively assist lobbying organizations through the publication of clear and simple guides to compliance and by responding promptly to requests for help.

I believe that the benefits of lobbying disclosure are significant, and are not outweighed by the costs of reasonable, yet effective, legislation.●

GSA: PLANNING FOR A BETTER ENVIRONMENT

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, one of the most crucial issues facing us today is planning for a better environment for people who live and work in the Nation's cities.

I commend one Federal agency which has taken the lead in planning its spending programs around the needs of people who live in the central cities. The General Services Administration, known as the "Nation's landlord," is quietly implementing an urban strategy which includes energy conservation, planning for people, creating beautiful surroundings, and preserving America's urban heritage.

Under the able leadership of GSA Administrator Jay Solomon, under the mandate of President Carter, cities where Federal buildings are located may be on the road toward becoming lively, livable places where people will want to congregate for work and recreation. Since the agency is the largest civilian construction firm in the country, GSA's spending policies have a major impact on the shape of the Nation's building programs.

A major element of the urban strategy is the GSA policy of restoring old buildings rather than always constructing new ones when more space for Federal offices is needed. Under another program, GSA sets aside one-half of 1 percent of both new construction and repair funds for art and landscaping programs. A third program opens the doors to thousands of Federal buildings across the country at night and on weekends so that people can use them as community centers.

GSA's urban policy planning sets an example for other Federal programs to follow. I commend the President, Jay Solomon, and the General Services Administration for this kind of leadership. I would like to print in the RECORD the following article from the Government Executive for May 1978.

The article follows:

GSA: CARTER'S NEW URBAN POLICY TOOL

"We are the business end of the Federal Government," says Jay Solomon, Administrator of the General Services Administration—and the agency will have a substantial effect on the success of President Carter's recently announced Urban Policy.

The GSA can have a heavy impact on what takes place in the Nation's distresed cities and that is exactly what Solomon and his Commissioners intend to do. In fact, they were already well into it when the Urban Policy was announced.

Specifically, through its various components, GSA expects to use its power in art and architecture, landscaping, energy conservation and budgeting, minority procurement, certain detailed procurement set-asides and the consolidation of federal employees to help revitalize the downtown areas.

With a Presidential mandate behind it, GSA, through the Public Buildings Service—which builds, leases, repairs, renovates and is generally the Federal landlord—is starting to put U.S. Government employees back into the cities.

(In Atlanta, the PBS is already moving a million square feet of space from the suburbs into the city.)

"We can impact the type of buildings, the design of them, the type of landscaping; we can create parks with federal lands in the cities and we can, and will, push to open up GSA business to more small and minority businesses," says Solomon.

And GSA has two-year benchmarks to meet in this area. "It will be relatively easy for the Federal Supply Service (FSS) to make their urban policy targets," says Solomon, "but much harder for PBS because our construction program is considerably less than it was two years ago."

Waste Not—GSA is also turning to the idea of recycling buildings with enthusiasm. They are, with local cooperation, renovating historic facilities such as the railroad stations in Kansas City, Nashville and Savannah as well as the Post Office building in St. Louis and Washington, D.C. and the New York City Customs House.

Under the Public Buildings Cooperative Act (1976) PBS can lease the ground floors of such buildings back into the hands of the locals for various uses—from restaurants to museums to day care centers.

A major impetus under Solomon is the "Living Buildings" concept. The idea of turning federal buildings back to their owners—the taxpayers—for community purposes ranging from art shows to Senior Citizens. And this is working extremely well.

Although quick to disclaim any expertise in artistic matters, Solomon has brought art into the buildings—between $2 and $3 million in the last year alone. "And this is commissioned art which is meant to be as much a part of the buildings as the bricks."

The GSA had seven art shows in New York City at the same time. Solomon raised the amount set aside for commissioning art in federal buildings to half of one percent of the construction costs. Chicago officials, seeing the effect of this in bringing both tourists and natives into the downtown areas, are doing the same thing with the building of city facilities. And it is catching on in other areas.

It is not just the big cities—the living building idea, local art and other elements are being pushed in much smaller municipalities. And, again, it is working.

The GSA will set up rules for cities based on their procedures but using experts from state art and historical societies instead of the National Endowment and other bodies who flow expert advise to the GSA.

Brighten the Image—In a sense, art is like any other government program. Solomon notes that there is a temptation to go after the old masters instead of encouraging new and innovative artists. "The program is very much like any other government program in that light.

"We are trying to give GSA new direction, new emphasis, a new image. This agency is a monopoly by law but we really cannot do an effective job without the good will of the customers."

And that is the hallmark of the Solomon administration—cooperation and communications with the customers, which is the rest of government, and a hard bearing down on the concept of service.

Solomon came to the GSA from Arlen Realty and Development Corp., the nation's largest shopping center development company and a firm he helped create.

"When we designed space for a tenant, we worked long and hard with him to understand his needs. This is exactly what GSA must be doing with its customers." (Solomon also notes that when you get into the actual building, that understanding had better be good because then the changes cost.)

Solomon has visited every Secretary in the Cabinet. He set up the mechanism for GSA-agency involvement—and it did not work. So he worked with the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) to create a GSA Council with representatives from every federal agency. This move was very effective.

He is holding every GSA regional administrator responsible for the same kind of cooperation and communication in the regions and will move them if they do not come through. (Although they are, notes Solomon.)

He found that GSA was not part of the Regional Councils. It took him almost nine months but, in the end, OMB agreed and this was changed.

In the Beginning—"And when our people talk to agencies I want them to lay it on the line and explain what our resource limitations are—we have the same budget problems they do. There are no incentives for agencies to replay with you; you have to communicate. And then, if necessary, take the problems to the appropriate committees in Congress.

"GSA takes a lot of heat from agencies—and a good portion of this could be avoided if we could get into the decision-making as early as possible—not to tell them what to do but because we are going to be involved later anyway and experience has taught us that then it can be too late."

It is up to the rest of the federal structure to get involved with GSA as early as possible. The problems, for instance, with base closings go on for years—although Solomon has expedited some cases in days after years of delays. Eventually, it is GSA that determines what happens to the land and anything else that is left after a base closing. "And that's when we get the rocks thrown at us."

Solomon does not stand on ceremony. He does not care if it happens to be less than the top echelon of an agency coming in to talk to him. "It could be the man at the botton—as long as he can tell us what they are planning so we can work to eliminate the inevitable delays caused by our being brought in at the last minute. We have the same budget cycle they do and if the money isn't there for us to perform our functions for them I'll help them get it, if possible. Otherwise they have to wait until the next fiscal year—precisely what they have to do in their own functions."

The Landlord—"I want PBS to respond to the agencies with more alacrity," says PBS Commissioner James B. Shea, an industrial engineer and an attorney. Yet he thinks PBS is very effective. "They have a hell of a record in the past four years in energy management and conservation. We are squeezing harder in this area now." And mostly because energy management gets tougher as the more obvious techniques are exhausted.

"While you can never really make everyone happy, I am proud of what the PBS is doing in many areas—but I have questions and I think there is room for improvement.

"The living buildings concept is a very powerful tool and it causes us to think in imaginative ways. Yet why shouldn't the taxpayers be able to really use federal buildings in as many different ways as they can."

It gets a bit unsophisticated. "Hokey" is the word Shea uses. He saw, in a small southern seaside town, that the city had built benches around trees and supplied billets of wood so that "these old gentlemen could whittle in the shade. Why can't I do this and other things around federal buildings? Corny, sure, but they paid for the building in the first place."

Shea, like Solomon, has been a landlord, "But there are many more constraints in the government you do not have in the private sector."

Yet he intends to open PBS wider. He wants more new firms, more small firms, more minority firms and he thinks that the paperwork can be simplified. "Sure, you may be leaving yourself open to possible initial misunderstandings when you simplify the solicitation, but that can be cleared up later."

Shea is forcing PBS away from dealing with the same firms over and over again in all areas—from building right through repairs, alterations and renovations. But not, as Solomon has emphasized, to the exclusion of the good supplier.

The use of historic buildings forces tradeoffs and very close cooperation with local officials. "But there are other recyclable buildings. Suppose there is an old, solid, well-built building available yet it is not historic in any sense. It is still an asset and it can be used."

Shea may wind up being the "heavy" in the consolidation of federal employees into downtown areas but he firmly believes that this is an important element in breathing life back into the inner city. PBS will not be working in a vacuum. They will be cooperating with transportation, housing and other agencies, federal and local, in this push back into the cities.

He is also trying to eliminate certain classic PBS headaches. For example, he insists on mockups in office space design.

With the emphasis on an energy budget for every building, this design means integrating a lot of unknowns and it cannot really be tied down on paper." In one case, the mockup showed that while the proper energy budgeted light levels were reached, it simply wouldn't work because one would end up moving from light pool to light pool in an office—"sort of like a perpetual Jimmy Durante sign off all day long. We had to modify it but we did it before the system went into the building."

Sun Power—"Properly researched and properly implemented solar power has fantasic returns. But I do not agree that it is the federal role to use taxpayer dollars to drive sophistication into solar systems. That is a kind of bootstrapping.

"To say that government should spend to develop it and, in the mean time, have government go ahead and put on the roof what might, in five or more years, be obsolete hardware while government spends more and goes on into photovoltaic or what should be questioned by any taxpayer, including me."

Shea and PBS will go into solar systems. But he wants to do it logically—"not buy everything or use one system. We have to experiment, compare and go back to industry.

"Why shouldn't government and industry share product development. Have industry furnish us the stuff and we'll go ahead and install it, monitor it and tell industry how good it is in actual application." Shea really wants to get going in solar applications—but PBS has many obligations and responsibilities and these cannot be ignored for any one element.

Shea has found other federal agencies—his customers—very accessible. "We get crossways sometimes but we should be able to talk it out without nonsense memos."

The PBS Commissioner has been a consultant to major corporations in his career. "Sometimes I have told the client at the start that more than half of my recommendations will have come from your own people. Then at the end I show them that the prediction was true. Moral: listen to your own people and you'll save money. The same is very true in government. The people here can and do warn me, and I listen, because they are professionals.

Shea dealt with PBS and GSA personnel during a stint as a staff member on a Congressional Committee. "I learned to respect the GSA people I dealt with then." He still does.

The Computers—"My first impression here was that the reason a lot of things are done today is because it seemed like a good idea at the time the decision was made." Frank J. Carr, Commissioner of Automated Data and Telecommunications Service continues "I also got the impression of circled wagons and operations behind fences."

There is language in the Brooks Act to the effect that the GSA (ADTS) will not interfere with the right of any agency to develop what it needs in automated data processing (ADP). Carr has found that agencies use this to keep ADTS out of the early planning process—and that ADTS often uses it to explain why nothing has been done.

"But there is a terrific need for ADTS to get involved with any agency very early in its ADP planning. ADTS is always being blamed for the long ADP cycle when in most cases it is because the agency is at fault. The delay results from the fact that we get into the cycle too late and are blamed for not being able to achieve, in a short time, functions that could have been handled far earlier in the process."

It is not ADTS' purpose to approve or disapprove agency systems plans. Carr is not talking about this at all. "The involvement ought to be such that ADTS can let the agency know what the downstream procurement problems are going to be."

Positive steps are being taken—particularly with Navy and Air Force. But there is another aspect of this upstream need.

Total Picture—Any careful study of the Brooks Bill and its legislative history clearly indicates that the GSA has been given primary operational responsibility for the coordination of a government-wide ADP management system to be carried out under the fiscal control of OMB. And here is the biggest problem.

"There are elements of this all over but we have failed to sit down and attempt to define the system in terms of the elements in existence that ought to be developed. "Whatever it is that we are now doing it is clearly not sufficient."

In basic terms, the creation of such a dynamic DP management system is pretty much what ADP people do anyhow in developing a given data processing system. "Here we have, in government, a whole bunch of systems people not using the systems approach to the whole problem but, instead, constantly dealing with it in bits and pieces."

In short, ADTS has the responsibility to operate such a system and nobody yet knows what it is.

And the upstream involvement of ADTS is part of the development of an effective ADP management system. (This is not a management information system. It is resource management.)

While agencies tend to use the Brooks Bill language in a restrictive sense, Carr says GSA can still function. ADTS can impact if the data processing system proposed is unnecessarily restrictive or contains far more capacity than meets the agencies' stated needs.

And ADTS can act if it is known for a fact that the acquisition does not have Congressional or higher departmental approval. There is obviously little sense in going deep into procurement for a system element already specifically disapproved by Congress or a parent department.

"The requirements must be factual, reflect capacity and not restrictive as far as competition. We require that they indicate compliance with the Privacy Act because all government must so comply.

"If communications is part of the process, we request that the agency make, or have made, a systems study. In one case, this systems study consisted of a letter from the local telephone company stating ten ways the phone company could satisfy the agency needs—and that is not exactly what one means by a 'systems study'."

In Carr's initial analysis, he found ADTS splintered with respect to internal responsibilities. He has made organizational moves to pinpoint this—to get a better sense of who is responsible for what and improve the necessary coordination activity.

Healing Thyself—ADTS really lacked a sense of direction. "If you don't know where you are going, then it pretty much doesn't matter which route you choose," says Carr.

Yet it speaks well for ADTS that, out of the dozen or so changes introduced by Carr, only one is really his own. "All of the others were recommended by outside consultants in the past or had been suggested by ADTS people themselves over the last several years."

In defining the role of ADTS and where it should be going, Carr runs smack into the lack of a Government-wide ADP management system. Both in the same initial step.

"If a multi-division corporation—with ADP all over the place—called in somebody like me to find out how to get on top of ADP then there is a fairly obvious first step. You make the basic assumption that no one person can run all ADP activities so centralization cannot be done. The approach is to establish control over certain key areas and use this control to influence the other ADP activities.

Then you look at what exists and come back to the how of control. And it lies in control over the procedures and control over the budget and whatever you come up with would be a continuous thing."

Looking at the Federal Government, in much the same way, it is obvious that there is no central point operating with any continuing oversight of the total federal ADP management. "You find OMB, GAO and the many appropriation elements of Congress all involved with the result that there is engineering friction—things get dragged along.

Classification—There is confusion as to what belongs in ADP. "There isn't much of a problem if the equipment is part of a larger system—then it is ADP.

But, a case in point is the terminal, "Is it an input device to an ADP system, a communication device or both. The technology impacting the commercial marketplace has to be considered—GSA does not make artificial distinctions here.

"These systems, in the commercial area, are merging. Communications and data processing are coming together in terms of the product lines of both data processing firms and telephone companies."

One of the things Solomon insists be done is that the responsibilities of the components of GSA be made clear.

Thus, in the area of classification, Carr pursues the issue first as a matter of cleaning up the responsibility and then defining the procurement activity.

"There are items in the FSS schedules that are ADP equipments but the Governing decision is whether or not an item is ADP or communication and that defines the responsibility. Then how we carry out the procurement involves a lot of other things such as the nature of the marketplace, and how we in GSA are organized. That is the separation."

Carr feels that vendors are so wrapped up in the question of the procurement issue that they are anticipating what happens or how an item is to be acquired once it is determined to be ADP.

There is much pressure and many suggestions as to how the definition should be arrived at or that the procurement method preferred by the vendors in fact apply to a given item.

"This is a totally irrelevant issue. The first step is to determine if the item is ADP. If it is, then that establishes the responsibility—whether it is ADTS or FSS—and then we in GSA address the question of procurements." Responsibility can be delegated once it is understood and Carr does work this out with Commissioner Robert P. Graham of the Federal Supply Service.

There is a major government ADP reorganization study underway as well as the Administrative Services reorganization effort. Even though telecommunications interfaces with ADP, the reorganization study will, as things stand now, come out with two sets of recommendations.

Carr also believes that it is "nonsense to try to separate regulations from services—regulations are one way of achieving objectives and should be created out of the organization's view as to achieving its objectives." (Another element here is Carr's comment that "I ask why we can't do this and I'm told it is against the regulations. Well who wrote the regulations in the first place. I still can't believe this when I hear it.")

Sighting In—Recognition of the merging ADP and communications technologies and the impact on ADTS functions is one of Carr's goals. The approach is to set up a single procurement function whose responsibilities encompass both technologies.

His second target is to examine all limitations, self-imposed as well as external, that inhibit ADTS from performing its responsibilities and authorities. "The way to handle this is a continuing process because the limitations include restrictive legislative language, encumbering practices, unnecessary delegation of authority and the like." The limitations keep getting worked back in so the effort to work them out never really should stop.

In this area Carr is tired of the repeated comments that OMB A–109 is not going to change anything. "I don't know who is saying this because A–109 does mean changes and we will find out as to where and how as we go along. The point is that A–109 has impact on procurements."

Carr finds restrictive legislative language at fault because "it has a bad impact on ADTS as far as long range planning is concerned."

Carr's third goal is already apparent. It is to fully implement the Brooks Act; get at the Government-wide ADP management problem; move early into federal agencies planning in ADP and develop a strong analytic ability within ADTS (without which much of the real work on the objectives cannot be done.)

Both the privacy fears and the Freedom of Information Act affect ADTS. The latter is a problem because proprietary information is often part of the ADP procurement process and this information, by definition, belongs to the company, not the Government. So far GSA has been able to handle such information requests but it is clearly a major concern of the industries supplying government with ADP systems.

Privacy is a different problem. "Both sides really do not understand each other and, to my mind, it is up to the technologist, the ADP expert, to take the initiative here."

The real key to successful ADP implementation is deep user involvement and Carr thinks there is insufficient user involvement on the part of government agencies and for the same reasons that the problem exists in the private sector.

But, even more, in the federal area, the user has very little impact on the procurement process. "They not only do not get involved because they do not understand what ADP is all about, they also tend to stay uninvolved because they do not have a handle on the procurement process itself."

This is critical because it essentially means that the using agency cannot force its ideas on the ADP experts.

Carr sits in the middle. On the one side he gets pressure from industry to, among other things, increase the government investment in ADP technology. But they almost never talk about the return on this investment. The ROI approach might increase the investment through increased procurement but it also might mean a different kind of mix.

On the other hand, Carr claims it is very hard to tell top federal management—all the way to the White House—just what the enormous potential of ADP and telecommunications technology means and in concrete terms.

"You could point to the relative stability of the federal employment level over the past few years while government activity has grown. Obviously the increased productivity is the result, in no small part, of automation."

This is a problem the ADP reorganization teams are having. "They must figure out how to bring this potential to the attention of the top people in government in a real way so that these leaders understand what kinds of decisions they are making when they act on the recommendations."

Finally, Carr sees history repeating itself in the federal office of the future. "We should be deeply involved in a major study of what this office will look like with word processing, telecommunications, electronic mail and other interrelated technologies involved. These are already well into implementation in many areas of government. And I don't mean just an ADTS look but other elements of the GSA—the PBS and the National Archives.

"Take an office of 50 people and work out the information flow, functions, layout and effect on management policies because we are heading into the same problems of incompatible equipments and other things we have seen in the growth of ADP—and the same headaches could be avoided.

"A major federal program in this area would impact the commercial marketplace to the benefit of everybody—the government, the manufacturers and the commercial users."

Buying Power—Carr's counterpart in procurement is Robert P. Graham, Commissioner of the Federal Supply Service—a GSA component which buys something of just about everything except ADP and telecommunications systems.

Graham, a former banker, is a bottom line man. "My objective here is basically to streamline the organization and to get much better in responding to the agencies. I also expect to have FSS reach a more business-like attitude in dealing with GSA suppliers and, concurrently, to simplify, as much as possible, the ordeal of doing business with the government."

Graham says he is actively seeking as much contact as possible with both the customers of FSS and the suppliers—either individully or through their associations. And he is encouraging senior FSS management to develop a more productive attitude.

The key to what Graham is all about at FSS is simple. "I want to know, as accurately as possible, what the real cost of doing business in any area of FSS is."

One tool is an economic model that has been in development for over a year by FSS and is now substantially reliable. "It does give us a close indication as to the most cost effective method of supply from our standpoint."

FSS is concentrating right now on stock items. The process is to move these items (per the economic model input) to other methods of procurement. "The model tells us if an item would be better handled in one of the four areas—stock, schedules, nonstores and bulk purchase—other than the one it is in now and it probably got there in the first place by definition."

Specs—FSS is now in the process of proposing to the Office of Federal Procurement Policy and substantial number of specifications to be eliminated. "But there will always be a need for specifications in FSS. If you have a big volume buy, I think you can get better pricing by specification and competitive bidding."

And, as FSS grows in technical competence, "we may be able to and probably should, review the multiple awards schedule to see if there aren't items that would lend themselves to another method of procurement."

GSA Administrator Solomon has expressed concern that the government may not be getting the best price in certain multiple award situations. Graham's approach is to introduce discounts in the multiple award schedule related to aggregate sales over a year.

FSS is cancelling specifications—but this takes time because of the notification processes. Graham wants more performance orientation in specifications. "As we get more modernized we should be able to key in on the multiple awards schedule with performance specifications—on high volume items. "You get something from multiple awards, but not always the bottom line best."

Graham is strongly in favor of commercial buying. "Right now about 99.5% of all items made available to agencies through the FSS are off the shelf commercial items. This is also more than 75% of our dollar volume. So then specifications account for 0.5% of the items and about 25% of the dollar volume.

Urban Direction—FSS will be the component of GSA quickest off the time in responding to the mandates laid down by President Carter. "We will strengthen the implementation for existing procurement set-aside programs for labor surplus areas by directing the FSS to work with each federal agency to develop specific procurement targets and we will monitor this implementation."

The GSA has been given the task of reporting to the White House every six months on the progress of each agency in meeting the urban policy procurement mandates. That makes FSS a focal point—even though the Labor Dept. has the task of defining the geographical areas for the set asides, it is GSA that has to ram federal procurement money into them.

"We in GSA have an opportunity to provide judicious leadership now. We are actively seeking out firms in these labor surplus areas to give them a chance—a preferred chance—at the procurement dollar.

"It is almost a business development program and we are active. We want the names of firms in the mandated urban policy areas so we can urge them to get involved even though they may have never done business with the government before."

There is a cautionary note struck here by Solomon. He has stated that these efforts must not be to the exclusion of existing GSA suppliers—"suppliers who have done a good, honest job of dealing with us."

The youngest of the GSA components is the Federal Preparedness Agency under its Director, Joseph A. Mitchell. The FPA resulted from the three-way dissolution of the White House Office of Emergency Preparedness which assigned civil defense to the Defense Department, natural disaster functions to the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) and the original core to GSA.

Mitchell's view: "This was unfortunate. What it did was give the individual states, who usually have one point of interface on all of these elements, three separate federal organizations to deal with."

There is a reorganization study now completed that, as part of its conclusions, recommends the setting up of an agency with all of these functions under one head plus several others scattered all over government. These others include functions such as earthquake prediction, flood insurance, fire protection—and what Mitchell calls "mid-level disasters." These last are power failures and blackouts across several states and the effects of things such as the recent coal strike.

The civil response to terrorism would also be included.

Mitchell is quick to point out that the three agencies now involved in emergency measures have done an excellent job.

So it looks like GSA may have to give up functions. But Solomon told Government Executive that fighting to keep functions in the face of logical and reasonable organizations decisions is not, to his mind, good federal management.●

RUN FOR LIFE

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, I commend Connecticut Mutual Life Insurance Co. and Olympic gold medal winner, Frank Shorter, for introducing the Run For Life program in Indianapolis.

This superbly organized program, endorsed by the President's Council on Physical Fitness and Sports will encourage many people to jog and run during a portion of each day on a regular basis.

For several years, I have tried to run during a portion of each day along with an estimated 15 to 20 million Americans who run for pleasure and to improve personal appearance, to relieve day to day stress, and to improve overall health.

The single most effective public approach toward lowering health care costs in this country and providing much greater security on the path to good physical and mental health for individuals will be found in providing sound incentives for each of us to exercise and to learn more about diet and nutrition.

The Run For Life program includes excellent published material on pulse rate, counting calorie input and output, and a host of ideas which will bring greater sensitivity about the good fortune which each one of us may enjoy as we discover more about the strengths we possess and the ways in which we may husband and enjoy those strengths for many years to come.

Running costs no more than a good pair of shoes and comfortable clothes that meet the changes of the seasons. A few of the best runners will enjoy races and even marathons, but most of us are going to enjoy having a few well defined minutes each day to think clearly about our individual objectives and plans, to gain greater confidence that we are stronger in our abilities to meet personal priorities and to serve others with greater skill and stamina, and to learn more about the remarkable gift which God has given us in the form of a body to house our souls and aspirations.

I look forward to watching the Run For Life venture of Connecticut Mutual Life and Frank Shorter take hold in Indiana and throughout this Nation. It will prove to be a strong national asset.●

A DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION

● Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I am very pleased that we are starting to see some significant movement in Congress toward enactment of legislation to create a separate Department of Education. Last week, the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs completed a series of public hearings on this issue, and final Committee action may occur next month.

I especially want to commend Senator ABRAHAM RIBICOFF, who introduced S. 991, which establishes an Education Department, and who as chairman of the Governmental Affairs Committee is shepherding the bill through Congress. The concepts embodied in S. 991 have my complete support, and for this reason I am joining Senator RIBICOFF as a cosponsor of the bill.

I am very pleased to note that President Carter has also lent his support to the legislation. Last month, speaking on behalf of the Carter administration, Director of the Office of Management and Budget James T. McIntyre, Jr., endorsed the principles of S. 991 in testimony before the Senate Committee on Governmental Affairs.

Director McIntyre succinctly described the reasons for establishing a new Education Department. I believe these reasons deserve reiteration:

First, that the location of education programs within a department that also has major health and welfare responsibilities—quoting Director McIntyre—"severely limits the Federal Government's ability to build on past successes and to provide visible and effective leadership to meet new opportunities";

Second, that since education programs represent the smallest piece of the Department of HEW's $185 billion budget, they cannot receive the attention that they require and deserve"; and

Third, that the Department of Education would "increase significantly the visibility of Federal education activities. For the first time in history, it will provide high-level leadership for education."

I found the administration's testimony to be quite enlightening, and I would like to share it with my colleagues. Therefore, I ask that a major portion of Mr. McIntyre's statement be printed in the RECORD.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT OF JAMES T. MCINTYRE, JR., DIRECTOR, OFFICE OF MANAGEMENT AND BUDGET

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I appreciate this opportunity to appear before you this morning to present the administration's position on S. 991, the Department of Education Act of 1977, and to reaffirm the President's commitment to education as a major domestic priority.

First, let me applaud you, Mr. Chairman, for your dedicated and continuing leadership in efforts to create a Department of Education that go back to 1965 when you first introduced such legislation. Your bill has attracted wide bipartisan support in the Senate and enjoys the endorsement of numerous groups and prominent individuals who are deeply interested in American education.

We note that your bill is cosponsored by 56 Senators, including 8 members of this committee: Mr. Jackson, Mr. Muskie, Mr. Eagleton, Mr. Chiles, Mr. Nunn, Mr. Sasser, Mrs. Humphrey and Mr. Heinz.

In addition, Mr. Chairman, I would like to thank the members of your staff, especially Marilyn Harris, for their assistance and cooperation with the President's reorganization project staff in their study of education programs. We look forward to working closely with this committee to pass legislation creating a Department of Education.

In his first year in office, the President has demonstrated his deep commitment to improving education. In his education message to the Congress last February, he described a "concerted effort to reestablish education in the forefront of our domestic priorities." I want to stress that the overall aim of that effort is to strengthen our pluralistic, locally controlled system of education.

First, legislative proposals are designed to improve basic skills, to provide additional resources in the neediest school districts, to increase training and technical assistance for bilingual education to expand programs for handicapped children, to increase student assistance for higher education of children from middle-income families, and to strengthen participation by nonpublic schools in existing grant programs.

Second, our budget request for next year increases Federal spending for education by almost $2.5 billion over last year for H.E.W.'s education division alone—the largest increase in 15 years.

Third, the establishment of a cabinet department of education will provide a base for national leadership which can increase the visibility and attention given to educational needs, not only at the federal level, but more importantly by families, communities, public and nonpublic schools, and local and state governments.

Even as these new initiatives are being considered by the Congress, major problems and challenges are facing our educational systems. Some of these problems are: a decline in student achievement and in the public confidence in the quality of education, unacceptably high rates of high school dropouts and unemployed youth, and the isolation of education institutions from family life and community services. Another important trend that affects education is the major demographic shift which has led to a declining school-age population and a growing proportion of older citizens. This population shift will create further demands for retraining and lifelong learning opportunities.

Fulfilling the President's commitment—improving education—meeting these challenges—will require that the Federal Government manage existing resources and existing programs better. We believe that the current organization of federal education programs—with education sandwiched between the major health and welfare activities in H.E.W. and with so many education programs in other departments—severely limits the Federal Government's ability to build on past successes and to provide visible and effective leadership to meet new opportunities.

I want to commend Secretary Califano for his strong leadership of H.E.W. Not only has he managed important health and welfare initiatives, but also the legislative proposals for education have begun to set an important agenda for the new department.

Senator Ribicoff, you have experienced first hand the difficulties of managing the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Since that time H.E.W.'s budget has grown elevenfold, from $17 billion in 1961 to $185 billion in 1979.

The department is large and complex, and, specifically, education programs—the smallest piece of the $185 billion department—cannot receive the attention that they require and deserve. As the late Senator Hubert H. Humphrey states, "What the schools do shapes society for generations. All this is too important for (education's) present second-rate status in the Federal hierarchy."

The new education department will increase significantly the visibility of Federal education activities. For the first time in history, it will provide high-level leadership for education.

The leaders and staff of the new department should devote immediate attention to these important concerns: cooperating more closely with state, local and private agencies; involving parents and the public more directly in developing and implementing programs; improving the design and management of education programs; strengthening interagency coordination of education and related programs; emphasizing the Federal Government's preeminent responsibility to ensure equal educational opportunities for all Americans; and stressing the importance of improving educational quality.

We propose today that we and the Congress work together to establish a department of education this year. The creation of a department with a strong leadership and a strong core of programs represents a very important step in our efforts to improve education. The transfer of the programs we propose to include in the new department will be made over time in a careful, phased manner.

Mr. CLARK. Most of the major national education organizations support the creation of a separate Department of Education. Among these groups is the National Education Association, representing nearly 2 million teachers in the United States. The NEA has long been in the forefront of the push for a Department of Education, dating back to 1867 when the group's predecessor convinced Congress of the need for a Federal education agency.

The National Education Association recently sent me a letter which underscored its support for early enactment of S. 991. I ask that this letter be inserted in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

NATIONAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION,
April 21, 1978.

Hon. DICK CLARK,
Russell Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR CLARK: On behalf of the 1.8 million teachers of the National Education Association, I wish to thank you for your cosponsorship of S. 991, legislation establishing a Cabinet level Department of Education.

As you are probably aware, the Administration recently presented its proposal for the Department of Education before the Senate Governmental Affairs Committee. We are pleased that the President's proposal closely parallels that of S. 991, and we look forward to working with you, other Members of Congress, and the Administration in insuring early enactment of this important measure.

Sincerely,

STANLEY J. MCFARLAND.
Director of Government Relations.

Mr. CLARK. If this Nation is serious about improving the learning process, we ought to move swiftly to establish a Department of Education, and to endow it with authority over education-related Federal programs inside and outside the current Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

I am convinced that the Federal role in education would be enhanced through a more coordinated and highlighted effort that can only come from a separate department.●

THE TERROR IN CAMBODIA

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, our country was born out of a deep and abiding respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms. The preservation of the rights and liberties of individuals is a basic tenet of our national philosophy. This is a goal which we have sought to promote, not only for our own people, but for people of all nations.

In the past decade we have witnessed a proliferation of efforts in this direction. International accords and pronouncements have proclaimed the official commitment of most nations to the preservation of human rights. We have sworn that we would never again allow a holocaust to occur. Though we were blind to many of the atrocities committed in Nazi Germany, we cannot close our eyes to the horrors taking place in Cambodia today.

Since the Khmer Rouge came to power in 1975, literally hundreds of thousands of Cambodians have been systematically murdered, according to State Department sources. Some estimates are as high as 1 million. This is a barbaric situation.

In the name of "agrarian reform," the populations of Cambodian cities were forced to march to the country to work on cooperatives. Thousands died along the way as no provision was made for food, shelter, or health care. Throughout the country, massive exterminations of innocent people have occurred. These mass murders have taken on a frightening dimension.

The Khmer Rouge has even launched an attack on Cambodian culture by prohibiting any practice of traditional folkways and religion. Buddhism has been virtually eradicated.

We cannot turn our backs on the Cambodian people. They face a cruel and ruthless regime whose power base is the fear in the hearts of the people. We must hold the Khmer Rouge Government accountable for its despicable acts.

In March of this year, the U.N. asked Cambodia to respond to allegations of a massive, systematic abuse of human rights. The House of Representatives has approved a resolution condemning the Government of Cambodia. President Carter has called Cambodia the worst violator of human rights in the world.

We must continue in these efforts. The United States has a moral responsibility to stand up for an innocent people, helpless in the hands of murderers. We must do all we can, diplomatically and politically, to stand up for human rights; to stand up for the Cambodian people. For without our moral support, there is no hope for a people whose government is based on the denial of fundamental rights.

Mr. President, I ask that the text of Mr. Leo Cherne's article "The Terror in Cambodia" which appeared in the Wall Street Journal on May 10, 1978, be printed in the RECORD. This article bears witness to the horror occurring in Cambodia today.

The article follows:

[From the Wall Street Journal, May 10, 1978]

THE TERROR IN CAMBODIA

(By Leo Cherne)

"It appears to have taken six years to kill nine million human beings in Nazi Germany and in the countries it occupied. It appears to have taken one day to inflict catastrophic disaster on more than three million Cambodians."

With these words three years ago Freedom House, the human rights monitoring organization, filed an appeal with the UN Commission on Human Rights for an inquiry into the events in Cambodia after the Khmer Rouge took power there in 1975. The UN body took three months to respond to that Freedom House appeal—negatively.

Until recently, a few books and articles focused on Cambodia, but no government leader or international body sought to penetrate the silence. Only Chaim Herzog, Israeli ambassador to the UN, raised a solitary voice on the floor of the United Nations in a futile effort to draw attention to the fact that in the new Democratic Kampuchea, "three to four million people fell into a deep, black, echoless hole."

In July of 1977, a House International Relations subcommittee initiated a congressional inquiry into the horror of Cambodia. This spring the Canadian government denounced the killing and suffering there. Now President Carter has called the Cambodian government "the worst violator of human rights in the world today," and an international inquiry sponsored by Norway's four political parties has invited witnesses from many countries to testify on the matter in Oslo. But in the slow pace of world reaction to events in Cambodia there is a morbid parallel to the international blindness that first met the news of the camps in Nazi Germany in which Hitler's "final solution" was being pursued.

What is it we know without doubt about the Cambodia of the last three years? We know that during the first few hours after the Khmer Rouge victory and the establishment of Democratic Kampuchea, every citizen, whatever age or sex, who inhabited any of the towns and cities in that country was compelled to evacuate his or her home. They took with them only what they could physically carry on their march into the jungle countryside.

We know they traveled an estimated 65 miles, and that there were no provisions for their sustenance along the route. We know that the pregnant women in the last days of their pregnancy gave birth along the roadside, and that few of these children survived the ordeal.

NOT BLINDFOLDED

There were roughly 20 international journalists in Phnom Penh at the time of the Khmer Rouge victory. They were interned in the French embassy for the next couple of weeks, but they were not blindfolded. Diplomats from other embassies were added to their company in that compound, as were the foreign doctors who had been serving in the hospitals of that war-swollen city with a population of somewhere between three and four million, nearly half the population of the entire country.

We know from the reports these journalists filed when they were finally released that doctors who were in the midst of surgery when the evacuation came were in some instances compelled to leave their work unfinished. We know that where patients were unable to leave their rooms, some were dropped to the pavement from the windows. We know that others were wheeled in their hospital beds by fellow patients able to do so or family members who rushed to the hospitals to help evacuate their sick relatives.

We know from that day to this, Phnom Penh and every other city and town in Cambodia have remained deserted and crumbling. We know that soldiers of the Khmer Rouge emptied and looted the stores in each of the towns, some of them tiny indeed, along the road the journalists traveled when they were transported out of the country. We know from a handful of Scandinavian diplomats who were permitted to visit Phnom Penh two months ago that an estimated 30,000 people are trucked in and out of the city daily to perform certain tasks which are still regarded as essential, particularly in the manufacture of certain basic materials—cement, weapons, fabric—that the state continues to require.

The vast and total nature of the reordering of all Cambodian life can be seen in just a few details. Typically, the population has been reorganized into groups of 10, with one supervisor and three cells of three persons each. Each cell member is responsible for the behavior of the other two. People who make too many "mistakes" are led away and never seen again. The constant fear of death keeps everyone working long hours, the more able-bodied far from their homes and the more frail closer to home.

The new regime has, apparently, deliberately tried to expunge family loyalties in order to forcibly substitute new ones—to the commune and to the state. Refugees claim that their traditional songs, folk ways and even religion have been stripped away. Cadre members reportedly enjoy special privileges, and avoid many of the hardships of the common peasants. Edward Shawcross, the gifted foreign affairs correspondent for The London Times, wrote in The New York Review of Books that "the barbarous cruelty of the Khmer Rouge can be compared with the extermination of the Kulaks or the Gulag Archipelago."

Even desperation has its levels of comparative intolerableness. If we are to understand the sheer terror which must have driven a hundred thousand Cambodians to escape into the arms of the traditionally hated Vietnamese, we must first refresh our sense of the desperation that presently exists in Vietnam.

To this day, some three thousand to four thousand Vietnamese per month crowd into anything that will float, knowing that they risk their lives if their plans to escape are discovered or frustrated. Of that number, an estimated 50% drown at sea. Despite these near-unbearable odds, the flight from Vietnam continues, even as the flight of Cambodians into Vietnam is surely going on. Yes, there is a pecking order even in hell; and at the bottom of this one stand the Cambodian people.

At first, certain Western observers asserted that the purpose of the evacuation of the cities was to assure that the rice fields destroyed by the war be quickly restored, in order to avert mass starvation. These commentators pointed out that the survivors had been herded into units working from dawn to dusk clearing forests, digging irrigation canals, preparing for the planting of rice.

But there was a flaw in the attempt to ascribe such humanitarian purpose to the Khmer Rouge: There was a greater supply of vegetables and other staples stored in or near Phnom Penh than in the countryside to which people were evacuated. And not for eight months, when the monsoon had passed, was there the possibility of producing even the first rice crop in the countryside.

Mr. Shawcross, when he wrote on Cambodia two years ago, accepted the "rice" explanation for the forced march. But by this spring, he had concluded in a new article that the only satisfactory explanation for what has happened must be the prospect of war, feared or desired, with the Vietnamese. Certainly Pol Pot, secretary general of the Cambodian Communist Party, refuted the case that the Khmer Rouge were acting out of compassion when he spoke about the evacuations in an address he made on a recent visit to Peking.

THREATS TO SECURITY?

Not once in his address did Pol Pot speak of the necessities of food production. Instead, he explicitly declared that in "our Cambodian society," there are "life-and-death contradictions, because enemies in the shape of spy rings working for imperialism and international reactionaries are still planted among us to carry out subversive activities against our revolution." The purpose of the evacuation, he said, had been to break up such threats to Cambodia's security.

In all of this, the parallels to Nazi Germany are chilling. Granted, Hitler's vision and methods of destruction were those of modern technology, while those of the Khmer Rouge are those of an agricultural primitivism. But consider: The ruthlessness these two states have employed in the extermination of their enemies is unique in its vast and wanton disregard for human life. The ruthlessness in each country has come about in service to an ideal—of racial purity in Nazi Germany, of political purity in Democratic Kampuchea.

And each took elaborate pains to veil the more brutal aspects of "the plan." Since the Cambodians' plan was even more total than the Nazis', even more was covered with secrecy—even the identity of the leaders of the Ankha, as the leadership group was called until it established itself well after its victory as the Communist Party of Cambodia.

The secrecy and the horror have made the new Cambodia hard to comprehend. One of the Scandinavian diplomats who finally saw it said of his experience, "It was like a nightmare. It is difficult to believe it is true." But what foreigners may find difficult to believe, Cambodians are required to express quite explicitly. These are the words of their new national anthem:

The red, red blood splatters the cities and plains of the Cambodian fatherland,
The sublime blood of the workers and peasants,
The blood of revolutionary combatants of both sexes.
That blood spills out into great indignation and a resolute urge to fight.
17 April, that day under the revolutionary flag,
The blood certainly liberates us from slavery.

(NOTE.—Mr. Cherne is chairman of the International Rescue Committee, which plays a substantial role in aiding Cambodian, Laotian and Vietnamese refugees.)●

HUNK ANDERSON, NICEST TOUGH GUY

● Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, one of the many great things about the State of Indiana is the contribution its people have made to the field of athletics. Indeed, Indiana has become a center of our Nation's sports heritage. This is particularly true of the city of South Bend where the achievements of the University of Notre Dame in intercollegiate athletics have been a legand—an ever-growing legend—for over three-quarters of a century.

Notre Dame has produced not only some of America's greatest athletes and coaches, but also some of its greatest sports personalities. In today's paper Red Smith writes of one of those great personalities and coaches—Hunk Anderson. As Red points out Hunk was one of the line coaches in football history and also the game's "nicest tough guy."

I ask that Red's column be printed in the RECORD, and I hope my colleagues who are interested in America's athletic heritage will enjoy it as much as I.

The column follows:

HUNK ANDERSON, NICEST TOUGH GUY

(By Red Smith)

When Knute K. Rockne was winning renown as a football coach, the Notre Dame varsity was only one of his responsibilities. He also coached track and field, administered all sports as athletic director, turned out a syndicated column two or three times a week, had several books published under his name and toured the country as an after-dinner speaker. During spring practice, runners would be working on the cinder track and circling Cartier Field—the predecessor of today's stadium—while the padded gladiators butted heads on the infield, and somehow Rock seemed able to watch a half-miler and a left end simultaneously. In those days his only assistant was Hunk Anderson, who would finish his job at the Edwards Iron Works in South Bend and hustle out to the campus to serve as unpaid line coach. Most practice sessions started with Rock giving preliminary instruction to the backs and ends while Hunk got the interior linemen warmed up. At length, Rock would call:

"Ah, Heartley, would you be good enough to bring the behemoths over here?"

"Hell, Rock" Hunk would say, "they ain't even bleeding yet."

Starting in 1925, after Notre Dame defeated Stanford in the Rose Bowl, Rock got Hunk on the payroll, at $500 a season. Not that Hunk needed the money. Besides drawing a salary at the iron works, he would catch a train on Saturday, put in most of the night studying the game plan of the Chicago Bears and on Sunday play 60 minutes at guard with the pros. What he liked best about George Halas was that Papa Bear paid his players, though not much.

Rockne is a legend today, for it was 47 years ago that he died in a plane crash. Hunk Anderson remained in football until about 12 years ago when he retired to Palm Beach. He died there on April 24. Charley Callahan, who handled athletic publicity for Notre Dame before going to the Miami Dolphins saw Hunk about two weeks before that. "He hadn't changed," Charley reports. "He told me Don Shula was a profanity good coach and Joe Robbie an obscenity good owner."

PRIDE OF THE OZARKS

Hunk Anderson was the toughest nice guy or the nicest tough guy I ever knew. He had to get tough early because he grew up on the Copper Peninsula in northern Michigan and his parents stuck him with the given name of Heartley. The Cooper Peninsula is a rocky spur thrust into the icy waters of Lake Superior. Villages bear names like Franklin Mine, South Range, Trimountain, Atlantic Mine and Copper Harbor, but there is also the town of Laurium, birthplace of George Gipp.

Of all the names of the roll of Notre Dame sports, Gipp is the holiest. Growing up a few miles apart, he and Hunk knew each other as high school players and Gipp brought Hunk to Notre Dame. Even for those days, Hunk was small for a lineman but he was ferocious. He was a regular on the first four teams Rockne directed as head coach (1918–21).

Hunk took his degree in engineering, but in those first postgraduate years he was really a football player and coach moonlighting at the iron works. On the 1920's he signed a two-year contract as head coach at St. Louis University. The agreement provided for a substantial wage increase if he "improved football" at the university. Never one for half-way measures, he combed the Ozarks for swift young scholars with sloping necks and pointed ears, quartered them in a decrepit residence called the S. L. House, saw that they were shod and fed and permitted to attend classes if they wished.

The football program prospered, but after two years some of the Jesuits in the administration had reservations about the contributions Hunk and his muscular recruits were making to the university's academic reputation. When it became clear that he wasn't going to get the promised raise, Hunk—whose speech was always direct and colorful—told the authorities what they could do with the job and returned to Notre Dame as Rock's assistant.

When Rock was killed in the spring of 1931, Hunk succeeded him as head coach. Rock's last two teams had been undefeated and the only flyspeck on the record of the 1931 squad was a tie with Northwestern, until the last game. Southern California sent a strong team east but Notre Dame hadn't lost in 26 games and had been beaten at home only once in 27 years.

In 1931 a player taken out of the game could not return until the next quarter. After three periods, Notre Dame had the game in hand, 14–0. Hunk pulled out his regulars. Against the second string, Southern Cal marched for two touchdowns. Only one extra point was converted, but in the last minute Johnny Baker, a guard, kicked a field goal that won for U.S.C., 16–14.

BEST LINE COACH

In later years it was said that this defeat broke Hunk's pick at Notre Dame, but the fact is that he coached two more years and quit voluntarily. He was unhappy with a policy that limited him to 20 one-year football scholarships, renewable by the administration. The story goes that when he was leaving for a job at North Carolina State he made one of his most trenchant speeches on behalf of his successor, Elmer Layden.

After North Carolina State, Hunk joined the Bears' coaching staff. He is credited with introducing the reverse body block, the red dog blitz by the linebackers and the safety blitz. Halas, who had been in the Navy in World War I, re-enlisted in 1942. Though many of Chicago's top players were in the service, the Bears went through that season undefeated with Hunk and Luke Johnsos as co-coaches. The Redskins beat them in the championship playoff.

The manpower squeeze grew tighter. For 1943, Bronko Nagurski was wheedled out of retirement. He played tackle until the Bears came to the last game needing victory over the Chicago Cardinals to make the playoff. Hunk asked the Bronk if he'd like to "play a little fullback." That was something he hadn't tried in six years, but the Bronk loved to run over people.

Late in the game, with the Cardinals leading, 24–14, the Bronk went in and bulled through to a touchdown. The Bears got another drive going but seemed stalled on fourth down with 4 yards to go. The Bronk came back and got the first down. Then Sid Luckman passed for the winning touchdown. the Bears went on to whip the Redskins and the Anderson-Johnsos team had the championship.

"The greatest line coach in college football," Rock said of Hunk. "The best line coach in pro football," Halas said.●

GOLDEN ANNIVERSARY OF THE McSWEENEY-McNARY ACT, MAY 22, 1978

● Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, it was just 50 years ago today that President Calvin Coolidge signed the McSweeney-McNary Forestry Research Act. This act resulted from a bill reported out by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry under the chairmanship of the then senior Senator from Oregon, Charles L. McNary and a companion bill sponsored by Representative John McSweeney of Ohio which was reported out by the House Committee on Agriculture. The bill's preamble read:

To insure adequate supplies of timber and other forest products for the people of the United States, to promote the full use for timber growing and other purposes of forest lands in the United States, including farm wood lots and those abandoned areas not suitable for agricultural production, and to secure the correlation and the most economical conduct of forest research in the Department of Agriculture, through research in reforestation, timber growing, protection, utilization, forest economics and related subjects.

The McSweeney-McNary Act was strongly supported by the Society of American Foresters, the Nation's forest schools, and the forest industry. It began the most comprehensive forestry research program anywhere. Under McSweeney-McNary there have been $1.1 billion appropriated by Congress in the last 50 years to enable our forestry scientists to learn how to grow, protect, harvest, and utilize trees better.

The McSweeney-McNary Act authorized establishment of forest experiment stations in the Forest Service in every principal forest region.

It also authorized the Forest Service to begin and continue a forest survey. Its purpose was to learn how much timber we had on hand, how fast we were using it, how fast we were losing it because of fire, insects, and disease, and how fast we were growing it. These were the basic facts needed to strike a forestry balance sheet to guide public policies which would make certain that the United States would manage its forests so that the Nation would never run out of trees. The McSweeney-McNary Act was popularly referred to by foresters as the Hoot-Mon law. Its sponsors, besides Senator McNary and Representative McSweeney, included such forestry notables as the then Chief of the U.S. Forest Service, Colonel W. B. Greeley.

Nothing in the hearings which led to the McSweeney-McNary Act emphasized its need better than a few of the opening remarks of Colonel Greeley who was the first witness before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on February 28, 1928, when he said:

> We are gradually leaving behind us the period when our use of timber was based upon the exploitation of virgin forests. We are entering upon a period when our supply of timber depends upon the growing of wood as a crop, and where the protection of timber, not only from fire, but from insects and destructive diseases, where the utilization of the timber in all the many forms in which it is required for the needs of the consumers are becoming questions which involve new technical processes and new technical methods.

Of course, what Greeley was saying was that the forest future of the United States depends on the trees we grow and that solid scientific research and application of its results will help us succeed.

I am glad to report to my colleagues that the judgment of the Congress 50 years ago today to start the train of forestry research has resulted in bringing the United States to a level of forestry which it took Europe more than two centuries before 1900 to attain. Most important is that we have begun to practice forestry in earnest and at an ever-increasing pace so that there is no real danger of the United States ever experiencing a timber famine.

I would warn my colleagues, however, that if we fail to apply the results of our own forestry research on our national forests and on all other forest lands we could create an artificial timber shortage. If we do, it will be our own fault. With the Forest and Rangeland Resources Planning Act of 1974, which for the first time requires charting a goal for America's forests, we now have the great responsibility to demand and expect the executive branch to implement it fully. Our share of the responsibility is to fund the Forest Service so that our great national forest system can play its full role in providing commodities and amenities to meet our citizens' needs. If we do we will be taking full advantage of the constructive research results we have achieved through the $1.1 billion of taxpayers' funds we have spent under the McSweeney-McNary Act in the last 50 years to learn how to do a better forestry job.●

HUMPHREY-HAWKINS BILL

● Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, the Human Resources Committee has referred to the Banking Committee a revised version of the Full Employment and Balanced Growth Act of 1978. Included among the revisions made by our committee is a significant modification of section 108, on monetary policy and on the participation of the Federal Reserve System in the formulation of our economic goals.

In our deliberations on this point, I maintained that tension between Congress and the Fed is healthy, not harmful, and that the original language of the bill represented an "engraved invitation" for Congress to act in the future to seek to conform the monetary policies of the Fed to the goals of the Full Employment and Balanced Growth Act.

But we have dealt satisfactorily with the section by reporting language which, while requiring the Fed to transmit and report on its policies for the rest of the calendar year and their relationship to the goals in the Economic Report of the President, does not express or imply a commitment on the part of Congress to act to change those policies.

In this connection, I ask to have printed in the RECORD a copy of a recent speech made by Board Governor Henry C. Wallich, before the National Association of Business Economists, on the subject of the Fed's capabilities concerning national economic goals and projecting appropriate targets for the monetary aggregates. I think it is very instructive for those of us who seek wisdom on the subject of the Fed's role in economic policymaking, and hope all my colleagues will study it carefully.

The speech follows:

A COMMITTEE MEMBER LOOKS AT THE OUTLOOK

(Remarks by Henry C. Wallich, Member, Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System)

I appreciate the invitation that has been extended to me to address the National Association of Business Economists' 1978–1979 Outlook session on the subject "A Committee Member Looks at the Outlook." It provides an opportunity to make a personal assessment of the economic outlook and to suggest the policies that follow from that assessment. Mainly, however, this is a chance to zero in on the particular problems that members of the Federal Open Market Committee (FOMC) encounter in looking at the outlook.

THE OUTLOOK

At this juncture, I believe the economy is close to the full employment zone. Although inflation threatens to accelerate as we come close to the 5–6 percent range of unemployment, I would not regard that fact as indicating that this rate of unemployment is above the "constant inflation" rate of unemployment. The acceleration that we observe is the result of special although very troublesome circumstances including government actions on minimum wage and farm price legislation, strikes and dollar devaluation. A determined anti-inflationary policy should be able to overcome the effects of circumstances of this sort. The fact that inflation seems to be accelerating, nevertheless, may be a warning that the constant inflation rate of unemployment is higher than many of us would have liked to think.

While the unemployment data may be exposed to crosscurrents, there can be little doubt that we have done very well on unemployment. The Administration's year-end objective of 6.2 percent was passed in January of 1978. The recent experience suggests that because employment is more uniquely related to the rate of growth, it is a more meaningful variable than unemployment. Unemployment is a function, principally, of both growth and labor force developments. One must question the feasibility, therefore, of setting simultaneous targets for growth and for unemployment. In any event, over-all unemployment is no longer the top priority although sectoral unemployment, especially that of teenagers, continues to be a major social problem.

In restraining inflation, on the other hand, we have done poorly. There is a clear threat that inflation is accelerating, and a great deal of evidence that expectations of future inflation are accelerating.

A simple policy rule should follow from this combination of facts. The rule is that at any time the least attained policy goal should have priority. Today that goal is the restraint of inflation. The validity of the proposed rule is supported by the growing concern over inflation and the increasingly expressed view that inflation is indeed our number one problem.

Still another policy proposition follows from the circumstances described. It is that we must now get ready for a soft landing. We have had a long and fairly vigorous expansion. We have a good chance of extending this expansion provided we are prepared to allow it to taper off gradually from now on. This would still be consistent with further reductions in unemployment. But as time goes on, these reductions should be increasingly the result of structural measures and less that of expanding aggregate demand. That would be the way to phase gradually into the long-term rate of growth of perhaps 3.5 per cent. Since the economy has not yet accumulated irremediable imbalances that could block stable growth, we have a chance now of attaining that admittedly rare condition. An essential proviso is that the redressable imbalances that exist, especially the large Federal deficit and the current account deficit, and above all, of course, inflation, are brought under better control.

FEDERAL RESERVE FORECASTING

After these general remarks on the outlook, I would like to examine in detail how the Federal Reserve goes about formulating its view of the outlook and its policy targets. This subject is of particular relevance because, under the Federal Reserve Reform Act of 1977, the Federal Reserve in its quarterly presentations to Congress is now required to take account of "past and prospective developments in production, employment, and prices." The Board already is under Congressional pressure to make explicit numerical projections in this regard although the legislative history of the Act indicates this is not required. Under the House-passed version of the Humphrey-Hawkins Bill, moreover, the Federal Reserve would be required once a year to present its intended policies for the year ahead and their relationship to (i) the short-term goals set forth in the Economic Report of the President and (ii) medium-term trends in employment, production and prices for the three calendar years beyond the period considered in the Economic Report. I have doubts the Federal Reserve can do this in any meaningful way. This is partly because of the inherent uncertainties of economics which make projections and targeting, as we have just observed in the case of unemployment, a high risk occupation, and all the more so when undertaken for five-year periods. More particularly, however, it is the structure of the Federal Reserve System and the Federal Open Market Committee that militates against a meaningful exercise of forecasting and target setting.

The Committee print which is now before the Senate Human Resources Committee wisely does not require five-year projections.

The Federal Reserve System has a staff of economists, at the Board and in the Reserve Banks, that is probably second to none in the world. This staff engages in careful and detailed forecasting exercises every month. The results, of course, are fully available to the FOMC. However, a staff forecast is not that of the FOMC. Moreover, it would be very unwise to present the staff forecast to the Congress, even as a staff exercise. That would tend to politicize the process, would militate against firm analystic positions being taken, and would make it psychologically difficult for the staff to modify its forecast quickly in the light of changing circumstances.

POLICYMAKERS' FORECASTS

For the individual member of the FOMC, it is quite impossible to take the staff forecast literally. Precise numerical forecasts are the product of computers and, in the U.S. Government context, of the need to have hard GNP forecasts for budget making and revenue estimating. Experienced users of such data will tend to think in terms of ranges, of probability distributions, perhaps skewed, and quite likely even of altogether different alternative scenarios.

As policymakers, the members of the FOMC will tend to factor into their own assessment of the future the chance that they have, if the economy develops differently from what they expect or desire, to take action that might help bring the economy back on track. This may lead to rather different evaluations of risks and probabilities than those a passive observer might arrive at.

Given this wide range of possible outcomes, it is most unlikely that all the members of the FOMC would arrive at a uniform forecast. It would not be meaningful for the FOMC, moreover, to vote on the outlook as such. "Truth," or even probability, cannot be determined by majority decision. In the nature of things, there can be no fully agreed FOMC forecast, although means, medians, broad consensuses and the like could be developed. Any such over-all consensus would undoubtedly conceal a large number of differences on specifics.

POLICYMAKERS' TARGET

Where the setting of targets is concerned, such as for growth, unemployment, and inflation, the case is different. Targets calling for action can be established by majority decision. Very likely, however, the sets of such targets chosen by individual FOMC members would vary greatly. They would reflect different value judgments, different trade-offs, different degrees of time preference, and differences of views concerning the effectiveness and the lags of the instruments to be employed in pursuit of these targets. Conceivably no single set of three objectives might command a majority. Only broad ranges, or even qualitative descriptions of targets, might attract a consensus.

Furthermore, one must question the very meaning of any setting of targets for the real sector of the economy by policymakers that have only quite limited powers. An FOMC member may believe that certain levels of growth, unemployment, and inflation are achievable if all the powers at the disposal of government were brought to bear. But the Federal Reserve wields only a fraction, in my opinion a very modest one, of these powers. If the much larger powers outside the grasp of the FOMC are not brought to bear, or are brought to bear in ways not conducive to the attainment of these targets, what is the meaning of the FOMC saying that it has such and such targets? This very practical consideration is buttressed, at a more theoretical level, by the familiar proposition that the number of instruments must be at least equal to the number of targets. The Federal Reserve in effect has only one instrument—monetary policy. Discount rate, open market operations, and reserve requirement changes are only variants of the same tool, permitting only insignificant goal differentiation. It is not possible to achieve independent levels of growth, unemployment, inflation with this single instrument. These factors—the difficulty of reaching a highly specific consensus and the limitations of control—are the underlying reasons, I believe, why the FOMC has been wise not to try to set highly specific targets.

TARGETS AND PROXIES

What the FOMC typically has done is to specify some financial variable or variables, as a proxy for real sector targets. In recent years, the monetary aggregates have served this function. Naturally one takes for granted that FOMC members' ultimate concern is with real sector variables and not with some financial magnitudes. But agreement on a proxy is often feasible where agreement on a set of real sector targets would be difficult.

This presupposes, of course, that there is a reasonably close link between the financial proxy, say the money supply, and the real sector. Most people believe, rightly in my opinion, that this is true only to an approximation. In addition, focusing on a proxy variable such as the money supply also can be justified by a belief that the real sector responds to monetary policy action only after a long lag.

The use of a proxy variable greatly facilitates the decision process. There are several reasons for this. First, only one variable needs to be determined, instead of a whole set. Each FOMC member chooses the value of the proxy variable he believes most likely to achieve his real sector preferences, possibly including variables other than the familiar targets of growth, unemployment, and inflation, and including also diverse trade-offs among all of these. Second, the proxy variable, if it is well chosen, will be subject to the control of the FOMC. This is clearly the case of the money supply, although only to a much lesser degree than that of interest rates. Finally, a proxy variable that is within the purview of the FOMC encourages arrival at a consensus or at least at some immediate decision, precisely because action on it is needed and can be made effective immediately. Futile debate over matters that the Federal Reserve cannot control thus is replaced by purposeful discussion of something it can control.

In the FOMC's discussion of the desirable setting of the proxy variable or variables, the expected real sector effects, possibly quite different in the anticipations of different members of the Committee, will play a large role. The Committee is unlikely to mistake an instrumental variable for an ultimate one. But the decision process is greatly aided by focusing on the instrument. At a time when the need to bring down inflation imparts a clear preference for moving a money supply target in a downward direction, this advantage is particularly pronounced.

CONGRESSIONAL PRESENTATION

The nature of a group decision, as described, makes it difficult to formulate for presentation to the Congress, targets for the real sector, as has sometimes been proposed. The FOMC does not formulate such goals internally for its own purposes. It probably is wise not to engage in an overly formalistic exercise of that sort, so long as the consensus, to the extent that there is one, can be expressed through a proxy. Such an attempt could polarize, perhaps paralyze, a group otherwise capable of action.

There is a second reason why explicit formulation of detailed real sector targets would be undesirable. In all probability, the exercise would generate pressures on the Federal Reserve, emanating from the public, the Administration, and the Congress, for more credit creation and monetary expansion. But, as noted above, consistency among real sector targets, and consensus on them, is difficult to achieve even in a small and quite professional group such as the FOMC. The chances that targets urged by outside groups should turn out to be consistent and feasible must be evaluated with even greater skepticism.

Adequate coordination between monetary policy, fiscal policy, and other government policies must, of course, be achieved. The present procedure for coordination is simple, albeit largely implicit. The Congress, the Administration, and the Federal Reserve all develop their forecasts of the economy and their views of appropriate policies in the light of information about the forecasts, targets, and operating plans of the others.

The most explicit and continuous communication concerning expectations and policy intentions probably is provided by the Federal Reserve. As I have already mentioned under the Federal Reserve Reform Act, the successor to House Concurrent Resolution 133, the Fed must report to the Congress quarterly on its one-year money supply targets, taking account of past and prospective developments in production, employment, and prices. Given the ability of the monetary authorities to implement their money supply targets, therefore, Congress and the Administration are enabled to form reasonably dependable expectations of future growth of the money supply. The ability of Congress and the Administration to generate reliable expectations in the fiscal and other areas may be subject to greater uncertainty, although the Budget Control Act of 1974 has helped in this regard. But an appropriate fiscal-monetary mix can be made to emerge from actions based on these sets of expectations.

This form of fiscal-monetary coordination, to be sure, is somewhat looser than those who believe in centralization of macro decision making might like to see. It should be noted, however, that coordination of expectations is the best that can be attempted, since full control of monetary and fiscal variables, in the nature of a market economy, is not possible. Moreover, there is no single focus of policy even for fiscal policy decisions and other government policies. In varying degree, these policies are determined by interaction between the Congress, the political forces in the Executive Branch, and the bureaucracy.

CONGRESSIONAL AND EXECUTIVE BRANCH MOVES TO INFLUENCE FEDERAL RESERVE POLICY

The Federal Reserve communication with Congress and with the Administration should of course be forthcoming and meaningful. It should not, however, change the role of the Federal Reserve.

There are grounds for concern that there have been so many legislative proposals in recent years which have sought to reduce the degree of independence the Federal Reserve has historically enjoyed. In the case of the Federal Reserve Reform Act the legislation was substantially modified before passage and the modifications in the Humphrey-Hawkins bill have not yet been completed. Yet both these projects of law explicitly require that we set targets and provide for Congressional review of our performance. This could accord the Congress a growing influence over Federal Reserve policies in the years ahead. I believe that members of the Congressional Budget Committees would give ample testimony to the Congressional bias towards enacting programs—the sum total of which are inflationary. It is my expectation that a similar bias may develop in Congressional recommendations concerning monetary policy.

This worrisome trend is reinforced since legislation subjecting the Federal Reserve to a GAO audit—and the GAO is the investigatory arm of the U.S. Congress—is well advanced in the Congress.

The Federal Reserve fought this legislation for many years because it feared that GAO audit would go beyond a financial audit and become a performance audit of our monetary policy. Fortunately, under the evolving Bill, monetary policy is still exempt from the GAO's sway, but no one can tell for how long. If our monetary policy decisions ever are audited, it will not be difficult, with the benefit of hindsight, to demonstrate that Federal Reserve policies have fallen far short of perfection. The more numerous and more specific the targets that we are required to announce because of legislation, the more glaring will be the inability to attain all or perhaps even any of them. Once such "failure" is documented by an official audit, what could be more reasonable than for Congress itself to take over direct control of monetary policy in order to remedy this "mismanagement," and what would be the predictable consequences?

There are many arguments for and against central bank independence. They turn on the degree to which monetary policy follows the democratic process, the degree of coordination with fiscal and other policies, the need for the Executive—or the Congress—to have adequate control of all policy instruments. But fundamentally there is only one issue. It is inflation. The founding fathers of the Federal Reserve System knew very well that for politicians the power to print money represents a temptation difficult to resist. It was clear to them that more Executive or Congressional control over the printing press would mean more inflation. Independence of the central bank would mean less inflation. That was the basis on which the legislators who designed the Federal Reserve Act made their choice. It remains to be seen whether their successors will abide by that choice.●

NELSON A. ROCKEFELLER

● Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, Nelson A. Rockefeller delivered a most eloquent speech in Kansas City at a luncheon tribute to a courageous American President, Harry S Truman. Mr. Rockefeller's speech touched on what I feel to be the essential character of President Truman and some vital issues confronting us today.

While I did not agree with President Truman's decision to let free China go down the drain, to allow a stalemate in the Korean war, to veto the Taft-Hartley Act, or to advocate a more centralized Federal Government; I did agree with many of the difficult decisions he made and had a deep respect for him. He was a decisive man who led our country through some of its most tumultuous years and as Mr. Rockefeller pointed out, were President Truman alive he would have been "deeply troubled" by many of the overriding issues of today.

He would have been disturbed by the massive shipment of Soviet arms and material to Africa, the proxy wars being waged by the Soviet Union through the use of thousands of Cuban troops, and the continued Soviet undermining of legitimate Asian governments.

In his speech, Mr. Rockefeller noted the dangers of a continued policy of relaxation of our military preparedness. With an ever-increasing threat of Soviet expansionism, we cannot afford to let vital defense weapons, such as the neutron warhead go undeployed. Mr. Rockefeller said:

Common sense must be applied to the role of nuclear technology in our national defense.

The strength of America lies, not only in its military, but in a strong, viable intelligence organization—not one crippled and shackled by a displaced zeal. An intelligence service is the eyes and ears of a nation, and we cannot hope to learn the intrigues of potential adversaries without a strong one.

Finally, Mr. Rockefeller pointed out, we need to keep America economically sound. To bolster our economy we must become more energy self-sufficient. We cannot remain strong when a large part of our fuel is imported. We must expand the use of nuclear generated electricity, expand the exploration of new oil fields, and expand the search for new sources of energy. The 1974 Arab oil embargo should have taught us a lesson; I only hope that we are good learners.

Mr. President, in order to share this speech with my colleagues, I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The speech follows:

EXCERPTS OF REMARKS BY NELSON A. ROCKEFELLER

You honor me by your invitation to share in this celebration of the birthday of Harry S. Truman, a great American and surely one of the greatest Presidents of the United States of America.

Like many of you, I was privileged to know President Truman personally. But unlike you, I had the special privilege of being fired by him. As a holdover appointment from the previous administration, I was "given my liberty" when I did not resign. The event did not shake the Nation. However, it gave me something in common with General of the Army Douglas MacArthur.

Harry Truman was as American as apple pie and sour mash bourbon. He needed no research nor public opinion polling to know what the great American public thought, what its values were, what it aspired to. Harry Truman was an integral part of that public. And despite the high offices he held and the enormous impact of his leadership upon the whole world, he never left that great American public. Neither the blandishments of privilege nor the temptations of power blunted his common sense or open integrity.

He held fast to his belief in the dignity of the individual—and all individuals. He never despaired of the common sense judgment of the American people when they knew the facts. He never gave way to cynicism. He hated sham. He never disparaged our basic American institutions and values. The ardor of his patriotism was founded in knowledge, experience and faith.

Harry Truman became our President at one of the most critical times in our history. We were at war on two fronts across the major oceans. The grand alliance that was winning the war against Hitler, however, was already showing signs of coming apart. Stalin was seizing Eastern Europe. The British Empire was disintegrating. Charles de Gaulle was already asserting his impervious independence.

The Japanese war machine, stopped at Midway and defeated in the struggle for Okinawa and Iwo Jima, was still formidable in its home islands fortresses. Calculations estimated a million American casualties would be the price of invasion and ending that war.

At Los Alamos, the Atom Bomb had been developed. The Nation was in shock at Franklin Roosevelt's death. The "father figure"—that had seen the country through the trials of the depression and four years of world war—was gone.

So it was when the plain-speaking man from Missouri, who as Vice President had never really been briefed on the affairs of state and war by Franklin Roosevelt, took over the helm of the Nation.

Consider the magnitude of the problems he faced and the courage of the decisions he made:

The organization of the United Nations at San Francisco;

The peace with Germany;

The German occupation by U.S. as well as other forces;

The dropping of the Atom Bomb on Hiroshima and Nagasaki and the ending of the war with Japan;

The setting up of the occupation and government of Japan;

The economic and military aid program to Greece and Turkey to prevent a communist takover of those countries;

The announcement of a policy of containment to prevent communist expansion;

The development of the Marshall Plan;

The creation of the NATO alliance;

The Point IV Program;

The United Nations international military forces against the communist invasion of South Korea.

These are but a few of the decisions Harry Truman made in the international area. They had their difficult counterparts on the domestic side.

Today, as we celebrate his birthday, the aura of his accomplishments blurs the memories of the criticisms, the harrassments, the deprecations that Harry Truman faced as President. It took real courage to surmont a hostile press; to fight a rampant McCarthyism; to overcome an active opposition within his own party; to push for civil rights legislation and, for that matter, to construct the balcony on the South Portico of the White House as designed by Thomas Jefferson.

Harry Truman was not one to hold up decisions that he was convinced were right for the Nation. He didn't wait until he was shown that the litmus paper of public opinion would show no acid reaction. Indeed, he was so forthright and decisive that in 1947 and 1948 it appeared to many that Harry would rather be right than be President for another term.

But that kind of gutsy leadership was what gave him his second term. When he took his campaign to the people, they elected him to the high office which only fate had previously given him.

The purpose of our gathering here is not alone to acknowledge our debt, and that of the whole free world, to Harry Truman, and to commemorate his memory. It is also, in the light of his life, his experience and his contributions, to assess our own efforts, our own judgments, our own courage to face the problems that confront us now.

Harry Truman would have been deeply troubled by the current Soviet worldwide expansion—a growing threat to freedom everywhere—in Africa through the use of their Cuban colonial troops—in Asia through continuing subversion—underwritten by massive shipments of Soviet arms in both areas.

This whole situation was brought home to me dramatically last week. On the day before I was to visit Afghanistan, a Communist coup overthrew that nation's government. According to accounts in the Indian press, 10,000 Afghans were massacred—the result being that that fiercely independent and strategic country has now been subjugated and turned into another Soviet satellite.

Harry Truman foresaw the overridng danger of Soviet expansion in 1947 when he enunciated his doctrine of Soviet containment, but we lost sight of our global interests in the aftermath of the national confusion over Vietnam.

The world we face is fraught with new problems and perils different from the time of the Truman Presidency but no less serious.

From a Nation whose currency was the firm foundation for international finance, we have become a country whose dollar has now been depreciated at least 33⅓% against the strong currencies like the Japanese Yen and the Deutsche Mark—a dollar whose buying power has been cut virtually in half during the past 10 years.

From a Nation whose technological and military supremacy guaranteed world peace and progress, we have become a Nation which seems content now to rest on its oars while our adversary accelerates its buildup.

From a Nation whose exports sustained vast areas of the world and assisted their rehabilitation after World War II, we now have adverse trade balances unparalleled in our peacetime history.

From a Nation that produced virtually all of its own energy in Truman's years, we now rely on imported oil for more than 50% of our petroleum needs. The era of cheap energy has gone, and the cost of imported oil and gas now burden not only our balance of payments but our domestic economy as well. Such dependence upon foreign oil supplies makes us extremely vulnerable economically, undermines the value of the dollar and puts us in a vastly less favorable national defense and diplomatic posture in a troubled world—and we've done nothing about it!

If he were here today, Harry Truman would be really troubled. He knew that a secure and plentiful supply of energy was basic to our national security and economic well-being. He had seen the dependence of this Nation on petroleum. He had seen domestic production in 1952 fall far short of our needs. He fought for national title to offshore oil fields against the claims of individual states. And way back in 1952 he said:

". . . it is of the utmost importance that the exploration of the submerged lands—both on the marginal sea belt and the rest of the Continental Shelf—for oil and gas fields should go ahead rapidly and any fields discovered should be developed in an orderly fashion which will provide adequate recognition for the needs of national defense."

Here we are, 26 years later, and only in the past few months or so have oil drilling rigs begun to do exploratory drilling off the Atlantic coast!

Despite the harrowing experience of the Arab boycott, despite the creation of OPEC and the increase in world oil prices, despite the obvious dangers to our economy and our security from over-dependence on imported energy and the extreme danger of ever higher prices for oil, we still have no national energy policy. Indeed, of all the major nations, the United States, which uses more energy and depends upon a plentitude of energy more than any other, has done the least to ensure the continued availability of energy within our borders. Ironically, we have the technical, scientific and resource capacity to meet our needs—if only we make up our minds to do it.

In the nuclear field, we are stalemated by controversy and indecision. From the Nation that pioneered atomic development and that under Truman undertook to share the peacetime uses of this new energy source with the rest of the world, we have become halting and hesitating. In fact, the situation has even reached the point where it is seriously proposed that we contain technology, arrest development and stop its application.

Yet, if postwar nuclear history has shown us anything, it is that nuclear knowledge cannot be contained. Research and development recognize no enduring monopoly by any one nation. Indeed, the history of the modern world has demonstrated that technology and progress march together; that technology and quality of life are married; and that technology and survival are inseparable.

I agree with Harry Truman, who put it this way:

"In this list of atomic developments, I have put the peaceful uses and the military uses side by side. It is a matter of practical necessity in the kind of world in which we live today that we give priority to security; but I have always had the profound hope that atomic energy would one day soon serve its rightful purpose—the benefit of mankind."

Of course, we applaud the idea of harnessing solar energy, but we know that practical considerations of cost and technology will inevitably delay and limit its large-scale utilization. Clearly, nuclear technology for the generation of energy, along with coal and use of alcohol in gasoline made from surplus grain, sugar and even garbage, is one of the keys to economic self-reliance of this Nation in the energy field, to freedom from the fear of embargo and the drain of excessive imports on our balance of payments. Despite all those dire predictions of impending doom, we have had nuclear-generated electric power on a commercial basis for 20 years and no accidents have occurred involving public injury. In this same period, 909,726 people have been killed by automobiles. Yet I know of no movement to "ban the automobile." Let's have some of that Truman common sense on this issue, too.

That common sense also must be applied to the role of nuclear technology in our national defense. Thus it is imperative that the United States proceed with nuclear developments and that it develop, produce and deploy the neutron bomb.

This weapon can give us and our NATO allies a significant new means to offset within the European theatre the overwhelming Soviet numerical strength in conventional military weapons that hangs like a sword of Damocles over Free Europe. Without the neutron bomb, our ultimate recourse to a Soviet massive attack in Europe would be an intercontinental nuclear strike which the Soviets could survive—and retaliate against the United States with devastating effect. Thus, by counter-balancing the growing threat of Soviet supremacy in conventional military forces, the neutron bomb can help free us and the other Free World nations from the threat of Soviet blackmail.

But, Harry Truman also knew that economic and military strength were not enough to defend the security and well-being of America; we must have the best intelligence system as well. Thus, in addition to Truman's recommendation to the Congress for the creation of the Defense Department and the National Security Council in 1947, on his recommendation the Congress also established the Central Intelligence Agency. I'm sure he would be aghast at the decimation and disarray of our intelligence services today. In Harry Truman's words:

"A President has to know what is going on all around the world in order to be ready to act when action is needed . . . The second war taught us this lesson—that we had to collect intelligence in a manner that would make the information available where it was needed and when it was wanted in an intelligent and understandable form."

I equally believe Harry Truman would not have countenanced any domestic unauthorized CIA activity or excess. But in dealing with anyone who violated the law, he would not have thrown out the baby with the bath water—and he would have reaffirmed his total support of those who gave their lives and their loyalty to defending the security of our country.

President Truman understood the dangers we faced.

I remember Jim Forrestal, former Secretary of Defense, telling me of being with President Truman when he received the message from General MacArthur that the North Koreans were invading the South and that American lives were in jeopardy. Jim said that the President with his typical courage and decisiveness simply sent a message back to General MacArthur ordering him "to get the Americans out of Korea—and to get the North Koreans out too."

He understood the importance of economic strength. Thus he saw that, to support the Korean war effort, the United States would have to expand the base of its productive capacity.

Therefore, he set a goal of a 25% increase and got Congress to permit a certification of national necessity for new production facilities that provided the incentive of a fast write-off for all essential investment. He understood that the new investment was essential for economic growth, which in turn was essential for economic strength and jobs. He also knew that this was essential to equal opportunity for all.

His courage and decisive action worked, and American enterprise achieved his goal of increasing our productive capacity by 25% within a short space of time.

This experience demonstrates that, with a clear sense of purpose and proper incentives, the people of this country can conquer their problems and attain new levels of freedom and quality of living—not only for themselves—but all humanity.

Harry Truman worked for these goals. He strived to maintain this as a land of opportunity, to build on its strengths, as well as correct its weaknesses. He had an impatience with those who denigrate our values. He emphasized in his time the basics of our unique American economic system and the strengths of our political and social order.

We've just been through a period in which the deriders, the belittlers, the detractors and iconoclasts have had a field day. An unpopular war in Vietnam, the Watergate business, scandals in government and in the private sector of our national life, have all accentuated the negative.

It's time we heard not only what's wrong with America but what's right about it, too!

A democratic society cannot exist without criticism. But it cannot exist, either, without a fundamental faith in democracy itself and the institutions of a free society.

Let's get on to a renewed sense of common effort to renew the Nation's strength and liberate its basic dynamism.

We have got to have trust and confidence in the ability of our institutions to adjust to change. And we've got to provide those institutions with a sense of national purpose and a stable framework of laws within which they can make the adjustments and build to meet the future needs of America.

This also means a social and governmental climate that will make it possible for our institutions to attract creative leadership and enable leadership to function.

In the haste to root out scandal, in the rush to purge the unpopular, in the hurry to cast out and castigate the abusers of power and trust, we have shackled necessary instruments of power, centers for decision and creative springboards for action.

Today, we've got more critics, more prosecutors, more accountants, more auditors, more investigators, more dopesters, more commentators and more kibitzers than ever in our history. It's high time we have more deciders, more doers, more producers.

I'm sure that, were he here today, Harry Truman would agree that as a Nation:

We need decision, not delay.

We need energy, not equivocation.

We need production, not promises.

We need strength, not weakness.

And we need to be able to stand the heat in the kitchen that Harry Truman talked about.

Indeed, in a dream I had about this speech, Harry Truman appeared briefly and said ten words: "Nelson, give them my best, but also give them hell."●

BENEFITS OF THE U.S.–U.K. TAX TREATY

● Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, at the present time, we are in the midst of a national debate on the relationship between different levels of taxation and the health of the national economy. This debate extends into the international sphere as well. National as well as local taxes can inhibit international investment flows, which are critical to sustain economic development and combat high unemployment.

It is not too often that we in the Senate are called upon to support the regulation and facilitation of international tax relations. We will have that opportunity soon when we consider the U.S.-U.K. Tax Treaty.

I consider this treaty, which has been reported favorably by the Foreign Relations Committee, to be really important for international financial affairs and especially for our relations with the industrialized countries in the OECD.

In today's Washington Post, Art Pine provides a critical analysis of the effects of the U.S.–U.K. Tax Treaty. After considering the arguments—both pro and con—Mr. Pine, who is the Post's tax specialist, concludes:

There is nothing very sinister about the tax treaty. If anything, its provisions are pretty straightforward.

It is important that my colleagues have before them clearly the terms and import of this treaty. I believe that Mr. Pine's analysis can be both helpful and instructive in their preparation for the floor debate on the treaty.

Mr. President, I commend the article to the attention of my colleagues and ask that it be printed in the RECORD:

The article follows:

OVERSTATING BRITAIN'S "BIG" OIL INTERESTS

(By Art Pine)

In today's emotion-filled climate, it doesn't take much to touch off a controversy about tax policy. All that's needed is a few charges that the government is giving away big tax breaks to multinational corporations. Mix in Big Oil, and you can spark a flap about almost anything.

A case in point is the brouhaha in Congress about the U.S.–British tax treaty negotiated last year. In fact, the document is relatively innocuous, designed to trade some tax benefits for Britons in return for some for the U.S. Any other time, it wouldn't rate much notice at all.

But the treaty has been bottled up in the Senate for months, largely because opponents have managed to scare up images of a government sellout to big British oil interests, ostensibly at the expense of the poor, downtrodden state governments. In truth, that's far from the case.

There's nothing very sinister about the tax treaty. If anything, the provisions are pretty straightforward:

The United Kingdom would agree to give Americans who invest in British companies about $85 million a year in tax credits on stock shares, which it now allows only to Britons. The credits were designed to help offset "double taxation" of profits and dividends—a step the U.S. has considered.

The British government also would allow American investors some $375 million in refunds for overpayments in earlier years. The tax credits were put into effect in 1973, but foreign investors were barred from claiming them. The treaty in effect would remove the disparity for good.

In return, the U.S. would restrict the reach of state tax collectors in levying taxes on British subsidiaries which have installations in their states. Right now, some states base their taxes on the British firm's worldwide income. The treaty would allow them to tax only the earnings made in the state.

In reality, the restriction would affect only a handful of states. The biggest loser would be California, which now claims the treaty will cost its treasury about $20 million a year. Alaska would be next, with a $10 million revenue loss.

But opponents of the treaty have painted the exchange as a ripoff. The main beneficiary, they charge, would be the rich British Petroleum corporation. And the states, stripped of their rightful taxing power, would lose millions in badly needed tax dollars. As a result, Congress has held up any approval.

On closer examination, however, the charges seem some what specious:

For one thing, there's serious doubt among tax experts that states should have the power to tax foreign companies on the basis of their worldwide earnings. States are supposed to have jurisdiction only over what takes place within their borders. Money earned outside should be taxed elsewhere.

Indeed, some tax specialists question whether it isn't some states that are exceeding propriety. California, Oregon and Alaska recently have expanded their assessment procedures to include affiliates that do no business at all within their borders, but simply are related to companies that do.

The potential for abuse by states here is considerable. In the case of BP's Alaska operations, for example, the more liberal procedure would allow Juneau to expand its tax bite to include Standard Oil of Ohio. The reason: BP has a 40 percent ownership share in Standard.

On a more fundamental level, however, there is serious question about the effect of this expanded state taxing power on trade and investment. British firms—or any foreign companies—are unlikely to come here if the tax laws are unfairly restrictive. And American companies won't fare well overseas.

Indeed, while California's franchise Tax Board has been campaigning to block the U.S.-U.K. treaty, the state's Governor, Jerry Brown, who originally opposed the tax pact, has dropped his opposition. Brown came back from a trip to Japan convinced it was discouraging new business for the U.S.—and new jobs.

And at a recent meeting of the National Governors Conference, other chief state executives indicated they had similiar second-thoughts about opponents' charges. An effort to push through a resolution condemning the treaty failed to get even enough support to make it to the conference floor.

What makes the treaty so important is that, either way, it is bound to have broad impact. If the treaty fails, and states are given the go-ahead to expand their tax reach, it could affect not only the rights of foreign firms, but those of U.S.-based companies doing business across state lines.

Treasury officials are hoping that if the U.S.-U.K. treaty is approved by the Senate, it will serve as a precedent for winning fairer tax treatment for Americans from other countries, and will spur more investment and trade. The U.S. agenda now includes negotiations with several other nations.

Viewed from that perspective, the charges by the treaty's opponents seem little more than a tempest in a teacup. For all the loose talk about multinationals and Big Oil the Senate is facing a simple and straightforward vote.●

THE CAPITAL FORMATION PROBLEM CONFRONTING THE NATION'S SMALL AND MEDIUM SIZED BUSINESSES

● Mr. WEICKER. Mr. President, as ranking minority member on the Senate Select Committee on Small Business, I have chaired two hearings on the capital formation problem confronting this Nation's small and medium sized businesses. During the course of these hearings, I have had the opportunity to discuss the extent of the problem, its causes, the impact on the Nation's employment and economy, and possible solutions, with an outstanding array of individuals representing diverse interests. The breadth of the problem was evidenced by the testimony given by a panel of witnesses assembled by Arthur Levitt, Jr., the chairman of the American Stock Exchange. Joining Mr. Levitt were representatives of a coalition with an interest in capital formation, including Edward I. Koch, mayor of New York City, Terry Sanford, president of Duke University, a businesswoman active in urban affairs, a leader of a labor union, and a businessman. The securities industry, which is a vital factor in enabling small businesses to raise capital, was represented by: Robert H. B. Baldwin, chairman of the Securities Industry Association and president of Morgan Stanley & Co.; James Davant, chairman of Paine Webber, Inc.; John Whitehead, senior partner of Goldman Sachs & Co.; Robert M. Gardiner, vice chairman of Dean Witter-Reynolds, Inc.; and Wallace O. Sellers, vice president of Merrill Lynch, Pierce, Fenner & Smith, Inc. The partner in charge of small business practices at Arthur Andersen & Co., William D. Barth, shared with the committee the knowledge acquired by his company in dealing with small businesses. Dan W. Lufkin, a venture capitalist who was cofounder of the successful investment banking firm of Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette, Inc., and is now general partner of Brae Co., related his experiences concerning the equity needs of small, innovative companies. Alan Greenspan, former Chairman of the President's Council of Economic Advisers, and Alfred C. Holden, provided the committee with the economists view point.

The capital formation problem facing our Nation's small and medium sized businesses is a severe one. These businesses are having a difficult time in obtaining the capital which they need to enable them to grow. I might add that the difficulty of raising capital is not indigenous to small business alone. Economists have expressed great concern over the expected gap in the overall economy between the need for new investment and the funds which will be available to meet the need. A New York Stock Exchange estimate projects a cumulative capital gap of $650 billion by 1985.

Mr. President, I would like to share with my colleagues the insights into this serious problem which were given at these recent hearings.

THE IMPORTANCE OF SMALL BUSINESS: JOB FORMATION AND URBAN ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

More than 97 percent of America's business enterprises are small businesses. These small firms account for 55 percent of all private employment, 48 percent of the Nation's business output, 43 percent of the GNP, and more than half of all industrial inventions and innovations.

The importance of small business to the country was underscored by the results of a study conducted in 1976 by the Development Fund of MIT. The job formation of 16 companies were compared from 1969 to 1974. Six of the companies were giants, with sales in the billions; five were smaller companies built on new technologies.

Even though their total sales were less than 1/40th of those in the largest group, the five small companies created 35,000 new jobs in 5 years, while the six giants only created a total of 25,000 jobs. Thus, despite the gross size disparity, the smaller firms created 10,000 more jobs than the established giants.

Further evidence of the enormous potential for job creation was adduced by the American Electronics Association ("AEA") at an earlier hearing held by the Select Committee on Small Business. A study of its members disclosed that the employment growth rates for young companies (less than 20 years old) were 20 to 115 times greater than the companies more than 20 years old.

According to the Commerce Department, the Nation will require 1.5 million new jobs annually until 1985. As evidenced by the MIT and AEA studies, new and small businesses, with their capacity to produce new jobs, will play a key role in satisfying this need.

Small businesses will also be an integral factor in the solution of the problems confronting our Nation's urban centers. To get our cities back in business, we must have businesses in our cities to provide the jobs which generate the income, financial resources and dignity so essential for urban growth. Mayor Koch testified that he was "concerned about continued high unemployment, particularly in our inner city area—and government's inability to provide a structural solution. It is time that we affirmatively encouraged private investment that is the principal source of new jobs." He urged Congress to help "New York and other inner city areas to counter a declining tax base by helping our business enterprises, both manufacturing and service, attract permanent capital in order to grow, compete, and provide jobs." Ernesta Procope, a businesswoman active in urban affairs testified that, for minorities, "the key to unlocking a better life must be found in the private sector." It is important that the availability of capital is facilitated to enable small businesses to play its role in helping our cities get back in business.

THE SCOPE OF THE PROBLEM

In its January 16, 1978 issue, Business Week summarized the extent of the capital formation problem as follows:

. . . (C)apital spending is falling far short of what the country needs to keep up with a growing labor force and an insistent demand for higher incomes. And there is considerable evidence that new companies and small companies are not getting money to grow on. The stock market is demoralized, and stock prices are so low that all companies—both large and small—are having trouble raising equity money. The ratio of debt to equity in many industries is close to the danger point.

Numerous statistics may be cited to support this dire statement. According to figures compiled by the Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) there were 698 underwritings for companies with less than $5 million in assets in 1969. However, only 80 companies of that size made public offerings in the 4 years from 1974 to 1977. The offerings in 1969 raised almost $1.5 billion, whereas the offerings for the 4-year period combined to produce merely $415 million. Equally disturbing is the decline in the number of corporations, of all sizes, making first-time public offerings. In 1972, 633 unseasoned corporations went public and raised nearly $1.7 billion. However, there were only 93 initial offerings in the 3-year period from 1975 to 1977, and these first-time offerings raised just $388 million. The situation is not improving, as shown by the fact there were only two initial offerings during the first 4 months of 1978, and these raised merely $2.7 million.

Another indication of the difficulty which small businesses are having in obtaining equity capital is that the number of regulation A offerings (offerings of less than $500,000) which were filed with the SEC shrank from 998 in 1972 to 158 in 1977. Of those regulation A offerings which were filed, the 650 which cleared in 1972 raised $256 million, while the 124 which cleared in 1977 raised only $46 million.

Mr. President, I submit the following table summarizing the results of regulation A offerings filed with the SEC during the period 1970–77 for the RECORD.

The table follows:

As a result of the above documented unavailability of equity financing, small businesses are unable to grow. At the same time, larger companies are aggressively searching for smaller companies to acquire, because current market values are frequently much lower than the cost to the acquiror of entry into the market.

The recent merger trend is evidence of this fact. Federal Trade Commission statistics show that corporations with assets in excess of $100 million accounted for nearly 47 percent of the acquiring companies in completed and pending mergers in 1976, while corporations with assets of less than $1 million (annual income of approximately $100,000) accounted for only 19 percent. On the other hand, of those corporations which were acquired by merger or acquisition in 1976, nearly 74 percent had assets under $1 million, while companies with assets exceeding $50 million (annual income of approximately $500,000) accounted for less than 5 percent of the acquired corporations by asset size.

Mr. President, I submit the following tables depicting the number of mergers and acquisitions by asset size of the acquiring and acquired corporation for the RECORD.

As shown by the above statistics, the capital formation problem threatens the viability of the historical concept of the free market system in which small corporations can compete with giants and have a fair chance of survival.

STRUCTURAL CHANGES

The witnesses at the hearings cited three basic structural changes over the past 10 years which have limited the access of small business to equity markets. They are: institutionalization of equity markets; concentration within the securities industry; and institutional barriers to public offerings of securities.

First. Institutionalization of equity markets:

In his testimony, Mr. Davant noted that the number of individual investors, after reaching an all-time high of 32.5 million in 1972, declined by 18 percent over the last 5 years to a level where only about 25 million people own stock. Individuals have been net sellers of approximately $5 billion of corporate stock annually over the last 5 years, and these individuals have traditionally been the principle source of capital for smaller business.

Mr. Davant also stated that although institutions owned, by value, less than 15 percent of New York Stock Exchange common stock in 1949, they now own more than 33 percent. In 1976, institutions were responsible for more than 70 percent of the value of all shares traded on the NYSE, while individuals accounted for less than 30 percent. Twenty years ago, these proportions were the reverse. Furthermore, in 1976, new issues of debt and equities totaled $230.4 billion, and five out of every six of these dollars were invested by institutions.

An article in the May 15, 1978, issue of Forbes indicated that while individuals presently purchase about 70 percent of the stocks traded on the American Stock Exchange, institutions have been increasingly active in this market in the past year.

This institutional dominance, with projected growth of pension funds, should continue to increase. Compounding this, the professional investor has grown increasingly conservative due to the "prudent man" investment standard of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 ("ERISA"). Mr. Lufkin testified that ERISA effectively precludes pension fund investment in smaller, more venturesome companies.

The ability of small businesses to raise capital has been greatly impaired by increased institutional investment. William J. Hambrecht, an investment banker in San Francisco, Calif., summarized the impact of the institutionalization of equity markets on small business:

The small company * * * must appeal to a professional investor who manages large amounts of money, has limited time to analyze investments, and has a growing reluctance to assume risks that might create an ERISA liability. As a result, conventional institutions will rarely examine an investment opportunity that has less than $100 million in sales, and has a market capitalization of less than $50 million.

Second. Consolidation within the securities industry:

Numerous representatives of the securities industry commented on the trend toward consolidation in the brokerage business. Whereas there were 4,770 broker-dealer firms registered with the National Association of Securities Dealers in 1970 there were only 2,772 in 1977, which represents a decline of 38 percent. The number of member firms on the New York Stock Exchange fell from 487 in 1972 to only 358 today.

Although this consolidation has "trimmed some excessive fat" in the industry, it has also proved to be inimical to small businesses. As Mr. Whitehead observed:

The smaller firms . . . are those which have historically had a particular interest in providing capital to small business.

Mr. Gardiner noted that:

Regional firms have good local knowledge of these newer companies, but are often unable to form underwriting groups and are themselves concerned with problems of permanent capital, profit, and long-term viability. * * * (T)he very firms that are going out of business were the ones who provided the only avenue of financing for the small businessman.

The problem of the centralization of the sources of capital was aptly summarized by Mr. Davant:

In recent years, the individual investor has become an endangered species. More and more investment money is being channeled into business through financial institutions, which are less and less willing to invest in smaller businesses. And the securities industry, which links investors and businesses of all sizes, has been contracting and consolidating. All these conditions have impaired the access of smaller businesses to the financing they need to grow.

Third. Institutional barriers to public offerings of securities:

Compliance with SEC rules relating to public offerings of securities is extremely costly. In 1976, a SBA Task Force on Capital Formation studied offerings by companies with assets under $5 million. The average registration cost was more than $122,000. Under the small offering exemption of SEC regulation A, a traditional means of raising capital for small business, compliance with SEC rules has been shown to involve added delay and expenses as high as 18 percent of the offering price. As noted by Mr. Baldwin:

The cost of registering securities and complying with detailed disclosure requirements poses an additional burden to small business.

Furthermore, the requirements of investment bankers often preclude a smaller business from obtaining capital in the public markets. Mr. Davant discussed the barriers to a small business raising equity by either a public offering of securities or through the private placement market:

Five years ago, for example, we were able to consider initial public offerings for companies with after-tax earnings of $1 million or more. Today, we cannot even discuss an initial public offering with a company unless it has after-tax earnings of over $2 million—as well as unusual viability or exceptional potential. In 1972, Paine Webber managed four public offerings. Last year, we managed none. In other words, today most smaller, younger companies are effectively foreclosed from "going public"—the traditional first step for small companies on the way to becoming bigger ones.

Problems in the public market have caused companies of all sizes to turn to the private placement market. But here, too, the situation is particularly difficult for smaller companies. Paine Webber handles a substantial share of all private placement under $10 million. Yet last year, we arranged only fourteen of these smaller placements for a total of less than $70 million. Five years ago, a company with as little as half a million in after-tax earnings could think in terms of a private placement. Now it must have at least a million. The private placement market is at best a limited alternative for most smaller companies.

CAUSES OF THE PROBLEM

During the course of the hearings, the witnesses discussed, in addition to structural changes, several possible causes of the capital formation problem confronting small businesses.

Mr. Greenspan perceived the problem to be part of the overall lack of private investment caused by a lack of business confidence. The two key contributors to the high level of business uncertainty, in his opinion, are inflation and escalating business regulation. This theme was echoed by Mr. Holden, who went on to observe that:

The Federal Government can thus exert a disproportionately strong impact upon health of the smaller businesses. For the course of inflation, interest rates, business expectations, tax programs, and external fortunes has a major influence upon the decision to invest, with each element more than incidentally affected by Congressional initiatives.

The "prudent man" investment standard of ERISA was cited by Messrs. Levitt, Lufkin, Baldwin, and Barth. William Dillard, chairman of Dillard Department Stores, summarized the position of these men when he noted that due to the "prudent man" rule, fiduciaries are prohibited "from investing in securities that are considered 'speculative' * * * (P)ension fund trustees are effectively limited to investing in a limited number of 'blue chip' stocks, and are prevented from investing in smaller companies which offer the potential for greater growth."

Many of the witnesses discussed various SEC regulations which were considered to impede investment in small businesses. The "small offering exemption" and "private offering exemption" from the registration requirements of the Securities Act of 1933 were perceived to be ineffective. Also, SEC limitations on the secondary sale of securities under rule 144 were cited as restraining liquidity and thereby seriously inhibiting entrepreneurs and small investors from taking the risks involved in "startup" situations.

Although various causes of the problem were cited by the witnesses, there was near unanimity in agreeing that the underlying cause was the increase since 1969 in the effective capital gains tax rate. According to Mr. Levitt, the increases in the maximum capital gains tax rate imposed by the Tax Reform Acts of 1969 and 1976 "have become major investment disincentives discouraging the individual investor from buying equity securities." Mr. Davant stated that:

This narrowing of the differential between tax rates on ordinary income and the tax rate on capital gains is undoubtedly the single most important factor inhibiting direct individual investment in equities.

The maximum tax rate for capital gains, coupled with preference taxes and the minimum tax, is now nearly double what it was in 1969. Thus, the risk-to-reward ratio for investors has been substantially altered, thereby causing them to turn away from risk capital investments. As Mr. Lufkin astutely observed:

The primary problem in financing the startup and growth of a small business is that the risk of failure has been increasing while the potential reward has been steadily eroded for both the venture capital investor and the entrepreneur. Risk has been increased by the economic uncertainties caused by inflation, by the increased amount of capital necessary to start a business and fund its early growth, by increasing federal regulation and by the breakdown in the distribution system for small company securities. Reward has been reduced by changes in the Federal Tax Code which have raised the capital gains tax rate to the point where it is almost as high as the ordinary income tax rate and other tax disincentives, leading to the increasing difficulty of capital accumulation overall.

The present tax structure is perceived by Mr. Baldwin to adversely affect small business in three ways:

First, a recent government study has noted the detrimental impact of higher capital gains taxes on new enterprises. Recent tax developments at all levels of government have sharply narrowed the gap between ordinary income and capital gains tax rates, reducing financial incentives for entrepreneurs. The result is that the potential for after-tax gain from a new venture may not be worth the risk and a relatively secure position with a large company may appear more attractive. The demand for venture capital is reduced.

Second, like all enterprises, small businesses must compete in the capital market for funds. To the extent that the tax burden on savings leads to a contraction of the supply of capital, the result will be upward pressure on interest rates and possible rationing of capital funds. Small and new businesses, local governments and individuals may find themselves elbowed out of the capital markets.

Third, recent tax changes, by increasing the tax burden on those individuals who have traditionally provided seed money for new ventures, have made it extremely difficult for small companies to raise funds.

PROPOSED SOLUTIONS

The witnesses discussed many proposals designed to solve the capital formation problem. As a result of the widespread belief that the increased capital gains tax is the primary culprit, the proposal contained in S. 3065 to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide for pre-1969 tax treatment for capital gains was heartily endorsed. The benefits of this legislation, which was introduced by Senator HANSEN and endorsed by 59 other Senators, including myself, were very well summarized by Senator HANSEN in his statement of introduction on May 11, 1978. I will not repeat the points which he raised in his remarks.

Numerous other proposals contained in existing legislation were commended by the witnesses. Among those most often discussed were proposals: To amend the "prudent man" requirement of ERISA to establish a "basket clause" to enable investment of pension funds in small companies without fear of sanctions; a "rollover" provision to enable an investor to defer capital gains taxation on the proceeds from the sale of stock of small business, provided the gain is invested within a specified time in another eligible small concern; and a graduated corporate tax rate. An increase in the limitation on the size of a public offering under regulation A was favored by many witnesses. It should be noted that the President recently signed into law Public Law 95–284, which increases the limit on the size of such an offering to $1.5 million.

More importantly, numerous witnesses proposed new solutions to the problem. These people realized that the need for new sources of capital cannot be met by minor adjustments to existing programs and legislation. I will, for the benefit of my colleagues, summarize the innovative proposals which were offered. These proposals merit serious consideration and, accordingly, I urge my colleagues to examine the record of these hearings to obtain a more thorough understanding of these suggestions offered by these people who have a great expertise in their fields.

First. "Small business investment" investment tax credit.

Pursuant to one proposal, presented by Mr. Levitt and Governor Sanford, there would be given a reduction in tax liability, equaling 10 percent of investments by individuals in new issues of common and preferred stock of small- to medium-sized companies, with a $500 limit per year. If the investor were to sell the stock within 12 months of its acquisition, the credit would be lost. Credit would be given only in cases where neither equity capital of the issuing corporation immediately prior to the offering, nor the offering itself, exceeded a certain amount. If the limit on the equity was set at $25 million, as suggested by Mr. Levitt, an estimated total of $1.6 billion in new issues in 1976 and 1977 would have qualified for the credit, with an initial revenue reduction of only $25 to $50 million.

Governor Sanford recommended employing a credit instead of a deduction, as "utilizing a credit, as opposed to a deduction, and limiting the credit to a specific dollar amount, will assure that the benefits will flow primarily to the intended recipients, middle-income taxpayers."

Another proposal was offered by Mr. Lufkin. Citing a need for risk capital for small entrepreneurs, he suggested an investment credit of 25 percent of the amount invested in a "startup" business. Mr. Lufkin noted that these startup businesses must be financed by what he calls "personal money," as institutions such as banks, venture capitalists, insurance companies and even small business investment companies will not invest in these small businesses. Yet the success of these startups is important, as they represent the hopes and dreams, the enthusiasm and spirit of the rough-hewn entrepreneur that has made this country great.

Second. Small business participating debenture.

Mr. Barth offered this innovative proposal in response to the experiences of Arthur Andersen & Co. which showed that the infusion of new equity into a small business may not be the answer to its capital needs. This conclusion was premised on three observations. First, because the small business entrepreneur despises regulations of all levels of government and does not wish to have others tell him how to operate his business, he does not look with favor upon selling equity interests. Second, an equity interest in a small company is often difficult to liquidate at a fair price. With no dividends, no voice in management and no established market for exchange, the value of a minority equity interest may be only one rung higher than worthless. Finally, a minority shareholder in a small business does not share in much, as small companies frequently are managed in exactly the same manner as when they were privately held, even after they go public.

The proposed small business participating debenture ("SBPD") would have the status of a debt security with a stated rate of interest. This would produce an inducement for the investor by returning to him a share of the net income during the period the SBPD is outstanding. Because the SBPD would provide a redemption date, the issuing company would effectively be paying a premium for the use of capital, but only for the period of its use, thereby distinguishing the SBPD from stock warrants and rights. The SBPD concept would be accompanied by tax incentives such as a graduated "capital formation" credit (similar to an investment credit), deferral of taxation on the interest of the SBPD if it were reinvested in new SBPD's of the same company, and taxation of the premium interest received on the sale of the SBPD as a capital gain.

In the opinion of Mr. Barth, the use of the SBPD "would appeal to the owners seeking capital because the mechanisms would be self-administered, thus avoiding the necessity for approvals, examinations, permits and other forms of redtape which inevitably breed another level of bureaucracy." Furthermore, the tax incentives would induce investment in such instruments.

Third. Special preferred stock.

Mr. Greenspan suggested that small business corporations be allowed to issue a special preferred stock on which the dividends could be deducted from the taxable income of the corporation in the same manner as interest charges. He feels that "a special preferred stock, which required dividends to be paid only if earned, would give small corporations far greater flexibility in raising capital."

Fourth. Limited elimination of capital gains.

A proposal to eliminate capital gains taxes on new investments in small businesses for a limited period was made by Mr. Whitehead. It was opined that such a change in tax law would not only benefit fledgling enterprises but also would increase tax revenues. Mr. Whitehead stated that many investors might be tempted to take their investments out of established corporations in exchange for the opportunity to make tax exempt profits for a few years on investments in riskier ventures.

Under Mr. Whitehead's proposal, the benefits of the tax free treatment would be given only to investments in small, startup corporations making initial public offerings. Only investments made during a limited period of time, of 1 or 2 years, would be eligible for the favorable tax treatment. This proposal would provide, in Mr. Whitehead's opinion, an immediate boost to investment in small businesses.

Mr. President, I will continue to examine these and other proposals designed to alleviate the serious capital formation problem confronting our Nation's small businesses. I urge my colleagues to give their careful consideration to this urgent matter.●

THE NEED FOR A MORE FLEXIBLE TRANSPORTATION SYSTEM

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, recently the National Society of Professional Engineers submitted testimony to the Subcommittee on Transportation of the Environment and Public Works Committee concerning the need for a more flexible transportation program that expends funds more efficiently and effectively. More specifically, NSPE expressed concern over the tremendous investment we have made in our highway system, yet the lack of programs that we have initiated to maintain and upgrade this extensive system.

The Nation's primary and secondary roads and major urban streets are in a state of serious neglect. Major safety improvements, such as median barriers, longer merging lanes and improved ramp design, are sorely needed. Rural roads desperately need widening. Hazardous curves, fixed obstructions, and dangerous grade crossings also demand attention. In urban areas, the streets lack adequate lighting, intersections and turning lanes. All roads and highways need better planning to allow for increased system capacity, including planning to reduce energy use. Unless there is a reduction of starting and stopping and excessive idling of vehicles, fuel reductions will not reach the optimum level. Better land use planning that improves travel patterns will also reduce fuel consumption. In addition, NSPE is particularly concerned with the condition of the Nation's bridges, which are in serious decay.

Several weeks ago the Committee on Environment and Public Works reported out the Highway Improvement Act of 1978 (S. 2440). That bill should be coming up on the floor quite soon. In an effort to begin to deal with the very serious and immediate problem of maintaining our highway system, the Committee has added language that requires States to maintain their roads at a certain standard, or risk losing Federal assistance. I believe that this is a very important first step in saving our deteriorating highway system. I am also hopeful that this language will provide us with the initiative to begin to more thoroughly explore the needs of this area.

Mr. President, I ask that the entire statement of the National Society of Professional Engineers be printed in the RECORD.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT OF THE NATIONAL SOCIETY OF PROFESSIONAL ENGINEERS ON THE HIGHWAY IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1978 (S. 2440) TO THE SUBCOMMITTEE ON TRANSPORTATION, COMMITTEE ON ENVIRONMENT AND PUBLIC WORKS, UNITED STATES SENATE, APRIL 3, 1978

The National Society of Professional Engineers appreciates this opportunity to present its views on S. 2440 the Administration's proposed Highway Improvement Act of 1978. NSPE is a nonprofit organization representing 75,000 individual members who are involved in virtually every aspect of engineering.

Generally speaking, NSPE is pleased with the direction that the Administration is taking with regard to transportation policy. Undoubtedly, transportation programs need the flexibility necessary to meet the many challenges that confront us with regard to transportation. An expenditure of more than $10 billion on an annual basis requires a considerable amount of "flexibility" if that money is to be spent effectively and efficiently.

GENERAL COMMENTS

Before commenting on the specific provisions of S. 2440, we would like to provide the Committee with several overall concerns of NSPE.

NSPE believes that the Nation's transportation system, probably the best in the world today, is at a crisis point. We are concerned that the tremendous investment in our highway system may not be as effective as contemplated unless programs are initiated to maintain and upgrade the system.

The Nation's primary and secondary roads and major urban streets are in a state of serious neglect. Many Interstate system designs need major modernization. Major safety improvements, such as median barriers, longer merging lanes, and improved ramp design, just to mention a few, are sorely needed. Rural roads desperately need widening. Hazardous curves, fixed obstructions and dangerous grade crossings also need attention. Urban streets need better lighting, improvements of intersections, and more turning lanes. All roads and highways need better planning to allow for increased system capacity. Planning also needs to be improved if energy use is to be reduced. Unless there is a reduction of starting and stopping and excessive idling of vehicles, fuel reductions will not reach the optimum level. Better land use planning that improves travel patterns will also reduce fuel consumption.

NSPE strongly believes that proper use of engineering can improve the transportation system. Today's technology can address and solve the problems that now exist. We simply ask that the technology be applied. Private sector technology is available in sufficient quantities to solve planning, design and construction problems.

PLANNING

S. 2440 attempts to establish an integrated transportation planning system. It requires the Secretary of Transportation to review the transportation plans of large metropolitan areas.

NSPE recognizes the concerns expressed by states with the intrusion of a new entity—the large metropolitan area planning organization—into the planning process. We are not certain that Federal grants directed to that entity, bypassing state review, are advisable. Also, it is likely that a new layer of bureaucracy will only compound existing "red-tape" problems rather than eliminate them. NSPE is of the opinion that state officials should play a role in transportation planning and believes that direct funding of large metropolitan planning organizations will be a deterrent to this principle.

NSPE also questions the advisability of mandating that all large urban plans be reviewed by the Secretary. We are hesitant to support such Federal preemption of state activity. In addition, we are not at all sure that such a procedure may act as a bottleneck that will hold up good programs, rather than serve as an early warning device as envisioned by the Administration.

BRIDGES

As NSPE previously told this Subcommittee, we are particularly concerned with the condition of the Nation's bridges. As this Subcommittee knows, this very serious problem is in need of immediate attention.

The Federal Highway Administration's 6th Annual Report to Congress on Bridge Replacement identifies 105,500 bridges that are either structurally deficient or functionally obsolete. Based on this, it has been established that at least $20 billion is needed to repair, replace or rehabilitate these bridges.

Although the Administration recommends an increase in the bridge repair program of more than 100 percent and expands the bridge replacement and rehabilitation program, NSPE questions the sufficiency of the recommended funding. We believe that funding should be at a level that will eliminate the problem in a realistic period of time. Reportedly, it would take more than 40 years to remedy the bridge problem that exists today if the Administration's funding recommendation is accepted. We would hope that sufficient Federal-state funds would be available to complete the work in less than 40 years. Also, it should be remembered that bridges acceptable as safe today may need repair or replacement in the future.

INTERSTATE SYSTEM

NSPE applauds the Administration's effort to complete the Interstate highway system. When the system is completed it will have cost approximately $104 billion. In view of this vast expenditure, it is extremely important that the system be completed and kept in operating condition. Consequently, NSPE supports the effort to complete the system by 1990.

As this Subcommittee knows, over 90 percent of the Interstate system is now being used. Essential gaps in the system need to be closed to gain full use of the system. Proposals to transfer funds between states may be an answer. It seems inconsistent that states that have projects ready for construction are hindered, while money is waiting for action in other states. The borrowing of funds between states will accelerate the completion of the program. Also, borrowing from future years apportionments to begin work now may also serve the purpose well. Such a transfer of funding will also allow for expenditures in a more effective and efficient manner.

NSPE, as previously mentioned, strongly believes that the Interstate system needs to be maintained in operating condition. Consequently, we support the continuation of a separate program to provide for Interstate resurfacing, restoration and rehabilitation. We believe, however, that this program needs increased funding. Authorizations of $175 million annually are insufficient to bring the system up to an operating condition much less keep it there.

PRIMARY SYSTEM

NSPE questions the Administration's wisdom in consolidating many existing categorical programs affecting the primary highway system. Although the Administration assumes "consolidation" is the "mood" of the day, we are not sure that this is the proper course of action. Although flexibility is desirable and the Administration uses the concept of flexibility as the basis for its recommendation, NSPE believes that some very important programs, needing Federal assistance, may lose their identity if they are thrown into a single pool. Congress previously determined that these programs needed special attention and we think it unwise to combine them at this time.

NSPE also notes that funds for several programs are shifted in S. 2440 from the General Fund to the Trust Fund. We are not sure that this shift of programs is a wise move. Also, we note that there is not funding recommended for forest roads and trails, parkways, and park roads and trails. These programs totaled $308 million in fiscal year 1978.

SAFETY

NSPE applauds the Administration's recommendation to provide funding for the purchase of truck weight scales. We believe that such a program will provide states with the necessary equipment to better enforce truck weight limitations. NSPE believes that the operation of big trucks on the highways directly relates to the deteriorating condition of the Nation's highways.

We urge the Committee to include funding for the manpower necessary to use the scales once they become available. If manpower is not available, the capital expenditure would have nil effect.

NSPE wishes to assure the Committee of our continued interest in the transportation problems of the Nation.●

FULL VOTING REPRESENTATION FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, the Senate Judiciary Subcommittee on the Constitution recently completed hearings on Senate Joint Resolution 65, a constitutional amendment to provide full voting representation for the District of Columbia in both Houses of Congress.

A resolution strikingly similar to Senate Joint Resolution 65 was passed by the House of Representatives on March 2 of this year. It is now up to the Senate to take the next historic step in the constitutional process by passing this resolution and speeding it on its way to the States for ratification.

When the full senate considers this constitutional amendment later this session, one point will be indisputable: this proposal has strong bipartisan support both on Capitol Hill and beyond. This factor was made abundantly clear during the recent Senate hearings. Persons from all walks of life, politicans as well as private citizens, Democrats as well as Republicans, expressed their strong support for this important proposition.

Typical of this bipartisan support was the testimony before the Senate subcommittee by Paul Hays, chairman of the Republican Party of the District of Columbia.

I commend his testimony to my colleagues as they consider this constitutional amendment. I ask that Mr. Hays' statement be printed in the RECORD.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT OF PAUL HAYS, CHAIRMAN, D.C. REPUBLICAN PARTY, BEFORE THE SENATE JUDICIARY SUBCOMMITTEE ON THE CONSTITUTION, APRIL 28, 1978

Mr. Chairman, thank you for the opportunity to appear today to urge the Senate to adopt and send to the States a constitutional amendment granting, at last, full rights of citizenship to the people of the District of Columbia.

I will take only a few minutes of your time, because I am sure that much of what I have to say has been said by prior witnesses. The significance is that I appear here as a Republican, speaking for his Party, quoting both the national and the local Party Platforms.

The 1976 national Republican Platform states, "We support giving the District of Columbia voting representation in the United States Senate and House of Representatives. . . ." The language is unequivocal.

The very first paragraph of our local Party Platform that year reads "We favor full representation in both Houses of Congress based upon the population of the District of Columbia in the same ratio used for the several States." Again, the language is clear.

I know that some have reservations about these proposals. I would like to address the three objections I've heard most often, and explain why I do not think they provide valid reasons for the Senate to fail to send this matter to the States.

The first argument is that D.C. is not a State, and therefore should not be represented in the Senate. The fact is that the citizens of Washington bear all the burdens of citizenship. There is no excuse, in my opinion, for denying them any of the rights enjoyed by all other American citizens. Constitutional scholars have addressed the questions far more authoritatively than I can as a layman, and have concluded that there is no impediment to granting voting representation to the citizens of the District. I would submit that our Constitution is a living document—certainly not to be tampered with lightly—but which has been amended many times when changing circumstances dictated. If there was ever any justification for denying any rights to the residents of the District, it has long since ceased to be valid in our society.

Another objection raised is that the District is so poorly managed that its citizens should not be granted any additional rights. I submit that, while it is certainly true that this government leaves much to be desired, this argument is completely irrelevant to the issue at hand. To quote the syndicated columnist Pat Buchanan, writing in opposition to this amendment in The Nashville Tennessean on March 12, 1978: "But mismanagement and corruption are not arguments to justify a 'no' vote on this amendment. Many territories were mismanaged, lawless and corrupt when they became states of the Union." We should not apply a double standard to the citizens of Washington.

A final argument raised, most often by my fellow Republicans, is that this measure would simply insure two additional Democratic Senators and one or two more Democratic Representatives. If an election were held today, that would undoubtedly be true. We in the local Republican Party are working to change that, and I hold the perhaps optimistic view that by the time this amendment is ratified, there will be a strong two-party system here. Whether we succeed or not, I feel quite strongly that the principles on which this country was founded demand that partisan considerations be put aside. Thomas Jefferson wrote in the Declaration of Independence that governments derive "their just powers from the consent of the governed." I urge the Senate to act now to make these words effective, for all our citizens, even if we are 202 years late.●

PUBLIC AWARENESS IMPORTANT FOR GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, several weeks ago, there was a compelling production of "Holocaust" which appeared on stations from coast to coast. Millions of Americans watched this saga, which portrayed the genocide waged against the Jews in Nazi Germany between 1938 and 1945.

It is difficult to imagine how truly terrible a crime genocide is. The show, however, did a good job of presenting the tragic story of what life was like for the Jews during those horrible years.

Often, when people see a story which deals with such a moving topic, they experience a feeling of helplessness. After the showing of "Holocaust," though, I wrote to the major newspapers of this country to explain that we are not helpless when it comes to fighting the crime of genocide.

As I said in the letter, there is a treaty now before the Senate which would make the commission of genocide an international crime, a treaty which should be the very cornerstone of our campaign for human rights. And yet, this treaty has not been ratified by the Senate, and indeed has been before the Senate now for over 30 years without even coming to a vote.

Mr. President, I have been astounded by the response which that letter has brought. I have been contacted by people from every part of this country, and nearly without exception, they have urged me to continue my efforts in behalf of the Genocide Convention, and have expressed outrage that this treaty has yet to be ratified.

However, I have been surprised at the number of people who indicated that they were unaware of this treaty prior to reading my letter. Public awareness of the Genocide Convention is very important; people should know that we have a tool which we can use to fight this crime. And genocide is not a crime which was committed only by the Nazis. I have spoken many times in this Chamber about genocide which has occurred in other countries, and which is still occurring today in Cambodia and Uganda.

It is easy to express regret over what happened to the Jews during World War II. It is easy to express outrage over the atrocities being committed in Uganda and Cambodia, but it takes courage to take action against this crime of genocide. The Senate must show this kind of courage by ratifying the Genocide Convention. We need this treaty.

NEW YORK CITY CONVENTION CENTER IS MORE BOONDOGGLE THAN BOOM

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, an article in the latest issue of New York magazine discusses New York City's plan to build a $257 million convention center and calls it "more boondoggle than boom."

I could not agree more. New York City has obviously fallen victim to the "me-too" syndrome. Other cities have built themselves big new convention centers—many of which are, incidentally, losing money hand-over-fist, but anyway, because other cities have convention centers, then New York has to have one, too. No matter that the city is still hovering on the verge of bankruptcy and is asking the Federal Government for $2 billion in 15-year guarantees that it says it needs just to keep its capital plant going; New York City has to have its convention center, too.

Mr. President, the New York magazine article raises some very telling points, and asks some questions to which I have not seen any satisfactory answers:

> By the time the New York center is completed—if it ever starts—other cities will have larger halls. The estimated time of construction is five years; while it's possible that other giant exhibitions will be available by then, it's more than likely that our city will be obsolete and won't be able to compete for those shows.
> But even if it is built, even if it's not obsolete, and even if it attracts a fair share of this small universe, is it worth the cost? And what will the cost be? Who will pay it?

Take the projected $257 million cost of the convention center. We all know how prevalent are cost-overruns in major defense projects, and they are just as prevalent in big public works projects. The article points out that the Yankee Stadium renovation was pegged at $24 million and ended up costing anywhere from $100 to $200 million. What should make us think that the $257 million convention center cost figure is any more believable; and what is to keep that figure from doubling or tripling over the estimated 5-year construction period, that will not even start until 2 years from now?

Just as the overall cost of the convention center may escalate, so may the impact on the city's budget, which will not be negligible in any case. Under the agreement with the State, the city will pay half of the debt service on the bonds sold to finance the project and the debt service is currently estimated to be $16 million a year until the structure is completed and then $20 million a year thereafter. This means that New York City will be burdening its citizens and their children and grandchildren with $10 million or more in additional debt service for 35 years, when New York City already suffers by far the most crushing debt burden of any city in the country.

This is precisely what got New York into its present difficulty, a debt service they could not handle. This is why some people fear they may be on the verge of bankruptcy.

This money will come straight out of the city's expenditure budget, and so will its share of the operated deficit of the convention center, whch is estimated at about $2 million a year and likely to go far higher.

So that is a minimum of $10 million and probably $12 million a year if there is no overrun. If there is an overrun, we can multiply that by 2, 3, or 4.

Mr. President, New York City and State officials have told us that Congress should not be concerned about the convention center, because it is not going to be financed by the city directly, or by the State directly, but rather by the Triborough Bridge and Tunnel Authority, with the city and State contributing the cost of debt service and ultimately sharing the costs of operating deficit which is likely to occur. They say that the construction will not come out of the city's capital budget, and will not come out of the Federal guarantees they are seeking.

This ignores the basic point. Should a city which is asking for 4 more years to balance its budget and which can not even meet its basic capital needs by selling its bonds in the credit markets be building a $257 million convention center? And if the Triborough Bridge and Tunnel Authority can raise that kind of money, then why does not the city go to the TBTA to meet its basic capital needs instead of running to the Federal Government for 15-year guarantees? Incidentally, the article raises serious questions about whether the TBTA can sell its bonds to finance something like a convention center, which is not a revenue-producing facility like a bridge or tunnel, and which in fact will be a money loser dependent on subsidies from the city and State which the present administrations cannot assure will always be forthcoming.

Mr. President, the article concludes by touching on the most fundamental question of all—who will benefit from the convention center boondoggle, and will it really help the city:

> One must surely hesitate before employing loaded words like "contract" and "pork barrel" in a place as pure as New York, a state devoid of machine politics. Still, if one can overlook this, even for a moment, one might consider that there is enough in a new convention center to keep the realtors, bankers, labor skates, lawyers, insurance companies, party faithful, and even a few lawmakers fat and sassy for the length of the lease.
> But to think such thoughts is to forget we are a city in crisis.

Mr. President, Members of Congress cannot forget that New York is a city in crisis. We cannot forget before New York City is coming to us for more financial—for $2 billion in 15-year guarantees. And this convention center is a good illustration of precisely why Congress should not give New York City long-term guarantees. Because if we do this, it will enable New York City to continue doing just what got it into trouble to begin with—spending today and putting off paying till tomorrow, and burdening future generations with the debt incurred by present-day politicians with what has sometimes been termed an "edifice complex." I think it should all stop here: No Federal guarantees, and no convention center.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article to which I have referred from the New York Magazine be printed in full in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NEW YORK IS IN A CONVENTIONAL DITHER—PROMISES, PROMISES

When it comes to working a wish into a promise, New York politicians take a backseat to nobody.

If this appears to the jaded as too obvious to mention, it is well to recall the exchange between Jefferson and Hamilton concerning the need for a Bill of Rights: Said Hamilton, "It goes without saying." Well, Jefferson countered, if it goes without saying it will go better said.

So now the latest rose garden laid before the city's beleaguered citizens: the convention center, which (we are told) will deliver balm and boom to the city's ravaged economy.

For a mere $257 million, New York will rise again, will challenge Chicago as the nation's foremost draw for the giant exhibitions that bring people, money, jobs, and the rejuvenation of fallow areas.

When I was a boy, they used to say that if everyone in New York had housemaid's knee, everyone in Chicago would want it too. But leaving aside the implicit reversal of roles between New York and the erstwhile Second City, the convention center promises more boondoggle than boom—assuming it's built, which, as we'll see, is an assumption not shared by all the experts.

The plan, announced last month by Mayor Koch and Governor Carey with the ring of the fait accompli, calls for a 750,000-square-foot center in the Penn Central yards, running from 33rd Street to 39th Street between Eleventh and Twelfth avenues. This is as far west as you can go in Manhattan—the next block is Hoboken—and is almost as distant as any place in town from subways, hotels, and restaurants.

Proximity to such facilities was thought to have been an imperative in past considerations of convention-center sites here for the simple reason that the market demanded it. Now, with no indication that prospective conventioneers have changed their minds—and in face of a U.S. Supreme Court decision mandating reduction of auto traffic in Manhattan—we are told that the best possible place to erect a center is three long cross-town blocks from the nearest subway.

Environmentalists expect to have a field day with this air-pollution aspect, and the federal Environmental Protection Agency just might nix the site.

But Koch and Carey appear unconcerned, as befits men who would give us Westway. They emphasize the space of the place, which, they say, will enable New York to compete successfully for big events with Chicago and other expansionist convention towns.

New York has indeed suffered from the lack of adequate exhibition space. The Coliseum, the city's largest center, has 320,000 available square feet. This makes it the eleventh-largest in the country, and with expansion proceeding elsewhere, we are bound to drop in the ratings if we maintain the status quo.

But just as space is not the only question, it is not the only answer.

There are, for example, only fifteen or sixteen events that require 750,000 square feet. Of these, some half dozen require more room. To accommodate them, Chicago's McCormick Place will this year spread to over 1 million square feet.

By the time the New York center is completed—if ever it starts—other cities will have larger halls. The estimated time of construction is five years; while it's possible that other giant exhibitions will be available by then, it's more than likely that our city will be obsolete and won't be able to compete for those shows.

But even if it is built, even if it's not obsolete, and even if it attracts a fair share of this small universe, is it worth the cost? And what will the cost be? Who will pay it?

The City Planning Commission—and Carey and Koch—say that the building will go up for $257 million. Given our experience with cost overruns—Yankee Stadium was pegged at $24 million and ran anywhere from $100 million to $200 million—is anyone so committable as to give credence to numbers served up by politicians?

Four years ago, we were told that a convention center on West 44th Street would cost $200 million. It was dropped because of the city's fiscal crisis—after $13 million in start-up money went down the tubes. And of course, when last heard from, the city was still in a fiscal crisis.

What's new? According to our officials, 34th Street is what's new. The 44th Street site, formerly good, is now bad; the Penn Central yards, formerly not considered, are fine.

Meanwhile, the Coliseum, being old, is not even an item, although it's within walking distance of 20,000 hotel rooms and is serviced by six mass-transit and seven bus line.

The big trouble with the Coliseum, say the officials, is that it's multileveled. What we need today is everything on one floor. Therefore, it would be "ridiculous" to expand the Coliseum, even if its private operators are correct in estimating a cost of only $70 million for a 900,000-square-foot facility.

But the one-floor argument—which is blurted out automatically the moment you mention the Coliseum—runs into difficulty when it is noticed that Chicago has three floors, just one fewer than the Coliseum. How do the proponents of 34th Street answer that one? They say that they will have two floors.

What makes this more confusing is that the Triborough Bridge and Tunnel Authority (TBTA), the builder and owner of the Coliseum, is set to finance the construction of the new center by floating a bond issue.

Because 34th Street would almost certainly put the Coliseum out of business—so say the Coliseum's operators, and few, if any, deny it—this puts TBTA up against itself. Further, the Coliseum throws off half a million dollars a year to TBTA, which money goes directly to mass transit as a subsidy.

So, if the Coliseum is trashed as a result of the new center, that much is lost to mass transit.

And this raises a fundamental issue that some experts—most notably Theodore H. Kheel—believe makes it unlikely that 34th Street will be built.

The way the financing is planned, TBTA will sell its bonds on the market, a subterfuge commonly used to get around the constitutional requirement of public referendums on such matters.

The bonds are to be backed by a 35-year lease jointly entered into by the state and the city. This means that once construction is completed, TBTA is out clean. The state and city are obligated to pay the debt service, maintenance, insurance, and subsidies for losses. The total tab is open-ended, with debt service alone over $20 million per year.

But, asks Mr. Kheel, how will the TBTA manage to sell the bonds? Triborough can only issue revenue bonds, i.e., bonds collateralized by income from the rollbooths. The surplus from these tolls, however, is by law committed to mass transit. Since Triborough has no taxing power, how can investors be certain that they are safe?

If the answer is that the city and state will stand behind the obligation by virtue of the lease arrangement, it should be remembered, as Kheel points out, that under the State Constitution the Legislature cannot bind future Legislatures. Each year, the Legislature must appropriate money to fund the lease, and it is under no legal compulsion to honor anything done by previous lawmakers.

Therefore, why should the bond market buy? The city, which according to the plan will pay half the lease costs, has no credit; the state, which has credit, can't bind itself.

Says Kheel: "The way it's set up now, it's not going to happen. The financing isn't in place, and I don't see how it can be put in place."

In response, Robert R. Prince, assistant secretary of TBTA, said that while it was true that the authority's surplus was committed to mass transit, bondholders would be paid out of toll funds if necessary.

"We don't reach surplus until the bondholders get theirs," Mr. Prince said. "But of course, Ted Kheel makes a good point. That is, we'd be in a pickle if we were forced to use funds that would otherwise go to mass transit in order to honor these bonds. We supply about $90 million a year to transit."

Prince, however, said he was certain the state and city would honor their obligations and pick up all costs.

Still, who is to say the state will undertake the obligation? Calling around the Legislature, I found that the governor hadn't bothered to consult with Republican leaders before he made his announcement about the center—and hasn't consulted with them since.

Richard Jacques, director of tax and fiscal studies from the Republican minority leadership in the Assembly, said, "Carey says these things at press conferences and the papers treat it as if it's done."

When I told him what Robert Prince said, Jacques first expressed amazement and then chuckled. "I'll believe it when I see it," he said.

The same goes for the convention center, about which one question brings on another Can it be done?

If yes, then why? Or why not?

One must surely hesitate before employing loaded words like "contract" and "pork barrel" in a place as pure as New York, a state devoid of machine politics. Still, if one can overlook this, even for a moment, one might consider that there is enough in a new convention center to keep the realtors, bankers, labor skates, lawyers, insurance companies, party faithful, and even a few lawmakers fat and sassy for the length of the lease.

But to think such thoughts is to forget we are a city in crisis. And that, as a politician reminded me the other day, could be the hidden reason why we need a convention center.

"Sometimes, when things look darkest," he noted, "the best thing is to run to Vegas and put it all on red."

We picked the right color, it goes better said.

PHANTOM JOBS

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, sometime ago I put into the RECORD an article from the New York Daily News which charged that New York had 17,000 phantom jobs. Mayor Koch has answered that, giving his version of the situation in a response to the Daily News, which carried the initial story.

Mayor Koch's version is that there are not 17,000 phantom jobs, but that there are 2,818 unfilled budget lines which are funded.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the response of Mayor Koch, as it appears in an article appearing in the Daily News of May 17, 1978, in all fairness, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MAYOR RIPS THE "PHANTOM" JOBS STORY

(By Donald Singleton)

Mayor Koch yesterday agreed there are unfilled positions in the current city budget, but denied that their number approached the 17,000 figure reported in last Sunday's News.

In his promised response to The News story, Koch provided figures showing that 14,000 of the 17,000 unfilled budget lines are "paper jobs without financial support and therefore unavailable for filling. The essential point to recognize is that these 14,000 positions are not funded and therefore, the thrust of The Daily News' analysis is incorrect," Koch said.

The remaining 2,818 unfilled budget lines are funded, Koch conceded. Their existence as unfilled salary lines will, using The News conservative estimate of $15,000 per job, result in a surplus of $42 million, far less than the $250 million estimate in The News story, Koch said.

The mayor said the $42 million "is part of the much larger surplus for fiscal year 1978 projected in the 1970 budget message."

Koch also acknowledged the existence of 170 unfilled positions in his own office. The News had reported the existence of 219 unfilled budget positions, but Koch said that only 170 of thes lines were funded and available to be filled.

The mayor provided the following breakdown of the phantoms among the 1,384 full-time positions in the "mayoralty unit of appropriation": Office of the Mayor, 29 vacant lines available to be filled; Office of Management and Budget, 50; Office of Service Coordination, 43; and Youth Board, 28.

Koch said the recent mayoral transition, the reorganization of the office of Service Coordination and recruitment difficulties are the reasons for the unanticipated vacancies.

"These explanations demonstrate that, contrary to The News' assertion, our budget is based on responsible fiscal practices which allow for management, under appropriate controls, of city agencies and their personnel practices," Koch concluded.

ORDER FOR COMMITTEE TO FILE REPORT

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, I submit from the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs a report on the conduct of monetary policy, together with additional views, and I ask unanimous consent that the authors of those views have until midnight tonight to file their views.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATE RESOLUTION 469—SUBMISSION OF A RESOLUTION CONCERNING INHUMAN ACTS OF THE GOVERNMENT OF CAMBODIA

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. RES. 469

Whereas the Communist government of Cambodia has, since its seizure of power, engaged in a campaign of repression and terror against hundreds of thousands of innocent citizens of that country;

Whereas this campaign of repression by the Cambodian government has amounted to a wholesale denial of the fundamental rights to which all people are entitled:

Whereas it has been reliably reported that, as a part of its campaign of repression and terror, the Cambodian government has engaged in the systematic extermination of hundreds of thousands of the Cambodian people; and

Whereas the President of the United States has determined that Cambodia is the worst violator of human rights in the world today: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States—

(1) deplores and condemns the countless barbarous and inhuman acts perpetrated against the people of Cambodia by the Communist government of that country;

(2) calls upon all the nations of the free world to join in condemning the brutality and inhumanity now taking place in Cambodia;

(3) urges those nations with diplomatic relations with Cambodia to exert their good offices to bring about an end to the inhuman conduct of the Cambodian government; and

(4) calls upon the United Nations to acknowledge and condemn the slaughter of innocent men, women and children and impose all appropriate sanctions to help end the carnage and deprivation of human rights now taking place in Cambodia.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, it would be impossible and irresponsible to remain indifferent to the tragic events occurring in Cambodia.

Precise information is not available, but according to a number of reliable reports, hundreds of thousands of Cambodians have been executed, starved, or worked to death in the 3 years since the Khmer Rouge Communist government took power.

The brutality, savagery, and total disregard for human life in Cambodia may well rival the genocide of Nazi Germany as one of the most sordid chapters in human history.

The horrifying atrocities in Cambodia have been directed at persons of all ages, including children, the very old, and the sick.

Some have suggested that because of the lack of documented information, there may be exaggerations about the dimensions of the tragedy in Vietnam. But no one doubts that large-scale killing has taken place, and the lack of detailed information is hardly a justification for remaining silent and ignoring the slaughter in Cambodia. And, from the limited information that is available, it appears that the pattern of brutality and the assault on human rights continues.

We must speak out in condemnation of this rampant killing and the total denial of human rights in Cambodia. President Carter has referred to the Cambodian Government as the worst violator of human rights in the world today.

Every national government, the United Nations, and all international organizations should direct every available sanction against this infamous regime.

I have a resolution at this time, Mr. President, condemning the inhumanity of the Cambodian Government. I send the resolution to the desk. I do not ask for its immediate consideration. I just ask for it to be referred.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be appropriately referred.

A COMPLIMENTARY ASSESSMENT OF AN ACCOMPLISHED FRESHMAN

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senate gained many excellent new Members at the beginning of the 95th session in January of 1977. They have added immeasurably to the quality of our work in the last many months, and we are fortunate to have them as colleagues.

One of the most prominent Members among this group of Senators is the distinguished Senator from New York, DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN. Senator MOYNIHAN came to the Senate after a long and illustrious career as a professor at Harvard University and as an adviser to four Presidents of the United States. Moreover, he has served as our Ambassador to India and our Ambassador to the United Nations.

As a Member of the Senate, Mr. MOYNIHAN has rendered the same caliber of service that has won him distinction in every other field of endeavor in which he has been involved. We are indeed fortunate to have him among us, and it is a privilege that we can call him our friend, as well as our colleague.

Mr. President, the May issue of the Reader's Digest features an article that is highly complimentary of Senator MOYNIHAN and, I am sure, echoes the positive and warm evaluations of his colleagues concerning his performance in the Senate.

I ask unanimous consent that this article be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MR. MOYNIHAN GOES TO WASHINGTON

(By Irwin Ross)

Democrat PAT MOYNIHAN was no sooner installed as the junior Senator from New York, in January 1977, than he created a small political sensation by recommending that the new Carter Administration retain three federal prosecutors in New York who had been appointed by the Republicans. While U.S. Attorneys are given four-year terms, they usually resign when their party loses the Presidency. The rare prosecutor who does not is apt to be forced out, for he cannot function without the cooperation of the Justice Department.

To Moynihan, such slavish adherence to the spoils system could only destroy public confidence in the criminal-justice process. When he said so, Democratic leaders around the state, who had candidates in mind for the prized jobs, were enraged. But Moynihan's position was upheld by the Carter Administration—the three Republicans remained.*

The incident was typical of the irrepressible Pat Moynihan. He likes to make waves—but not just for the love of motion. He has a sharp eye for sound policy—and a sense for what brings a good press.

Soon after his election, Daniel Patrick Moynihan announced that he did not intend to be a "dutiful freshman for six years." He has kept his word, breaking an old tradition that freshmen Senators walk warily, speak little, show proper deference to their Senate elders, and gradually work their way into the "club." Moynihan has indeed shown respect to the hierarchs of the Senate; after all, support from the leaders, as well as the rank and file, is essential to getting legislation through. But he has also been highly visible and vocal. From time to time, he has taken on the Carter Administration—criticizing aspects of its Middle Eastern policy, for example. Nothing so establishes a Senator's independence as criticism of his own President, and voters are invariably impressed by a show of Senatorial independence.

Within a matter of months, he emerged as the star of the Senate's 18-man freshman class. Indeed, ex-professor Moynihan has provided a veritable model (the sort his old college students might analyze) of how a modern Senator makes his mark and gets things done.

Moynihan, of course, has had certain advantages over his fellow freshmen, for he was already an international figure by the time he reached the Senate. From a poverty-stricken boyhood in New York, he rose swiftly to academic and government prominence, holding sub-Cabinet and Cabinet posts in the Kennedy, Johnson, Nixon and Ford administrations, putting in two years as ambassador to India and serving for a tumultuous seven months as ambassador to the United Nations. Between government assignments, he taught at Harvard, wrote or co-authhored four books, and entertained lecture audiences from coast to coast.

Most people are amused and stimulated, some annoyed, but few are bored by Moynihan—an outsize man six feet, four inches tall with a ruddy, cherubic face nestling on a generous pair of chins and topped by flowing, white hair. The Moynihan personality is equally outsize, varying from a hearty exuberance to a ceremonial courtliness that conveys a hint of parody. Asked on one occasion by Sen. Jennings Randolph, one of the elders in the chamber, to yield the floor, Moynihan not only obliged, but bowed from the waist and intoned, "With great pleasure do I have the honor of yielding to the distinguished Senator from West Virginia."

*This decision was in marked contrast to last January's controversial removal of David Marston, a Republican-appointed federal prosecutor in Philadelphia.

At a press conference, he is a master of the swift—and occasionally self-mocking—rejoinder. Last October, he announced his support for Robert Wagner, Jr., a Democrat who had been defeated in his party's primary and was now running on the Republican line for Borough President of Manhattan. Asked how he could reconcile his endorsement of Wagner with his strong advocacy of party regularity the previous year (when he himself was running), Moynihan replied, "Well, I would have difficulty."

Ever the teacher, Moynihan is abundantly responsive when asked how one gets ahead as a Senator. "Get on important committees and make intelligent arguments," he advises. "The Senate talks to itself. It is involved in a deliberative process; there are movements of opinion."

Moynihan has followed his own advice. His first task was to get on the Senate Finance Committee. In a TV debate on the eve of the 1976 Democratic primary, each of his four rivals listed the committee assignments he or she wanted—labor, judiciary, energy, public works. Moynihan, who came last, chose the Finance Committee "because that's where the money is" (echoing the line of bank robber Willie Sutton).

Moynihan wanted Finance because it deals with so many key issues—taxes, welfare reform, Social Security, Medicare and Medicaid, the national debt. He was fortunate that the committee had two Democratic vacancies, but it was nonetheless highly unusual for a Senator in his first year to get a spot on one of the most powerful committees in the chamber. Moynihan lobbied indefatigably for the post, calling on virtually every Democratic Senator. He had a strong argument: there had not been a New Yorker on Finance for 50 years, nor a New York Democrat in nearly 100 years.

He immediately began to play an active role on the committee. His first priority was to try to get a massive injection of additional federal aid to relieve the states (and such hard-pressed cities as New York) of their crushing welfare burden. (Candidate Carter had promised such assistance in the campaign, but the proposed welfare changes were not to go into effect until 1981.) Last summer, the Senator won agreement from the Finance Committee for $1 billion of additional aid in advance of welfare reform. But the Administration opposed Moynihan's amendment, and lobbied successfully to prevent it from being attached to the new Social Security legislation, regarded as "veto proof" in Congress.

To apply pressure on the Administration, Moynihan then tried a shrewd political tactic. Initially, in August, he had introduced the Administration's welfare plan. In late September, while still favoring reform, he shifted course and issued a devastating critique of the plan before a House committee. Moynihan, a recognized expert on welfare reform, was playing hard-ball, and the Administration had reason to be concerned: if he was going to lead the assault on the welfare proposal, rather than lead the campaign for it, the bill was likely to falter.

Within a few weeks, the Administration reversed itself, coming out with its own plan for $1.35 billion in fiscal relief to the states in the three years 1978–80—more than Moynihan had advocated. Part of the money for the first year was provided by the Social Security bill, which soon became law. For a freshman Senator, it was an altogether remarkable performance.

Moynihan's persuasiveness is largely a matter of the forcefulness of his case and his attentiveness to his homework. "He asks questions," says Chester Finn, the Senator's senior legislative assistant for domestic affairs. "Who will be for it, who against, what will be the political implications and, almost invariably, will it be good public policy?"

He has a brainy, youthful staff, which he pushes hard. He also has a typewriter at his desk and writes much of his own copy. But Moynihan is not well-organized and tends to sudden inspirations, sometimes setting unreasonable deadlines. A staff member recalls an incident last September when at 10 a.m. Moynihan sketched in a statement he wanted opposing the assignment, by race, of teachers in the New York City public-school system. A long and complex argument was involved, but Moynihan wanted the completed document, with all the holes filled in, by 12:30 p.m. for release at a press conference at 2. The staffer called it "as agonizing a two-hour period as I've spent in my life." But Moynihan had the statement in hand before the press conference was over—and he made the next morning's papers, which was the point of the deadline.

Though Moynihan works hard at marshaling his facts and arguments, the flamboyance of his style is also a plus. Colleagues take notice when he gets to his feet, for his rhetorical flourishes are entertaining. Early last August, the Senate was about to debate a proposal of Adlai Stevenson III (D., Ill.) that Senators no longer be allowed to use left-over campaign funds for office expenses. "I'm going to the floor," said Moynihan.

It was quite a performance. Moynihan opposed the Stevenson proposal on the ground that the Senate had previously limited outside earnings of members, denying him a chance to earn all but a modest amount from lecturing. Now he was about to be denied a chance to defray the legitimate expenses of representing 18 million people. "I am not a man of wealth," said Moynihan. "I am not in debt . . . but I did not come to a House of Lords. I did not win my seat by my father's patrimony. I won it in a free election against a man of great wealth." But now, he said, he would not even be able to ask supporters for expense money. "I am told that I cannot even be a mendicant," he concluded. "I am told I must be a pauper."

Stevenson's response was lighthearted. "All beggars line up on the side of the Senator from New York." But the Stevenson proposal was defeated, 63 to 29.

At 51, Moynihan has come so far so fast and shown such resilience that his admirers inevitably speculate about how much further he might go. As U.N. ambassador he denied emphatically that he had any political aspirations, only to resign, go back to Harvard and a few months later announce for the Senate. Today he brushes aside any suggestions of higher political ambitions. "I can't imagine anything better than spending four terms in the U.S. Senate," he says. If he does stay around that long, Daniel Patrick Moynihan has a good chance of ending up as one of the Senate greats.

BIG MEDIA

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement by Mr. HATHAWAY be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATEMENT BY MR. HATHAWAY

A great deal has been written about big government and big business. But many of us are only beginning to become aware of big media as an increasingly powerful force in our society.

We now have 1,700 daily newspapers, 8,000 weeklies, 8,000 radio stations, 900 television stations and 10,000 periodicals published in our nation. That would seem to indicate that our citizens have access to an enormously diverse availability of thought and opinion, but that is becoming less and less the case. Of the 1,700 daily newspapers, 73 per cent are owned by 170 corporations.

Media conglomerates have been steadily adding new outlets to their chains, and there appears to be no end to this trend. More and more people are getting their news from fewer and fewer corporations. And the profits these corporations realize are often used not for better news coverage, but for the acquisition of even more properties.

The June issue of the Progressive carries an excellent article by Ben H. Bagdikian, a journalist and media critic who is a professor at the University of California, Berkeley's Graduate School of Journalism. Mr. Bagdikian explains how media power is becoming more concentrated, and offers some suggestions. I submit the article for the RECORD:

THE MEDIA MONOPOLIES

(By Ben H. Bagdikian)

If the trend toward concentration of control in the news media is alarming, as I think it is, and if doing something about it is locking the barn door before the horse is stolen, I'm afraid I am writing about an empty barn. All media with routine access to mass markets are already controlled by too few people. If we are serious about preserving maximum practical access to the marketplace of ideas and information, we ought to be deeply concerned.

The fifty largest broadcast chains already have three-quarters of the audience. The fifty largest cable television companies have two-thirds of all subscribers. The fifty largest newspaper chains have more than two-thirds of all daily newspaper sales—and this is particularly troubling because concentration of control of daily newspapers has unique effects on all information media.

Our daily newspapers are still the dominant source for all news in the United States. I wish it were otherwise. I wish NBC, CBS, and ABC each had bureaus in all medium-sized and large cities, that all local radio and television stations spent 10 per cent of their revenues on origination of news, and that the daily harvest was not limited to a dozen items. We would all benefit if we had a number of truly independent and comprehensive sources of daily news. But we do not.

Most news in all media comes overwhelmingly from two wire services, United Press International and the Associated Press. But UPI and AP do not originate most of their news; they pick it up from their local clients and members, the daily newspapers around the country. When there is a newspaper strike in New York City, not only the individual subscribers suffer: The national media—radio, television, Times, and Newsweek—originate a small amount of their own news but depend mainly on sitting down each morning and fearlessly reading The New York Times.

So when we talk about concentration of ownership of daily newspapers, we are talking about control of the only comprehensive and self-sufficient news system we have. There are more than 1,500 cities in the United States with daily papers, but only forty with competing newspaper managements. Of all cities with newspapers, 97.5 per cent have newspaper monopolies.

The business trend among newspapers runs parallel to the trend in other industries. For example, there used to be more than 200 makers of automobiles in this country, and now there are only four. But even with this drastic concentration in the automobile industry, General Motors still competes with Ford, which competes with Chrysler, which competes with American Motors, and they all compete with Datsun, Toyota, Volkswagen, and other imports. But in concentration of ownership in daily newspapers, there is no competition even among the consolidated giants.

The Gannett chain, which had seventy-six papers the last time I looked, does not compete with Lord Thomson's fifty-six papers or with Knight Ridder's thirty-two papers or with Samuel Newhouse's thirty papers. They are secure systems of local monopolies, effectively insulated from competition with each other. They are less like Ford and General Motors and more like AT&T, with its local operating subsidiaries, each an established monopoly in its own region.

This consolidation of monopolies is not something over the horizon; it is an accomplished fact. There are 1,760 daily papers in the country—a number that has remained stable since World War II. Of these, 73 per cent are owned by 170 corporations. And now these 170 corporations are consuming each other, with large chains buying small chains, so that control is gathering with disproportionate speed among the few at the top.

In 1950, 20 per cent of all individual daily papers were owned by chains; by 1960, it was 31 per cent; by 1970, 47 per cent. Today it is 62 per cent.

The same alarming concentration applies to total daily circulation. From 1950 to 1960, chain control of daily newspaper circulation remained at about 45 per cent. But from 1960 to 1970, the percentage of papers sold each day owned by an absentee corporation rose from 46 per cent to 61 per cent. From 1970 to 1977, it went from 61 per cent to its present 73 per cent. So almost three-quarters of all newspapers sold every day in this country are owned by a chain.

Some daily papers are so small—less than 5,000 daily circulation—that their annual cash flow does not interest chains. For all practical purposes, there are 400 remaining independent daily papers with enough cash flow to interest outside corporations, and there are only twenty-five large chains that can effectively bid for them. Like beach-front property, independent daily papers are a disappearing commodity. So now big chains are buying small chains, multiplying the rate of concentration. Since 1960, the twenty-five largest newspaper corporations have increased their control of daily national circulation from 38 per cent to 53 per cent. Ten corporations now publish 37 per cent of all newspapers sold daily in the United States.

Newspapers have followed other industries in another form of concentration—the conglomerate. But as with chains, there is a qualitative difference in the social impact of media conglomerates as against companies that make plastics or musical instruments. If an ordinary conglomerate uses one of its companies to further the interests of another of its companies, it may be unfair competition but it is largely an economic matter. If a conglomerate uses its newspaper company to further the interests of another of its subsidiaries, that is dishonest news.

This subversion has happened in the past. William Randolph Hearst used his newspapers, magazines, and movie companies to urge us to declare war on Mexico to protect his mines in that country. The DuPonts owned, until recently, the major papers in Delaware, and used those papers to promote the financial and political interests of the parent company. The heirs of Jesse Jones in Houston used to do the same thing with their wholly owned subsidiary, the Houston Chronicle, ordering it not to run news that would discomfort its other properties, such as banks and real estate. The Florida East Coast Railroad owns papers in Jacksonville and has a history of using the news to promote or suppress information to suit the owners' other interests.

The growth of non-news investment in newspapers is not troublesome in itself; most original investment money in newspapers came from some other source. What is bothersome is that these are no longer single units in which the owner is locally based and recognized. And with chains, when contamination of the news occurs it can be on a massive scale. Atlantic Richfield recently bought The London Observer. Mobil Oil says it is in the market to buy a daily newspaper. We might judge Mobil's dedication to independent journalism from its recent withdrawal of support from the Bagehot Fellowship for training business writers at Columbia University because the director of the Program once wrote a book about the oil industry that Mobil disliked.

Blue Chip stamps now owns the Buffalo Evening News and 10 per cent of The Washington Post. The biggest newspaper conglomerate, the Times-Mirror Corp., owner of the Los Angeles Times, also owns companies that publish most of the telephone directories in the West, produce maps for oil companies, and operate large agricultural and timber lands—all industries that are continuing issues in the news.

Some conglomerates seem to be focused on domination of national news. The Washington Post Company, in addition to its stable of newspapers, television and radio stations, owns Newsweek magazine. Time, Inc., another large publishing conglomerate, recently moved to match The Post's position astride news out of the Government by purchasing the only other Washington paper, The Star.

Finally, there is growing vertical control of information and cross-media ownership, not just between newspapers and broadcast stations, but among magazine and book publishers. RCA, for example, owns NBC and therefore has a lively interest in promoting books or magazine pieces that might make good television programming. A magazine article that leads to a book that leads to a TV series is considered ideal. So RCA also owns Random House book publishers and such subsidiaries as Ballantine Books, Alfred Knopf, Pantheon, Vintage, and Modern Library. CBS owns Holt, Rinehart, and Winston, Field & Stream magazine, Road & Track, World Tennis and Cycle World, plus the former Fawcett magazines. ABC has a big stake in the religious movement, since it owns Word, Inc., a major producer of religious literature. And, of course, it owns Howard Cosell.

Music Corporation of America, in addition to large-scale control of entertainment, owns the G. P. Putnam book publishing firm, Paramount Pictures, and New Times magazine.

Concentration of ownership and acquisition by conglomerates sometimes happen in the business world when independent units begin to lose money and are, therefore, tempted to consolidate for survival. The opposite applies to newspapers: Chains are growing because individual newspapers and newspaper chains are making so much money that it is profitable to pay even exorbitant prices to buy up the few remaining independent entities.

Newspaper economics has always been a trade secret, but since 1963 major newspaper companies have begun to sell their stock to the public, and therefore must disclose their finances in accordance with requirements of the Securities and Exchange Commission. We know from brokers and others in the trade that the profits of publicly traded papers are comparable to those of privately held papers. Available data indicate that the newspaper industry is one of the most profitable: In 1976—not a banner year for the economy—the publicly traded newspaper companies, which collectively control 25 percent of all daily circulation, had pre-tax profit margins of 19.4 percent, after-tax profits of 10 percent, average return on stockholders' equity of 16 percent, and return on invested capital of 14 percent.

A journalist might rejoice at such fat figures. A logical assumption would be that the more money a newspaper makes and the better its chances of survival, the more it will invest in the paper and the community that provides its earnings. But the tendency is the opposite. The more money a paper makes, the more likely it is to attract a takeover or, if it is already in a chain, to use the profits to purchase other properties.

My own impression is that most papers were mediocre before they were bought by chains and remain mediocre after they are bought. With few exceptions, chain operators like to buy medium-sized monopoly newspapers which require them to spend a minimum on the news. Newspapers are a multiple-appeal product—sports, stock reports, comics, news, fashions, supermarket prices, television listings—so it is usually not clear why people buy papers. Many publishers who issue daily junk as news find it easy to believe they are geniuses—but genius in publishing a daily paper consists of having a monopoly in a growing market.

No distinguished newspaper was ever created by a chain. I doubt that the New York Times would have been created by Adolph Ochs if the Times had been a wholly owned subsidiary of a Texas cement company. Or The Washington Post if Eugene Meyer had worked for Rupert Murdoch. Or the Los Angeles Times if Otis Chandler was a hired publisher sent from Rochester to keep the paper out of controversy and collect an annual bonus based on increased earnings.

But let us assume, for the sake of argument, that chain ownership actually makes newspapers better—that every property bought by a chain quickly becomes a first-rate paper. I don't think that eases the problems of narrow control.

At the present rate of concentration, we can expect that in less than twenty years almost every daily paper in the country will be owned by about ten corporations. There is no assurance that the present trend will continue, but neither is there any reliable evidence that consolidation will stop.

One reason concentration in the media is dangerous is that media power is political power. There is no reason why newspaper publishers and broadcast operators should not promote their corporate welfare the way other industries do. But it would be naive not to recognize that for politicians there is a difference between being asked to support a corporate bill for the computer industry and being asked to support something wanted by the newspaper publishers and broadcast managers in the politician's home district. Remarkably many members of Congress believe that when a publisher or station manager comes to Washington to lobby a bill or fight some regulation, these are the people who will decide how to treat the politician in their media at the next election. And most of them preface their acknowledgment of this belief by saying it is strictly off the record.

I see no constitutional problem in establishing some limit on how many papers or how much circulation one corporation may control. At the same time, I believe that no one should be prevented from printing or saying anything, any time, anywhere. If there were a legal limit to the existing media any one corporation could control, and Gannett, for example, wished to buy an existing paper in Peoria, it could do it by selling its paper in Pensacola. If it insisted, as it ought to, that it has a First Amendment right to print in both Peoria and Pensacola, then I would defend that right and insist that it could retain its paper in Pensacola and express its First Amendment right in Peoria by starting a new paper in Peoria.

I doubt that even the most energetic chain-builder in the business would insist that it is socially healthy to have one corporation control every daily paper in the country. We now have twenty-five chains that control a majority of all papers sold daily. If one corporation in control is bad and twenty-five is good, what is the proper number? At what point should someone—presumably the Department of Justice or Congress—step in and say No?

But I don't believe that the Department of Justice or Congress will step in. They have not so far, and the pace of concentration has increased in the last decade. And I believe the Department of Justice and Congress do not step in precisely because concentrated control of the media also represents concentrated political and economic power. But I can suggest more modest remedies:

One small gesture would be to end the meaningless ownership statement issued annually to the post office and printed as obscurely as possible each October. Instead, each paper using the second-class mailing privilege should be required to have available for public scrutiny at the local post office the names of all officers, directors, and major stockholders, the precise percentage of their ownership, and all their significant financial holdings. This is the same requirement of disclosure the SEC makes of officers, directors, and major stockholders of publicly traded companies. Local people should at least know who owns and controls their monopoly media and what other financial interests are held by those who make ultimate decisions about the news.

Another measure that would afford some insulation from potential subversion of news would be the election of editors by professional journalists on the staff of the paper. Obviously, this would require the consent of the owner, but one always dreams of owners with vision. Election of editors would also mean office politics, but office politics in the present methods are not unknown, and staffs as a whole could not make worse choices than managements as a whole. For those who insist this would make for mediocre papers, I suggest taking a look at Le Monde, one of the world's great newspapers, whose staff elects its editor.

An irrational decision of the tax courts that for years has fueled the growth of chains ought to be reversed. The Internal Revenue Code permits a newspaper to retain without normal taxation any undistributed earnings as a necessary cost of doing business if the purpose of this accumulation is to buy another newspaper. That makes neither social or business sense.

Newspaper and broadcast editorials regularly warn against the potential danger of Big Government. They rightly fear uninhibited power, even in the hands of a wise and benevolent leader. But that fear should apply to corporate as well as to political power. We have 1,700 daily papers, 8,000 weeklies, 8,000 radio stations, 900 television stations, and 10,000 periodicals. But we can no longer assume that these large numbers represent comparable diversity in control. We now must fear these numbers; most of our 215 million citizens are reached not by thousands of corporations in the media business but by the relative few that control consolidated organizations.

If we believe in the indispensability of a pluralistic marketplace of ideas and information, we cannot be complacent about a narrowly controlled management of that marketplace, whether it is governmental or corporate, benign or malicious. The greatest danger in control of the mass media is not, I think, the likelihood that Government will take control, but that the public, seeing little difference between narrow corporate control and narrow governmental control, will be indifferent to which dominates the media.

CONSIDERATION OF CERTAIN MEASURES ON THE CALENDAR

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, there are various measures on the calendar which I believe have been cleared with the minority and Senators all around. I therefore ask unanimous consent that Calendar Orders Nos. 756, 760, 807, 813, 824, and 825 be called up in consecution at this time.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I shall not object. I rise only to inform the distinguished majority leader that these Calendar order numbers are cleared on our Calendar on this side. We have no objection to proceeding to their consideration and passage at this time.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished minority leader.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

VETERANS' PROGRAMS EXTENSION ACT OF 1978

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 5029) to amend title 38 of the United States Code in order to authorize contracts with the Republic of the Philippines for the provision of hospital care and medical services to Commonwealth Army veterans and new Philippine Scouts for service-connected disabilities; to authorize the continued maintenance of a Veterans' Administration office in the Republic of the Philippines; and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Veterans' Affairs with an amendment to strike all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That this Act may be cited as the "Veterans' Programs Extension Act of 1978".

TITLE I—EXTENSION OF CERTAIN PROGRAMS IN THE REPUBLIC OF THE PHILIPPINES

SEC. 101. Section 230(b) of title 38, United States Code, is amended by striking out "June 30, 1978." and inserting in lieu thereof "September 30, 1981.".

SEC. 102. (a) Section 624(c) of title 38, United States Code, is amended by striking out "Veterans Memorial Hospital" and inserting in lieu thereof "Veterans Memorial Medical Center".

(b) Section 632 of such title is amended by—

(1) striking out "Veterans Memorial Hospital" each time it appears and inserting in lieu thereof "Veterans Memorial Medical Center";

(2) striking out "June 30, 1978," and inserting in lieu thereof "September 30, 1983," in the material preceding clause (1) of subsection (a);

(3) inserting "furnished prior to October 1, 1979," after "care" the first time it appears in clause (2) of subsection (a);

(4) inserting before the semicolon at the end of clause (3) of subsection (a) "and paid or to be paid for by the United States under this subsection";

(5) inserting before the semicolon at the end of clause (4) of subsection (a) a comma and "except that, in cases in which hospitalization was not primarily for a service-connected disability, the United States may not provide for such payments for nursing home care furnished after September 30, 1979";

(6) striking out "July 1, 1978," in subsection (b) and inserting in lieu thereof "October 1, 1983,"; and

(7) striking out "five years" and "June 30, 1978" in the material preceding clause (1) of subsection (d) and inserting in lieu thereof "period" and "September 30, 1980", respectively.

TITLE II—BENEFITS PAYABLE TO PERSONS RESIDING OUTSIDE THE UNITED STATES

SEC. 201. Paragraph (4) of section 101 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by—

(1) inserting "(A)" before "The" and redesignating clauses (A), (B), and (C) within such paragraph as clauses (i), (ii), and (iii), respectively; and

(2) inserting at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(B) For purposes of subparagraph (A) of this paragraph, in the case of an adoption under the laws of any country other than the United States (including the possessions, territories, and Commonwealths of the United States)—

"(i) a person residing outside any of the States during the lifetime of a veteran (including for purposes of this subparagraph a Commonwealth Army veteran or 'New' Philippine Scout, as defined in section 1766 of this title) shall not be considered a legally adopted child of such veteran unless such person—

"(I) was less than eighteen years of age at the time of adoption;

"(II) is receiving one-half or more of such person's annual support from such veteran;

"(III) is not in the custody of such person's natural parent, unless such natural parent is such veteran's spouse; and

"(IV) is residing with such veteran (or in the case of divorce following adoption, with the divorced spouse who is also an adoptive or natural parent) except for periods during which such person is residing apart from such veteran (or such divorced spouse) for purposes of full-time attendance at an educational institution or during which such person or such veteran (or such divorced spouse) is confined in a hospital, nursing home, other health-care facility, or other institution; and

"(ii) a person shall not be considered to have been a legally adopted child of a veteran as of the date of such veteran's death and thereafter unless—

"(I) at any time within the one-year period immediately preceding such veteran's death, such veteran was entitled to and was receiving a dependent's allowance or similar monetary benefit under this title for such person; or

"(II) for a period of at least one year prior to such veteran's death, such person met the requirements of clause (i) of this subparagraph.".

SEC. 202. Section 107 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsections (a) and (b) of this section and, notwithstanding the provisions of subchapter VII of chapter 35 of this title, no benefits under chapter 11, 13, or 35 of this title shall be paid to any person by virtue of the provisions of either such subsection or such subchapter on the basis of a claim by such person for initial eligibility for any such benefits filed on or after October 1, 1979, if, on the basis of prior claims filed by such person, such initial eligibility had been disallowed more than once.".

SEC. 203. (a) The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall carry out a comprehensive study of benefits payable under the provisions of title 38, United States Code, to persons who reside outside the fifty States and the District of Columbia. The Administrator shall include in such study—

(1) an analysis of the issues involved in the payment of such benefits to persons who reside outside the fifty States and the District of Columbia, together with analyses of such aspects of the economy of each foreign country and each territory, possession, and Commonwealth of the United States in which a substantial number of persons receiving such benefits reside as are relevant to such issues (such as the rate of inflation, the standard of living, and health care, educational, housing, and burial costs);

(2) an analysis of the issues involved in the payment of such benefits as the result of adoptions under laws other than the laws of any of the fifty States or the District of Columbia;

(3) an analysis of the amounts and method of payment of benefits payable to persons entitled, by virtue of sections 107 and 1765 of such title, to benefits under chapters 11, 13, and 35 of such title;

(4) estimates of the present and future costs of paying monetary benefits under such title to persons described in clauses (1) and (3) of this subsection;

(5) an evaluation of the desirability of continuing to maintain the Veterans' Administration Regional Office in the Republic of the Philippines, taking into consideration (A) the current and expected future workloads of such office, (B) the estimated cost in fiscal years 1981 through 1985 of continuing to maintain such regional office, (C) the feasibility and desirability of transferring appropriate functions of such regional office to the United States Embassy in the Republic of the Philippines, and (D) a provisional plan, which the Administrator shall develop, for the closing of such office and so transferring such functions, together with cost estimates for fiscal years 1981 through 1985 for the implementation of such plan assuming that such office is closed prior to October 1, 1981; and

(6) an evaluation of the effects of the amendments to such title made by sections 201 and 202 of this Act.

(b) Not later than February 1, 1980, the Administrator shall report to the Congress and the President on the results of such study together with the Administrator's recommendations for resolving the issues to be analyzed and evaluated in such study.

TITLE III—HEALTH CARE AMENDMENTS

SEC. 301. Subclause (v) of clause (C) of section 601(4) of title 38, United States Code, is amended to read as follows: "(v) hospital care, and medical services which will obviate the need for hospital admission, for veterans in a State not contiguous to the forty-eight contiguous States, except that the annually determined hospital patient load and incidence of the provision of medical services to veterans hospitalized or treated at Veterans' Administration expense in Government and private facilities in each such noncontiguous State (except in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico and in the Virgin Islands) shall be consistent with the patient load or incidence of the provision of medical services for veterans hospitalized or treated by the Veterans' Administration within the forty-eight contiguous States, but authority under this subclause shall expire on December 31, 1980, in the case of each noncontiguous State (except Alaska and Hawaii).".

SEC. 302. Clause (3) of section 612(1) of title 38, United States Code, is amended by inserting "(including the conduct of an examination to determine eligibility for service-connected compensation under chapter 11 of this title)" before the period.

SEC. 303. (a) Subchapter IV of chapter 17 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by redesignating section 634 as 635 and inserting after section 633 the following new section:

"§ 634. Hospital and nursing home care and medical services in the United States

"The Administrator, within the limits of Veterans' Administration facilities, may furnish to a Commonwealth Army veteran or new Philippine Scout hospital and nursing home care and medical services for the treatment of a service-connected disability of such veteran or Scout.".

(b) The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 17 of such title is amended by striking out and inserting in lieu thereof

"634. Definitions."

"634. Hospital and nursing home care and medical services in the United States."

"635. Definitions.".

SEC. 304. (a) Not later than October 1, 1979, the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall submit to the Congress and the President a report on the furnishing by the Veterans' Administration of hospital care and medical services in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico and in the Virgin Islands. The Administrator shall include in such report—

(1) a comprehensive assessment of the health-care needs of veterans in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico and in the Virgin Islands;

(2) a detailed report on the hospital care and medical services which were furnished or are planned to be furnished to veterans there during fiscal years 1975 through 1981, with breakdowns according to the numbers of veterans being treated, the facilities at which such care and services are furnished, and the extent to which such care and services are furnished for the treatment of service-connected disabilities and to veterans with service-connected disabilities rated at 50 per centum or more; and

(3) recommendations as to how such health-care needs can best be addressed within the existing authority of the Veterans' Administration and what additional authority, if any, is necessary and desirable to meet such needs.

Recommendations under clause (3) of this subsection shall be made only after taking into consideration—

(A) the extent of poverty in the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico and in the Virgin Islands;

(B) alternative sources of health-care services that would be available to such veterans being furnished such services there by the Veterans' Administration if the services so furnished by the Veterans' Administration for non-service-connected disabilities were substantially reduced;

(C) the equitable distribution of Veterans' Administration health-care resources; and

(D) the priority attaching to the care and treatment of service-connected disabilities.

(b) Not later than March 1, 1979, and annually thereafter, the Chief Medical Director of the Veterans' Administration shall submit to the appropriate committees of the Congress, through the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, a full report on the implementation of section 601(4)(C)(v) of title 38, United States Code (as amended by section 301 of this Act), including the numbers of veterans provided contract treatment (and the average cost and duration thereof) in each State (as defined in section 101(20) of title 38, United States Code) in the categories described in the following provisions of such title: sections 601(4)(C)(v) (as so amended), 610(a), 612(a), 612(f)(1)(A), 612(f)(1)(B), 612(f)(2), and 612(g).

SEC. 305. Section 6(a)(2) of the Veterans' Administration Physician and Dentist Pay Comparability Act of 1975 (Public Law 94-123; 89 Stat. 669), as amended, is amended by striking out "September 30, 1978." and inserting in lieu thereof "September 30, 1979.".

SEC. 306. Section 5082 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) There is further authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1979 for carrying out the programs authorized under this chapter such sums as may be necessary (1) to make to institutions with which the Administrator has entered into agreements under subchapter I of this chapter supplemental grants for which the Administrator had, prior to May 1, 1978, approved applications from such institutions, and (2) to meet fully the commitments made by the Administrator prior to May 1, 1978, for grants and applications approved under authority of this subchapter and subchapters III and IV of this chapter, except that no funds appropriated under this subsection may be used for grants and applications approved under this subchapter and such subchapters III and IV until the full amounts for which applications had been so approved have been obligated under such subchapter I.".

SEC. 307. Section 611 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by inserting at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(c) The Administrator may, in the discretion of the Administrator, enter into a contract with any organization recognized under section 3402 of this title to furnish, on a reimbursable basis, as prescribed by the Administrator, emergency medical services at a national convention of such organization to individuals attending such convention except that reimbursement shall not be required to the extent that eligible veterans receiving such services would otherwise be eligible for medical services from the Veterans' Administration under this chapter.".

TITLE IV—VETERANS READJUSTMENT APPOINTMENTS AND PENSION REFORM IMPLEMENTATION

SEC. 401. Section 2014 of title 38, United States Code, is amended by—

(1) amending subsection (b) to read as follows:

"(b) To further this policy, veterans of the Vietnam era shall be eligible, under the terms and conditions specified in Executive Order Numbered 11521 (March 26, 1970) and in accordance with regulations which the Civil Service Commission (or successor authority) shall prescribe, for veterans readjustment appointments, and subsequent career-conditional appointments, except that such an appointment (1) may be made in the case of any veteran of the Vietnam era up to and including the level GS-7 or its equivalent, (2) may be made in the case of any veteran of the Vietnam era who is a disabled veteran without limitation as to completion of more than fourteen years of education, and (3) may be made at any time prior to October 1, 1981.";

(2) striking out all after "subsection (b) of this section and" in subsection (d) and inserting in lieu thereof a comma and "with breakdowns for disabled and other veterans, the following information: The number and grade levels of such appointments; the number of appointments converted or terminated, with a breakdown according to categories of causes for termination; the number of such terminations initiated by the department, agency, or instrumentality and by the veteran; descriptions of the education and training programs in which appointees under subsection (b) of this section are participating; and the results of the plans required under subsection (c) of this section."; and

(3) inserting "subsections (a) and (c) of" after "in" in subsection (f).

SEC. 402. For the purpose of enabling the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs to carry out, with maximum efficiency, during the first one-year period following the date of its enactment, any Act enacted after June 1, 1978, with an effective date prior to October 1, 1979, establishing a new program of benefits under chapter 15 of title 38, United States Code, including the conduct of a program of public information designed to advise fully and fairly all persons who may be affected by the provisions of such Act of its implications for them, without impairing the efficiency of the Veterans' Administration in carrying out its other programs and responsibilities, there is authorized to be appropriated $5,000,000 for fiscal year 1979.

SEC. 403. (a) For the purpose of carrying out the studies required under sections 203 and 304 of this Act, there is authorized to be appropriated $350,000 for fiscal year 1979.

(b) Sums appropriated pursuant to subsection (a) of this section shall remain available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read:

An Act to amend title 38 of the United States Code to authorize contracts with the Republic of the Philippines for the provision of health-care services for Commonwealth Army veterans and new Philippine Scouts, to authorize the continued maintenance of a Veterans' Administration office in the Republic of the Philippines, to impose new requirements with respect to claims by certain persons residing outside the United States, to modify the circumstances under which contract hospital care and medical services may be furnished outside of the contiguous States; to authorize the provision of care in the United States for the treatment of the service-connected disabilities of certain Filipino veterans, to increase the authorization of appropriations for grants to assist certain health manpower training institutions, and to extend and improve the program of veterans readjustment appointments in the Federal Government; to extend the VA's authority in Public Law 94–123, as amended, to enter into special-pay agreements with physicians and dentists; to require certain studies to be undertaken; and for other purposes.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

GUAYULE RUBBER DEMONSTRATION AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT ACT OF 1978

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1816) to amend the Public Works and Economic Development Act of 1965 to authorize a program of research, development, and demonstration of guayule rubber production and manufacture as an economic development opportunity for the Southwestern States, which had been reported from the Committee on Environment and Public Works with an amendment to strike all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That this Act may be cited as the "Guayule Rubber Demonstration and Economic Development Act of 1978".

SEC. 2. Title V of the Public Works and Economic Development Act of 1965 is amended by inserting at the end thereof a new section as follows:

"GUAYULE RUBBER DEMONSTRATION PROJECT

"SEC. 518. (a)(1) The Congress recognizes that the development of a natural rubber industry, based on the guayule plant, would convey substantial economic benefits to peoples living in arid regions of the United States. Such an industry would comprise the agricultural production of the guayule plant and the development of processing and manufacturing facilities to extract the rubber and convert it to a usable or salable form.

"(2) The Congress further recognizes that natural rubber is a commodity of vital importance to the economy, defense, and general well-being of the Nation. The United States is totally dependent upon foreign sources for its supplies of natural (Hevea) rubber, which total about eight hundred thousand metric tons per year. Synthetic rubber manufactured from petroleum feedstocks cannot in all cases be substituted for natural rubber.

"(3) The Congress further recognizes that certain plant species of the genus Parthenium (guayule), native to Texas and the Republic of Mexico, are known to contain commercial quantities of extractable rubber. During World War II, through research carried out in the emergency rubber project, the United States demonstrated that guayule rubber is a promising and realistic substitute for Hevea rubber.

"(4) It is the policy of Congress, therefore, to provide for the development and demonstration of economically feasible means of culturing and manufacturing guayule for the extraction of natural rubber and other products to benefit the Nation and promote the economic development of the Southwest.

"(b) As used in this section, the term—

"(1) 'Secretary' means the Secretary of Commerce.

"(2) 'State' means each of the fifty States, the District of Columbia, the Commonweath of Puerto Rico; and Indian tribes as defined in the Indian Self-Determination and Education Assistance Act (P.L. 93–638, 88 Stat. 2203); and

"(3) 'Regional Commissions' refers to the Regional Action Planning Commission established pursuant to this title.

"(c) The Secretary, acting through the Regional Commission, is authorized and directed to initiate and carry out research, development, and demonstration projects to test and demonstrate the economic feasibility of the commercialization of natural rubber from the guayule plant to benefit the Nation and promote economic development of the Southwest. Such activities may include, but shall not be limited to—

"(1) increasing seed stock from wild plants in Texas, the Republic of Mexico, and other areas and borrowing or purchasing seed from other sources;

"(2) breeding and selection programs for the purpose of improving rubber yield, expanding insect and disease resistance, and broadening the ranges of cold and drought tolerance of the guayule plant;

"(3) conducting studies on the planting, cultivation, harvesting, and transporting the crop;

"(4) conducting research and development of extraction and processing techniques;

"(5) economic analysis of the production of guayule, including usable byproducts;

"(6) studying the environmental, social, and economic impacts of the commercial development of guayule in the Southwest;

"(7) evaluating the commercial marketability of guayule rubber; and

"(8) developing pertinent material and records on natural guayule rubber which shall be available to other Federal and State agencies and private persons who are interested in or in or involved in natural rubber research, development, or manufacture.

"(d)(1) There is hereby established a National Advisory Committee to assist the Secretary in carrying out the purposes and activities of this section. The Advisory Committee shall assist the Secretary in—

"(A) developing a plan establishing goals, timetables, and tasks to be undertaken in carrying out the purposes of the section;

"(B) establishing broad policy for implementing the plan carrying out the purposes of the section;

"(C) establishing criteria for evaluating and awarding of contracts for research, development, and demonstration projects; and

"(D) approving expenditures above $250,000.

"(2) The Advisory Committee shall consist of a representative of the Department of Agriculture, the Bureau of Indian Affairs of the Department of the Interior, the National Science Foundation, National Academy of Sciences, the private sector and the Federal Co-Chairmen of the appropriate Regional Action Planning Commissions.

"(e) The Secretary, in consultation with the Secretary of State, is authorized and encouraged to enter into cooperative projects with the Government of Mexico to accomplish appropriate aspects of the research and economic development provided for in this section. Such cooperative projects shall include, but not be limited to, projects to determine the economic feasibility of guayule-based agricultural and manufacturing enterprises.

"(f) The Secretary is authorized to accept financial or other assistance from any State or public agency to aid in carrying out the provisions of this section, and to enter into contracts with respect to such assistance and agreements with any State or public agency for the purpose of demonstrating, transferring, or applying results of research and economic development of guayule rubber.

"(g) In carrying out the provisions of this section, the Secretary, acting through the Regional Commissions, is authorized to—

"(1) make grants to States, educational institutions, associations of educational institutions, and other specific organizations and enter into contracts with such institutions and organizations and with industrial or engineering firms;

"(2) acquire the services of biologists, agronomists, foresters, geneticists, engineers, economists, and other personnel by contract or otherwise;

"(3) utilize the facilities of Federal and State institutions and other scientific laboratories;

"(4) establish and operate necessary facilities and pilot plants to carry out the continuous research, testing, development, and programing necessary to effectuate the purposes of this section;

"(5) acquire secret processes, technical data, invention, patent applications, patents, licenses, land and interests in land (including water rights), plants and facilities, and other property or rights by purchase, license, lease, or donation; and

"(6) foster and participate in regional, national, and international conferences relating to guayule culture and natural rubber manufacture.

"(h) One year after enactment of this section, the Secretary shall provide a report to Congress on the implementation of the program. No later than thirty-six months after enactment of this section, the Secretary shall report to the Congress on the status and findings of the demonstration program and plans for the remaining authorization.

"(i) Each grant, contract, agreement or other arrangement entered into pursuant to this section relating to scientific research shall contain provision governing the disposition of inventions produced thereunder in a manner which will protect the public interest and the person or organization which developed the invention: Provided, however, That nothing in this section shall authorize the Secretary to enter into grants, contracts, agreements, or other arrangements inconsistent with any provisions of law affecting the issuance or use of patents.

"(j) No more than 3 per centum of funds authorized under this section shall be available for administration and management of the program.

"(k) There are authorized to be appropriated $5,000,000 for each of the fiscal years ending September 30, 1979 and September 30, 1980 and $10,000,000 for each of the fiscal years ending September 30, 1981 and September 30, 1982. Funds appropriated under this paragraph shall be available for obligation until the last day of the fiscal year after the year for which such funds are authorized.".

● Mr. DOMENICI. Mr. President, S. 1816 establishes a program of research, development and demonstration of guayule rubber production and manufacture. It proposes a total of $30 million in authorizations over the next 4 years to set up a grant program administered by the Department of Commerce through the Regional Action Planning Commissions.

To assist the Secretary in developing a program and distributing funding, an Advisory Committee is set up consisting of a representative from the Department of Agriculture, the Bureau of Indian Affairs, the National Science Foundation, the National Academy of Sciences, the private sector and the Federal cochairmen of the appropriate Regional Action Planning Commissions.

For a few moments, please let me turn my attention to this strange sounding shrub, guayule. Guayule is a plant grown almost exclusively in the Southwest because of its unique ability to thrive in areas with diminutive water supplies. In the early 20th century, guayule provided 10 percent of the world's rubber production. During WWII, production was increased in this country when Malaysian rubber was cut off. At that time the Government embarked on a large-scale guayule program that employed over 1,000 technicians. However, with the end of the war and the introduction of synthetic rubber produced from oil, the guayule program was terminated.

Consequently, today all of America's rubber is either natural rubber imported from Malaysia, about 800,000 metric tons per year, or rubber made from oil, which is also largely imported. Therefore, the United States is now caught in a vulnerable position because of its dependence on imports to maintain its rubber supply.

It seems clear that the time is now right for a renewed guayule effort, not only because of the Nation's strategic vulnerability, but also because of the rising cost of oil. Moreover, there is expected to be a shortfall of natural rubber of almost 1 million tons by the mid-1980's at a time when the world demand is 3½ million tons of rubber annually.

The Carter administration has recognized this serious situation and accordingly is seeking an international rubber accord with the producing nations to assure high prices, so that production may expand. However, even if such an accord is successful, it will do nothing to diminish the balance of payments and strategic problems associated with being completely dependent on foreign rubber.

A domestic rubber program based on guayule could save the Nation billions of dollars over the next decade. Today, the U.S. imports over $500 million worth of natural rubber annually. Moreover, at this time U.S. stockpiles of rubber are low and it will cost $385 million to replenish them to desired levels.

Guayule provides great potential for the Southwest. Today it grows wild in Texas, and it could be successfully grown in portions of Arizona, California and New Mexico as well. In areas that are facing severe water problems and consequently increasing agricultural costs, guayule production offers these States an agricultural alternative. Specifically, many of the Indian reservations in the Southwest are suited for guayule production, and thus, the natural rubber industry could offer an economic opportunity for chronically depressed reservations where unemployment hovers around 40 percent.

Mr. President, I believe that this is a very valuable program and urge my colleagues to support this bill.●

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95–829), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENERAL STATEMENT

Guayule is a rubber-producing shrub which grows wild in parts of the Southwest and is ideally suited for cultivation in that arid region. Earlier in this century a guayule-based industry was being developed, but interest declined with access to inexpensive synthetics and abundant foreign rubber supplies. As world demand for rubber expands and the price of synthetic rubber continues to rise, interest has been renewed in the use of guayule as a domestic source of natural rubber. The successful commercialization of guayule could mean expanded economic opportunity and jobs in the American Southwest, particularly for the Indian people living in the area.

The average unemployment in the Southwest is about 10 percent, with levels as high as 15 to 20 percent in many places. The latest figures on per capita income illustrate the very low economic levels in the region, with the average below the national median and as low as $3,500 in some counties.

Because of the lagging economic activity of the region, two multistate regional commissions have been established to promote economic growth. The Four Corners Regional Commission and the Southwest Border Commission serve parts of California, Texas, and all of New Mexico and Arizona.

The regional commissions have become interested in the potential economic benefits of a successful guayule program. As part of their ongoing development efforts, both commissions have initiated guayule research activities.

The potential of guayule also comes at a very important time for this chronically water short region. The Southwest has experienced years of drought and declining water resources. Guayule, which requires little rainfall or irrigation, could become a valuable new crop, putting areas of marginal land back into production.

Guayule has been a proven source of rubber in the past. In 1910, it accounted for 10 percent of the world's supply. During World War II, the emergency rubber project was begun when foreign sources were cutoff. Before the program ended, 3 million tons had been produced.

World demand for natural rubber is steadily expanding and a worldwide shortage of supplies is expected by the mid-1980's.

While synthetic rubber provides over two-thirds of all needs, it has not completely replaced the natural variety. Because of its unique properties, natural rubber is preferred for many uses. Tire manufacture is the major use, consuming about 70 percent of all imports. Radial tires for cars used about twice as much natural rubber as biasply tires. Because natural rubber has lower heat buildup, it is used almost exclusively for the manufacture of aircraft tires.

A second occurrence which has altered the use of synthetics is the sharp increase in petroleum costs, the base for synthetic rubber.

There is also a strategic and trade importance to guayule. The United States is wholly dependent on foreign sources for all the natural rubber used in this country including all strategic and defense stockpile requirements. This country is importing 800,000 metric tons of natural rubber a year. At current value, this represents a cost of $500 million a year.

The stockpile reserves of natural rubber are very low at the present time and plans are underway to replenish them. The stockpile goal is 513,000 long tons but current inventory is only about 121,000 long tons.

The committee believes that the Department of Commerce is the appropriate Department to conduct the demonstration program authorized by the reported bill. Several of the agencies and programs within the Department of Commerce are specifically designed to promote and assist economic opportunity and job development in economically depressed areas. In addition, the Department of Commerce is the principal Federal agency for business development.

Representatives of several Federal departments presented testimony during the committee hearing. There was general agreement on the need for a federally supported demonstration program to test the potential of guayule development.

The witness from the National Academy of Sciences was the Director of the Academy's 1977 report on guayule. As he pointed out, the first recommendation of the report was that:

"The U.S. Government should initiate a program of research and development leading to commercialization of the guayule plant."

The Federal Cochairman of the Four Corners Regional Commission testified on the economic development benefits of a natural rubber program to the Southwest. The Regional Commission, which is responsible for promoting economic development in the area, has already undertaken several guayule projects.

The witness from the Bureau of Indian Affairs in the Department of Interior supported the need for a Federal program and discussed the benefits of such development to the Indian tribes of the area.

The representative of the Federal Preparedness Administration testified on the strategic importance of a domestic rubber industry. In prepared remarks the witness pointed out that:

"From the standpoint of the strategic and critical materials stockpile, the prospect of decreased foreign dependency for natural rubber as implied by the success of domestic development of guayule could be very significant. In a time of national emergency natural rubber will be critical both for direct military applications and for the industrial mobilization base in support of the national defense. During such a period, it is possible that many if not all foreign sources will not be accessible. Natural rubber thus emerges as one of the most important materials required for the restructuring of the stockpile."

The witness for the Department of Agriculture concurred in the need for Federal support of guayule and discussed past and current Department research efforts. It is the Department's position that Agriculture should be the lead agency in any Federal program.

The committee recognizes that several Federal agencies are presently involved in guayule development. The bill would permit each to pursue its own research programs. S. 1816 as amended is designed to coordinate these ongoing activities so that the commercial feasibility of guayule can be tested and demonstrated in the shortest time possible. Under the bill, the Department of Agriculture could continue its mandate to carry out basic plant research, one of the elements of the overall program.

To strengthen the involvement of other departments interested in the development of guayule, the committee added a requirement for an Interagency Advisory Committee.

COST OF LEGISLATION

The bill authorizes $30 million over 4 fiscal years, beginning October 1, 1978: $5 million for fiscal year 1979; $5 million for fiscal year 1980; $10 million for fiscal year 1981; and $10 million for fiscal year 1982. Any unused authorization shall remain available for 1 year after the year for which it was initially authorized.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ENVIRONMENTAL RESEARCH, DEVELOPMENT, AND DEMONSTRATION AUTHORIZATION ACT OF 1979

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 11302) to authorize appropriations for environmental research, development, and demonstrations for the fiscal year 1979, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Environment and Public Works with amendments as follows:

On page 2, beginning with line 3, strike through and including page 4, line 4, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(1) $80,865,000 for water quality activities authorized under the Federal Water Pollution Control Act of which—

(A) $24,001,000 is for the Health and Ecological Effects program;

(B) $10,875,000 is for the Industrial Processes program;

(C) $5,539,000 is for the Monitoring and Technical Support program;

(D) $10,940,000 is for the Public Sector Activities program; and

(E) $29,510,000 is for the Energy program.

(2) $11,998,000 for activities authorized under the Federal Insecticide, Fungicide, and Rodenticide Act of which—

(A) $10,798,000 is for the Health and Ecological Effects program; and

(B) $1,200,000 is for the Industrial Processes program.

(3) $16,150,000 for water supply activities authorized under the Safe Drinking Water Act in the Public Sector Activities program.

(4) $11,504,000 for toxic substance control activities authorized under the Toxic Substances Control Act of which—

(A) $6,864,000 is for the Health and Ecological Effects program;

(B) $1,440,000 is for the Industrial Processes program; and

(C) $3,200,000 is for the Monitoring and Technical Support program.

(5) $1,930,000 for radiation activities authorized under the Public Health Act, in the Health and Ecological Effects program.

(6) $144,952,000 for air quality activities authorized under the Clean Air Act of which—

(A) $37,414,000 is for the Health and Ecological Effects program;

(B) $5,000,000 is for the Industrial Processes program;

(C) $16,283,000 is for the Monitoring and Technical Support program; and

(D) $86,255,000 is for the Energy program.

(7) $11,595,000 for solid waste activities authorized under the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act in the Public Sector Activities program.

(8) $4,000,000 for noise control activities authorized under the Noise Control Act of which—

(A) $2,000,000 is for the Health and Ecological Effects program; and

(B) $2,000,000 is for the Industrial Processes program.

(9) $34,757,000 for intermedia activities, of which—

(A) $5,972,000 is for the Health and Ecological Effects program;

(B) $25,000 is for the Public Sector Activities program;

(C) $14,900,000 is for the Monitoring and Technical Support program; and

(D) $13,860,000 is for the Anticipatory Research program.

On page 7, beginning with line 17, insert the following:

(d) Energy-related environmental control projects which were authorized to be administered by the Environmental Protection Agency in fiscal year 1978 shall not be transferred administratively or through budget amendment to the Department of Energy, nor shall funding for the Environmental Protection Agency for such projects under this Act be reduced as a result of any present or proposed administrative or budget transfer.

On page 8, 6, strike "$10,000,000" and insert "$7,000,000";

On page 9, beginning with line 16, insert the following:

(d)(1) There is authorized to be appropriated to the Environmental Protection Agency, for grants to qualified citizens groups in State and regions, $3,000,000.

(2) Grants under this subsection may be made for the purpose of supporting and encouraging participation by qualified citizens groups in determining how scientific, technological, and social trends and changes affect the future environment and quality of life of an area, and for setting goals and identifying measures of improvement.

(3) The term "citizens group" shall mean a nonprofit organization of citizens having an area-based focus, which can demonstrate a prior record of interest and involvement in goal-setting exercises and studies concerned with improving the quality of life, including plans to identify, protect, and enhance significant natural and cultural resources and the environment.

(4) A citizens group shall be eligible for assistance only if certified by the Governor as a bona-fide organization entitled to receive Federal assistance to pursue the aims of this program. The group shall further demonstrate its capacity to employ usefully the funds for the purposes of this program.

(5) After an initial application for assistance under this section has been approved, the Administrator may make grants on an annual basis, on condition that the applicant submits to the Administrator annually—

(A) an evaluation of the progress made during the previous year in meeting the objectives for which the grant was made;

(B) a description of any changes in the objectives of the activities; and

(C) a description of the proposed activities for the succeeding one year period.

(6) A grant made under this program shall not exceed 75 per centum of the estimated cost of the project or program for which the grant is made, and no group shall receive more than $50,000 in any one year.

On page 12, beginning with line 10, insert the following:

RESEARCH COORDINATION

SEC. 6. (a)(1) The Administrator of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration shall establish and act as chairman of a Coordinating Committee for the purpose of preparing, in consultation with the Chairman of the Council on Environmental Quality, the comprehensive five-year plan (hereinafter referred to in this Act as the "plan") relating to Federal ocean pollution research and development and monitoring called for under the National Ocean Pollution Research and Development and Monitoring Planning Act of 1978 (Public Law 95-273). Such coordinating committee shall also perform the functions required under section 4(b)(4) of that Act.

(2) Members of the Coordinating Committee shall include the appropriate official responsible for the relevant research efforts of each of the following agencies:

(A) the Environmental Protection Agency;

(B) the Department of Interior;

(C) the Office of Science and Technology Policy in the Executive Office of the President;

(D) the National Science Foundation; and

(E) the appropriate officials responsible for the relevant research efforts of such other agencies carrying out related efforts as the Administrator for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration shall designate. A representative of the Department of State shall sit on the Coordinating Committee to encourage and facilitate international coordination.

(3) The Administrator of the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration may request a report from any Federal agency for the purpose of determining if that agency should sit on the Coordinating Committee.

(4) Within six months after the date of enactment of this section, the Committee shall report to the Committee on Science and Technology of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Environment and Public Works of the Senate on its progress toward development of the comprehensive plan.

(b) In preparing such plan and coordinating such ocean pollution research and development and monitoring, priority shall be given to research and monitoring in support of the regulatory program of the Environmental Protection Agency and other Federal agencies with regulatory responsibilities applicable to the marine environmental.

On page 14, line 5, strike "6" and insert "7";

On page 15, beginning with line 12, insert the following:

(d) For all programs in this section, the Administrator shall place special emphasis on providing opportunities for education and training of women and minority groups.

On page 15, line 16, strike "7" and insert "8";

On page 16, line 8, after "Act" insert a comma and "where such project involves direct human consumption of treated wastewater";

On page 16, line 14, after "(1)" insert "for a project which involves direct human consumption of treated wastewater";

On page 18, line 2, strike "$25,000,000" and insert "$15,000,000".

The committee amendments were agreed to.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1324

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment

by Mr. CULVER and ask that it be stated by the clerk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from West Virginia (Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD) for Mr. CULVER, proposes unprinted amendment numbered 1324.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 9, line 17, inserting after "Agency," the phrase "to be available for obligation after September 30, 1978,".

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95–877), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURPOSE

The purpose of the bill is to extend through fiscal year 1979 the authorization for appropriations for the environmental research and development program conducted by the Environmental Protection Agency.

GENERAL STATEMENT

H.R. 11302 passed the House of Representatives on April 27, 1978, after having been reported favorably by the Committee on Science and Technology. As passed by the House, H.R. 11302 authorized $431 million compared with $324 million requested by the President to Congress. The Subcommittee on Resource Protection held a hearing February 1, 1978, on the fiscal year 1979 budget for research and development in the Environmental Protection Agency submitted by the President. The hearing and subsequent analyses by the Committee revealed certain inadequacies in the administration request. The committee prepared a budget which it felt to be responsive to the needs of the research program of the Environmental Protection Agency, and the authorizations contained in the bill as reported by the committee are in the nature of a substitute for the equivalent section of the House-passed act.

The Subcommittee on Resource Protection on May 2, 1978, amended the House-passed bill and ordered it reported to the full committee. H.R. 11302, as amended, was ordered reported to the Senate on May 5, 1978, by a voice vote of the full Committee on Environment and Public Works.

As amended and reported, the bill has the following major provisions:

1. It authorizes $340 million for research and development in the Environmental Protection Agency's regular research programs.

2. It has several additional authorizations:

a. $7 million for grants to support long-term research;

b. $15 million to demonstrate recycling and reuse of waste water;

c. $3 million to complete the Gulf Coast Air Study authorized in the Clean Air Act Amendments of 1977;

d. $3 million for grants to support citizens groups engaged in certain studies;

e. $1 million for a study of the coordination and application of environmental research in the Federal Government; and

f. $5 million for environmental research at the National Bureau of Standards.

3. It contains language added by the committee to address two issues of concern:

a. The bill expressly prohibits the proposed transfer of research on energy-related pollution control technologies from the Environmental Protection Agency to the Department of Energy; and

b. The committee has added a provision to establish a specific mechanism for future coordination of Federal research on ocean pollution.

4. It encourages the Agency to respond to increasing demands on its staff by training and education to meet those demands. The committee added a provision which gives special emphasis to development of opportunities for women and minority groups.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

GIFTS OR DEVICES OF PROPERTY FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

The bill (S. 2951) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to accept and administer on behalf of the United States gifts or devices of real and personal property for the benefit of the Department of Agriculture or any of its programs, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to accept, receive, hold, utilize, and administer on behalf of the United States gifts, bequests, or devises of real and personal property made for the benefit of the United States Department of Agriculture or for the carrying out of any of its functions. For the purposes of the Federal income, estate, and gift tax laws, property accepted under the authority of this Act shall be considered as a gift, bequest, or devise to the United States. Any gift of money accepted pursuant to the authority granted in this Act, or the net proceeds from the liquidation of any property so accepted, or the proceeds of any insurance on any gift property not used for its restoration shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States for credit to a separate fund and shall be disbursed upon order of the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture may promulgate regulations to carry out the provisions of this Act.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ARREST OF MATERIAL WITNESSES

The bill (S. 2512) to provide explicit authority for the arrest of material witnesses, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 1326 of title 23, District of Columbia Code, is amended—

(a) by inserting in the title thereof "Arrest and" imediately before "release of material witnesses"; and

(b) by inserting in the first sentence thereof, immediately after "judicial officer", the following: "may order the arrest of such witness and".

SEC. 2. The item relating to District of Columbia Code, section 23–1326 in the table of contents for subchapter II of chapter 13 of title 23, District of Columbia Code, is amended to read as follows:

"23–1326. Arrest and release of material witnesses."

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95–894), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURPOSE

The purpose of the bill is to provide explicit authority in the District of Columbia for the arrest of witnesses whose testimony is material to any criminal proceeding.

BACKGROUND

Section 602(a)(9) of the District of Columbia Self-Government and Governmental Reorganization Act of 1973 (the Home Rule Act) reserves sole authority in the Congress of the United States to enact any act with respect to Title 23 (relating to criminal procedure) of the District of Columbia Code. Title 23, section 1326 contains the authority to detain, or release upon conditions imposed pursuant to section 1321, witnesses whose testimony is material to a criminal proceeding. This is the proper section in which to include the authority to arrest such witnesses.

NEED FOR LEGISLATION AND LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

This legislation, which would plug what is apparently an unintentional gap in the law, was requested by Attorney General Griffin B. Bell. It appears that the power to arrest a material witness was explicitly provided for by Federal statute from 1789 to 1948. See act of September 24, 1789, ch. 20, § 33, 1 Stat. 91; act of August 8, 1846, ch. §7, 9 Stat. 73; 28 U.S.C. §§ 657, 659 (1925). However, this explicit authority was apparently dropped by inadvertence from title 18, United States Code, when Congress enacted Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 46(b). See act of June 25, 1948, Public Law No. 772, ch. 645, § 21, 62 Stat. 862. At present, the applicable Federal and District of Columbia statutes allow for the release on conditions of a material witness who is detained in a criminal proceeding. However, there is no rule or statutory provision explicitly permitting the arrest of a material witness. See, 18 U.S.C. § 1326, and D.C. Superior Court Criminal Rule 46(a)(6).

The Ninth Circuit of Appeals took note of this problem and held that "a grant of power to arrest material witnesses can fairly be inferred from rule 46(b) and from section 3149 as well." Bacon v. United States, 449 F. 2d 933, 937 (9th Cir. 1971); see also United States v. Anfield, 539 F. 2d 674, 677 (9th Cir. 1976). However, the Bacon decision candidly acknowledged that the effect of rule 46(b) on the superseded provisions which had explicitly authorized the arrest of material witnesses "does not clearly emerge from the statutory history" 449 F. 2d at 938. In order to obviate this confusion with respect to Federal law, the Subcommittee on Criminal Law and Procedure of the Senate Judiciary Committee has reported out the proposed revisions of the Federal Criminal Code, S. 1437, with an amendment which would specifically authorize the arrest of a material witness. See § 3505, p. 240, I. 29 of committee print. A similar statutory amendment is needed to clarify the law in the District of Columbia. Accordingly, the Committe has developed the legislative proposal which would amend section 1326 of title 23, D.C. Code, so as to provide explicit authority for the arrest of material witnesses. Without such an amendment, law enforcement authorities in the District of Columbia will be placed in a different position if Superior Court judges in future cases raise the question as to what authority they have to issue arrest warrants for material witnesses. The ninth circuit's analysis of this issue may not persuade a judge in a given case that it is proper for him to issue an arrest warrant and the ends of justice may be thwarted by this gap in the law.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA PRETRIAL SERVICES AGENCY

The bill (S. 2556) to change the name of the District of Columbia Bail Agency, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

S. 2556

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 1301 of title 23, D.C. Code, is amended by deleting "District of Columbia Bail Agency" and inserting in lieu thereof "District of Columbia Pretrial Services Agency".

SEC. 2. Any law, rule, regulation, documents or record of the United States in which reference is made to the District of Columbia Bail Agency referred to in the first section of this Act shall be deemed to be a reference to the District of Columbia Pretrial Service Agency.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95–895), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURPOSE

The purpose of the bill is to change the name of the District of Columbia Bail Agency to the Pretrial Services Agency, which title more accurately describes its function.

BACKGROUND

Section 602(a)(9) of the District of Columbia Self-Government and Governmental Reorganization Act of 1973 (the Home Rule Act) reserves sole authority in the Congress of the United States to enact any act with respect to title 23 (relating to criminal procedure) of the District of Columbia Code. Title 23, section 1301, of the code contains the name and purpose of the Agency.

NEED FOR LEGISLATION

This legislation was requested by the present Director of the District of Columbia Bail Agency. At a hearing before the Subcommittee on Governmental Efficiency and the District of Columbia early this year, Mr. Beaudin asked that his Agency's name be changed to the District of Columbia Pretrial Service Agency. He explained that, in 1971, when the Bail Agency's statute was amended, concern for its growth, appropriate function, and role in the system precluded attention on the subtle and seemingly insignificant matter of its name.

The character of the Agency's services and its functions have evolved, over the years, to keep in step with the changing methods of dealing with criminal defendants prior to trial. Money bond, or bail, is no longer the only way of assuring the attendance of persons at their trials. Personal recognizance, third-party custody, and pretrial detention are only a few of the alternatives available to the court today. The research and information provided by the Agency have been expanded and refined to meet the needs of District of Columbia Superior Court judges.

In addition, the present name of the Agency has caused confusion on the part of the public and some employees in the criminal justice system as to the services it offers.

Finally, in title 18, section 3152, et seq., of the United States Code, Congress created 10 pilot agencies in 10 Federal districts modeled after the District of Columbia Bail Agency. Each of these organizations is to be named "Pretrial Services Agency." This bill would make the District of Columbia organizational title consistent with those other, identical agencies, as well as providing a more accurate and less confusing appellation.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AUTHORIZATION TO FILE REPORTS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Budget Committee may have until midnight tonight to file reports.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SIKES ACT AMENDMENTS OF 1978

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Environment and Public Works be discharged from further consideration of H.R. 10882 and that the Senate proceed to its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the committee is discharged from further consideration of H.R. 10882.

The bill will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A bill (H.R. 10882), an act to authorize appropriatons to carry out conservation programs on military reservations and on public lands during fiscal years 1979, 1980, and 1981.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move that all after the enacting clause be stricken and the text of S. 2987, as passed yesterday, be inserted in lieu thereof and that H.R. 10882, as so amended, be considered as having been read a third time, passed, and a motion to reconsider tabled.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a statement on behalf of Senator WALLOP appear in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR WALLOP

Recently I introduced jointly with Senator Culver a bill to reauthorize appropriations for the Sikes Act. The legislation passed the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee unanimously, and I hope the Senate will act favorably on H.R. 10882 today as well.

Last year the Resource Protection Subcommittee of the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee held oversight hearings to decide if the Sikes Act should be reauthorized, and to examine the need for changes in the law. Those hearings pointed out a number of problems associated with this law, and evinced great support for reauthorization of the law by state game and fish agencies and conservationists. The bill being considered today should rectify some of the problems with its implementation, and serve notice to federal agencies to implement the indicated conservation programs.

In 1960 Congress passed the Sikes Act to provide for fish and wildlife conservation programs on military lands run by the Department of Defense. Today DOD controls some 26 million acres, and has an important role in fish and wildlife management on them.

In 1974 Congress moved to include U.S. Forest Service lands and Bureau of Land Management Lands under the law. The amendment provided specific direction for those agencies to develop federal/state cooperative management agreements for wildlife management. Again, since states traditionally have managed wildlife while federal agencies manage habitat, a cooperative approach is essential.

During hearings on this bill it became apparent that the full fish and wildlife and recreation potential on military lands has not been realized. This is probably because the administration has never requested any funds for DOD or the Secretary of the Interior to carry out their duties under the Sikes Act on these lands. Interior has been able to give some fish and wildlife management advice to DOD, but funds have been insufficient. Because DOD never requested or consequently received Sikes Act funds, it has been relying on hunting and fishing fee revenues for wildlife and creation opportunities on military bases. Although these fees can be sizeable, they fall short of what is needed. According to a recent GAO report, there is an estimated $2 million backlog in unfunded fish and wildlife projects on these bases. While some bases have good programs, most fall short of meeting their potential in these areas, and the American public could benefit greatly from increased wildlife and recreation opportunities on these bases.

State game and fish agencies testified that many states have developed cooperative management plans with the Forest Service and BLM, but that no federal funds had ever been requested or provided under the Sikes Act. Fish and wildlife management programs on public lands have historically been underfunded despite federal law recognizing the need to manage these resources. The agencies have worked hard writing acceptible management plans in cooperation with the Forest Service and BLM, but many expressed dismay over inadequate funding requests and appropriations under the Sikes Act. Under other authorities the BLM received $6.4 million for fish and wildlife research and management for more than 450 million acres of public lands; while the Forest Service received $34.6 million for 187 acres. At the time of our hearing 40 states had signed cooperative management agreements with the Forest Service at an estimated cost of $30 million, for the first year, while 11 states had completed 52 habitat management plans on BLM lands at an estimated cost of $10 million.

H.R. 10882 would provide $1.5 million annually for DOD and $4.5 million for the Department of Interior for Sikes Act implementation on military lands. The Department of Interior is authorized $10 million in 1978 and $15 million in 1980 for the BLM, while the Department of Agriculture is authorized $35 million in 1979 and $40 million in 1980 for the Forest Service. Agencies would have to report back to the Environment and Public Works Committee whenever its appropriations are less than those authorized under this Act, and are directed to coordinate the directives of the Sikes Act with other federal land management efforts. The agencies have stated they recognize the importance of the Sikes Act and are in full agreement with the need for cooperative federal/state wildlife programs.

As use pressures on federal lands grow inevitably, we will need to provide more and better recreation opportunities for people and wildlife management. The Sikes Act lets the states be full partners in these efforts, and with effective implementation, should prove a boon to good planning and management. I hope Congress recognizes this law and insures that it is carried out in full measure in the future.

REAUTHORIZING THE SIKES ACT

● Mr. CULVER. Mr. President, H.R. 10882, extends the authorization for appropriations under the Sikes act for 2 years.

The Sikes act, first enacted by Congress in 1960, authorized the Secretary of Defense to join with the Secretary of the Interior and appropriate State conservation agencies in conducting fish and wildlife conservation and public recreation programs on over 25 million acres of military lands located throughout the Nation. In 1974, Congress significantly expanded the scope of this law by directing the Secretaries of Agriculture and the Interior to develop similar Federal-State cooperative arrangements for conservation plans on lands under the jurisdiction of the Forest Service, the Bureau of Land Management (BLM), the National Aeronautics and Space Administration, and the Department of Energy. This expanded coverage included specific requirements for improvement of wildlife habitat, range rehabilitation, and protection of endangered species.

The act is significant because it, for the first time, gave the States an equal partnership with the Federal Government in developing recreational and conservation programs on Federal lands. In addition, it encouraged the comprehensive management of these resources on an ecosystem rather than a species-by-species basis.

Some progress has been made in the implementation of this important program. For instance, approximately 237 agreements covering 19 million acres of military lands have been concluded between the Defense Department, the Fish and Wildlife Service, and those States in which these lands are located. In addition, the Bureau of Land Management has negotiated agreements with 11 Western States and is currently instituting over 20 area-specific management plans for the protection of fish and wildlife. Prior to 1974, the Forest Service had negotiated cooperative agreements with over 40 States and subsequently has developed 36 new plans.

Nonetheless, testimony received during hearings by the Subcommittee on Resource Protection indicates that implementation of the Sikes Act has fallen far short of its potential and of congressional expectation. For instance, according to an August 1977 report by the General Accounting Office, "significant recreation opportunities may be lost, because neither Defense nor Interior has systematically attempted to identify where such recreational opportunities exist or where the need for such opportunity is greatest." Similarly, during hearings last November by the Resource Protection Subcommittee, witnesses from State fish and wildlife agencies and national conservation organizations criticized the lack of progress by the Forest Service and the Bureau of Land Management in developing these programs.

While Federal land management agencies have testified that lack of funds has been the major obstacle to implementation of the Sikes Act program, they have not requested, nor has the Office of Management and Budget approved, adequate funds in the budget process for activities under the Sikes Act.

In order to address this situation, a provision of H.R. 10882 requires that, in the event funds requested by an agency under the law are less than those authorized, the Secretary shall specifically set forth reasons for requesting the lesser amount. By justifying funding requests in this manner, the responsible agencies will have to fully discuss the needs of the program.

H.R. 10882 authorizes $1.5 million to the Secretary of Defense and $4.5 million to the Secretary of the Interior annually for cooperative fish and wildlife conservation and public recreational programs on military lands. In addition, a total of $25 million is provided for cooperative programs on BLM lands, and $75 million for programs on Forest Service lands. These are the amounts that have been identified by the Federal and State agencies involved as the level of funding necessary to carry out their cooperative resource management activities over the next 2 years.

While implementation of the Sikes Act program has been slow, I am greatly encouraged by assurances I have received from these Federal agencies that their efforts will be improved.

Mr. President, the Sikes Act is a vitally important conservation program which has the strong support of the States and the conservation community. I urge my colleagues to approve legislation reauthorizing funding for this program.●

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that S. 2987 be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator ask that passage be vitiated?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. And that passage of the bill be vitiated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The passage is vitiated and the bill is indefinitely postponed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ORDER FOR TECHNICAL AND CLERICAL CORRECTIONS IN ENGROSSMENT OF S. 2704

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to make technical and clerical corrections in the engrossment of S. 2704.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

JOINT REFERRAL

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the message from the House of Representatives on H.R. 1257 be jointly referred to the Committees on Commerce and Foreign Relations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

APPOINTMENTS BY THE VICE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair on behalf of the Vice President appoints the following Senators to attend the Mexico-United States Interparliamentary Conference to be held in Washington, D.C., June 5–10, 1978: The Senator from North Carolina (Mr. MORGAN), the Senator from Maryland (Mr. SARBANES), the Senator from Arizona (Mr. DECONCINI), the Senator from New York (Mr. JAVITS), the Senator from Texas (Mr. TOWER), and the Senator from Illinois (Mr. PERCY).

SPECIAL ORDERS FOR MONDAY, JUNE 5, 1978

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on Monday, June 5, after the two leaders or their designees have been recognized under the standing order, Mr. HELMS be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes; and that, following the recognition of Mr. HELMS, the Senate resume its consideration of the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL MONDAY, JUNE 5, 1978

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, hoping that as many Senators as can will avail themselves of the opportunity to visit the land of iridescent sunset and viridescent hills, West Virginia, which is almost heaven, I move that the Senate, in accordance with the provisions of the concurrent resolution that was passed, House Concurrent Resolution 634, stand in recess until the hour of 12 o'clock noon on the day of Monday, June 5, 1978.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BAYH). Did the Senator say West Virginia or Indiana?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. West Virginia.

The motion was agreed to; and at 2:36 p.m., the Senate recessed until Monday, June 5, 1978, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

IN PRAISE OF PENN SOUTH RESIDENTS

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I am always pleased to lend my support and congratulations to citizens who engage in extraordinary public-spirited action. An outstanding recent example of this took place last February when Penn South Homes, a middle-income cooperative in the Chelsea neighborhood of Manhattan, paid the city of New York $225,000 in real estate taxes. Because these taxes were not due until July 1978, their early payment enabled the city to avoid some of the borrowing and accompanying interest charges it would have incurred had the residents of Penn South not shown their commitment to helping the city cope with its financial crisis. In order to make this early payment for the third consecutive year, over 40 percent of Penn South's tenants paid their July rent last January, a significant personal financial sacrifice, especially for the many senior citizens who live there.

In appreciation of this exemplary action, the Council of the City of New York passed a resolution commending the residents of Penn South. In recognition of their achievement, I would like to include this resolution as part of the official record as an expression of my support and congratulations.

THE COUNCIL

MARCH 14, 1978.

RES. NO. 147

Resolution of Commendation in Recognition of the Public Spirited Action, for the Third Consecutive Year, by the Co-operators of the Penn South Houses in Manhattan of Prepaying Their July Real Estate Taxes and Helping the City by Waiving the 8 Per Cent Discount.

By Council Member Greitzer; also Council Members Codd, Friedlander, Messinger, Michaels, Ryan, Trichter and Stern—

Whereas, The co-operators of Penn South Houses, a middle income co-operative in the Chelsea neighborhood of Manhattan, presented The City of New York with a check for $225,000 on February 24th in prepayment of real estate taxes not due until July 1978 thereby enabling the City to avoid some of the exorbitant interest it has had to pay to borrow money; and

Whereas, The co-operators of Penn South showed an especially praise worthy deepening of their commitment in that this year the payment is the record amount of $225,000 in comparison to $212,000 in 1977 and $200,000 in 1976; and

Whereas, The residents, once again, further saved the City over $16,000 directly by waiving the 8 per cent discount that is offered to owners who prepay their taxes; and

Whereas, Over 40 per cent of the tenants in this middle income co-operative of 2,800 families paid their July rent in January and personally sacrified the interest they could have gotten by keeping this money in their own bank accounts or by claiming the 8 per cent discount; and to develop similar programs; now, , therefore,

Whereas, Senior citizens comprise a very high percentage of Penn South's 6,000 residents including many retired garment industry workers, teachers and City employees, who are, therefore, hard pressed to make such a sacrifice for New York City; and

Whereas, The residents are doing this for the third year in recognition of the continuing financing crisis; and

Whereas, The initiative and persistence shown in finding ways for individuals to pitch in and help the City is a hopeful sign for the survival of the City, and its is hoped that other co-operatives can be encouraged to develop similar programs; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Council of The City of New York once again extend its highest commendation to the co-operators of Penn South Houses, and urges the Housing and Development Administration to cite this program in a letter to all co-operatives in New York City requesting that they investigate such a program.

CONGRATULATIONS TO NATIONAL DECA STAFF

HON. LARRY PRESSLER

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. Speaker, as you well know, vocational education has grown tremendously over the years since passage of the Smith-Hughes Act of 1917. As a result of this growth there are seven service areas recognized today within vocational education. One of these service areas is distributive education which is designed to prepare young men and women to enter the many careers in the fields of marketing, merchandising, and management. A vitally important part of the makeup of distributive education is DECA—Distributive Education Clubs of America.

DECA provides unique opportunities for students enrolled in distributive education programs to gain individual skills and knowledges for successful entrance into occupations of their choice. Through quality services of DECA, students also learn to contribute and assume civic responsibilities within their community and Nation, develop social skills allowing adaptiveness, and learn leadership skills which contribute successfully to the ideals of a free enterprise system which is so important to the economic growth and stability of our Nation.

Just a short time ago, I experienced the opportunity to participate in the DECA National Career Development Conference held in Washington, D.C. This conference provided the opportunity for approximately 8,000 members, advisors, and guests to witness the quality experiences provided students of distributive education programs by DECA activities. The conference was organized into two parts—A Junior Collegiate Career Development Conference of May 1–5, 1978 and a High School Career Development Conference held on May 7–12, 1978.

The successful planning and administration of these events were conducted by individuals within the national DECA office who worked extremely hard to bring together people from across the Nation. A task of this magnitude, indeed requires dedication and it is with tremendous pride that I direct the attention of my colleagues to the DECA staff who made the National Career Development Conference a rewarding experience of the highest quality for the 8,000 persons in attendance. These outstanding individuals have exemplified the kind of dedication and competence which is so essential to serve the needs of thousands of persons through the services of vocational education.

Each staff member of DECA is worthy of special recognition and I would like to acknowledge their good work by extending my congratulations and thanks for a job well done to the following people:

Mr. Harry Applegate.—Is the executive director of DECA and is responsible for overseeing and administrating the total program nationwide. Harry's capable leadership has contributed largely to the impressive growth of DECA since he first joined the staff in 1955. At that time, DECA clubs located in 21 States involved a total membership of 19,000. Today DECA's membership of 200,000 is representative of 50 States and 4 territories.

Mr. A. Dale Clark.—Is the DECA associate director who serves as the conference manager to coordinate all efforts of the conference which includes responsibilities for housing, feeding, transportation, and contracting services. Mr. Clark is supported by administrative secretary, Mrs. Becky Grim.

Ms. Lynne Rhudy.—Is the director of competitive events who is responsible for scheduling all competitive events, selecting competition sites, securing around 700 persons to serve as national judges, computerizing all student participants including their rating scales for each event, and coordinating the selection of eight finalists in each of DECA's 28 events. Ms. Rhudy is supported by Ms. Doreen Farina and Ms. Nancy Cherry plus 12 selected volunteers.

Mr. David Green.—Is the director of program services who is responsible for all the national officer scheduling, the booking, and coordination of all meetings, general sessions, workshops, and other meetings including physical arrangements and visual aid needs of each meeting, plus ordering trophies and recognition for student events. He is supported by Mrs. Tammy Macaraeg and Mrs. Mary Corvin.

Ms. Manera Constantine.—Is the director of professional services. She is the DECA liaison for the DECA Junior Collegiate Division, DECA National Advisory Board, DECA Congressional Advisory Board and Professional Division of DECA. She is responsible for coordination of workshops, and meetings of each of these groups. She is supported by Ms. Marilyn Grubisich.

Ms. Linda Kyles—Is the director of publications and is responsible for all preconference printing, regular publications, exhibit manager for the conference, CDC publicity and public relations, conference photo and visual coverage and press releases for hometown coverage of winners and other recognition at the CDC. She is supported by Ms. Micki Kurelich and Mrs. Eva Ditto.

Mr. Loris C. Lorenzi—Is the DECA regional director who works primarily with the DECA North Atlantic Region. During the CDC, Mr. Lorenzi coordinates activities for tours, busing, ticket sales, and special events. Ms. Debra Miller provides supportive services.

Mrs. Dorothy Wolf and Mrs. Wanda Lukasik—Remained at the National DECA Center to coordinate and arrange tours for hundreds of DECA members and advisors who were seeing their national home for the first time. Mrs. Wolf is the national DECA financial secretary and Mrs. Lukasik is the national DECA receptionist.

As chairman of DECA's Congressional Advisory Board this past year, I have witnessed the success of DECA efforts. Over 90 percent of the distributive education secondary and post secondary graduates are either employed or are in pursuit of education and training. I believe this speaks well for the efforts of those who work toward serving individual needs through vocational education services.●

TRIBUTE TO THE MIA'S

HON. BARBARA A. MIKULSKI

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, in honor of Memorial Day, I would like to take this opportunity to reflect about the tributes that we pay on that day. On Memorial Day we honor those men and women who gave their lives so that we may be free today.

As we honor our dead this Memorial Day, let us also remember those who suffer daily because a member of their family is still listed as "missing in action" in Southeast Asia. It has been over 3 years since the United States has fully withdrawn from Vietnam, and still we are unable to fully account for those who are missing in action. There are about 2,400 who are unaccounted for, with over 30 coming from my home State of Maryland. It is an unfair toll that is being exacted from those families who still are not certain of the fate of their loved ones who served our Nation in Southeast Asia.

On May 8, the House of Representatives passed House Concurrent Resolution 583, which concerns those who remain abong the unaccounted. The resolution was passed overwhelmingly—by a vote of 369 to 0. It expresses the sense of Congress that the President should instruct the Secretary of State to request the Secretary General of the United Nations to work through UN agencies to secure a full accounting of Americans missing in Southeast Asia. Present efforts to secure an accounting are not productive. I can only be hopeful that President Carter will work diligently to resolve this heart-wrenching problem.

Next year when we celebrate Memorial Day, I hope that it will be a true celebration—when we can move one step closer to healing the wounds left by our involvement in Vietnam, by knowing the fate of those who, this Memorial Day, are unaccounted for.●

CLERK-HIRE "SLOT" RESOLUTION

HON. JOHN BRECKINRIDGE

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, with the cosponsorship of 123 Members, I have introduced a resolution which addresses a problem that most Members must face.

As chairman of the Congressional Rural Caucus, a bipartisan ad hoc group of Members of Congress—and as a member of the Democratic Study Group, Democratic Research Organization, Congressional Clearinghouse on the Future, and the Environmental Study Conference—I routinely participate in voluntary "pooling" arrangements to secure staff for such ad hoc House-related, legislative support organizations. In this arrangement several Members "pool" clerk-hire funds together to secure staff members to process legislative mail, handle specialized projects, and provide common legislative services including research; the preparation of bibliographies, papers, and publications; clearinghouse facilities, and other routine legislative functions.

House Administration Committee rules are presently so interpreted as to require that, when two or more Members carry the same person on their clerk-hire allowance during any given month, such employee must be charged against all Members so contributing to such staffers—because of the constraints of the 18 slot limitation—which, again, we have imposed upon ourselves. The House Administration Committee rules work to the detriment and the frustration of the discharge of the duties of all Members, and of all such ad hoc Members' sponsored and supported legislative groups. The resolution I have introduced will contribute significantly to a resolution of this problem.

My resolution provides simply that only one slot will be utilized under such pooling arrangements—with the Member donating his slot advising the Finance Office of such designation.

If my resolution is adopted (its genesis to be found in the 1977 Obey Commission on Administrative Review Report), it would not only increase the efficiency of our respective office operations, including legislative research and writing, but it would also provide a fair and equitable approach to the counting of clerk-hire slots—a system which now is a wholly unworkable and unreal one. It appears to me as an absurdity that we as colleagues—responsible both in the criminal sanctions of the land and accountable to our constituents—cannot jointly do—under the same limitations as to practice and purpose—that which we can do severally.●

TARIFF RELIEF FOR THE TIMBER INDUSTRY

HON. PHILIP E. RUPPE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. RUPPE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill which would lift the tariffs imposed on certain clothing imported from Canada by timber associations and used to protect the workmen in the industry. These garments—gloves and trousers—are unique in construction, acting to reduce the probability of injury to the workmen caused by power saw accidents.

Over the years, Congress has demonstrated its deep and continuing concern for reducing occupational accidents culminating in the passage of the Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA). All too frequently, however, OSHA and similar State organizations have only been able to react to situations which could have been prevented by taking a few, simple preventative measures—such as reducing the cost of safety equipment.

Although Federal and State regulatory agencies have required additional safety equipment and precautions to prevent accidents by workers involved in hazardous occupations, the lumber industry in particular continues to face spiralling costs due to high insurance rates, high workers' compensation costs, and expensive safety equipment requirements. That is why organizations such as the Michigan Association of Timbermen were established—to protect member workers from occupational accidents while attempting to control the rising costs of meeting safety requirements. Similar organizations have been formed is 12 other States, indicating the magnitude of this problem.

The very least Congress should do in order to prevent costly safety requirements from forcing small businessmen out of business is to reduce unnecessary tariffs on imported safety equipment not produced in the United States. We have a chance to do just that by removing the 25 percent tariff on gloves and trousers imported from Canada and used to protect lumbermen.

By removing the tariff, we could encourage compliance by financial incentive without enforcing costly regulations which would cause severe financial harm to small timber businesses.

Hopefully, reduction in costs will encourage greater use of safety gear, resulting in fewer injuries, lessening production costs, and lowering insurance rates.

I hope that the Congress will act promptly on this small business initiative.●

SANTA CLARA HIGH SCHOOL CHORALIERS

HON. NORMAN Y. MINETA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues in the House to join with me today in honoring the Santa Clara High School Choraliers from Santa Clara, Calif.

This group of 17 high school students, under the direction of Mrs. Alice Ellsworth Balahadia, was selected from Santa Clara High School choir. They appeared in the Washington, D.C. Festival of Nations celebration, following 3 days of concerts in New York.

An audition tape with samples of this talented ensemble's mixed repertoire earned them this prestigious invitation to Washington. They have also won a dedicated following in Santa Clara County with their multipart harmonies of both modern and classic vocal pieces.

We in Santa Clara County are proud not only of the musical achievement of these young people, but also of the outstanding record of scholarship and participation in other school activities they have maintained while keeping a demanding rehearsal schedule.

Special congratulations are due Alice Balahadia, who teaches music and social science at Santa Clara High. Her musical credentials include study at the Accademia di Santa Cecilia and Centro Internazionale di Studi Musicali, specializing in the piano forte; concerts in the San Franicsco Bay Area and southern Europe; and a concert tour in Southeast Asia udner the sponsorship of the U.S. State Department. Mrs. Balahadia debuted in Tokyo under the auspices of the U.S. Ambassador to Japan, U. Alexis Johnson.

The Santa Clara Choraliers include sopranos Lisa Hernandez, Darlene Kahr, and Kari Kincaid; altos Sandy Costa, Rhonda Rowland, Linda Slonaker, and Chrissy Trujillo; tenors Chris Fichera, Phil Hockemeyer, Leonard Marquez, and Frank Pichay; and basses Alan Carnahan, Michael Ciaffredo, Edgar Miranda, and Ken Positeri.

Backing up the vocalists are drummer Russ Positeri and bassist Dan Renteria.

A cross-country tour for a group of young people like this is a community achievement, and I would also like to congratulate the individuals, community groups and businesses that contributed to the Choraliers' travel fund and all those Santa Clara County residents who attended their benefit performances.

I ask my colleagues to join me in congratulating the Santa Clara Choraliers on their outstanding musical achievements and their successful Washington area debut.●

LABOR REFORM?

HON. JAMES T. BROYHILL

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. BROYHILL. Mr. Speaker, the U.S. Senate is now engaged in a debate on the so-called Labor Reform Act which the House has already passed. I said at the time of passage that this bill would destroy the balance presently existing in union-management relations. The legislation is designed to greatly enlarge the bargaining power of unions while it fails to even attempt to curb unfair labor practices committed by unions.

The Charlotte Observer, which is the largest newspaper in North Carolina, on May 21 printed an editorial, entitled, "Labor Reform? Not This Bill, Unfortunately." This editorial made several good points on this important issue, and I am urging my colleagues to read it. This editorial was written by the editor of the editorial pages, Mr. Ed Williams:

[From the Charlotte Observer, May 21, 1978]

LABOR REFORM? NOT THIS BILL, UNFORTUNATELY

Fantasies are drowning out facts in the shouting over the labor reform bill before the U.S. Senate.

The National Right to Work Committee and some other opponents seem to believe enacting this bill would be tantamount to signing over your home and future to George Meany. Union officials and supporters of the bill refer to it as "fine-tuning" the National Labor Relations Act.

The bill is substantially more than its supporters say, but less than its opponents fear. We think it is too flawed to be good legislation.

The bill is less a labor reform bill than a labor union bill. It was written for, if not entirely by, the AFL–CIO. It is designed to make it easier to organize nonunion workers, which means its greatest impact could be in the South.

SOME ONE-SIDED SOLUTIONS

The bill would deal with some long-standing problems and protect some workers. But sided that they would unfairly restrict law-abiding employers; and the bill would not correct any of the problems caused by unions, nor would it protect workers from union abuse.

Backers of the bill characterize it as an attempt to discourage corporate law-breaking. To an extent, it is. Suppose a union is trying to organize employees. If the employees genuinely want a union, a company has a number of ways to delay and possibly stop them. It can:

Fire workers most supportive of the union.

Stall, knowing that delay dims the chance of a union victory.

Refuse to bargain in good faith.

Even if found in violation of the law, some companies discover it's cheaper to take the punishment than to obey the law.

INADEQUATE PENALTIES

For instance, if a company fires a key union supporter or two, it may be able to scare other employees. After hearings and appeals that might take years, the company is ordered to reinstate the employees and pay them only what they would have earned—less whatever they earned at other jobs while contesting their firing. That's hardly penalty enough to deter an employer from scaring away organizers.

If no scrupulous employer would illegally fire an employee, neither would any scrupulous employer be affected by changes in the law requiring payment of (in the Senate bill) one and a half or (in the House-passed bill) two times the employee's net loss in wages.

Another problem: Current law requires employers to bargain in good faith, but there is no effective remedy for their refusal to do so. Even if a company's delays are frivolous, the National Labor Relations Board can make it pay only the union's litigation costs and any bargaining or organizing expenses caused by the delay. The company's gains may be far more than its penalties.

THE "MAKE-WHOLE" PROVISION

The bill's solution is a "make-whole" provision. Under it, when the National Labor Relations Board finds an employer unlawfully refusing to bargain, the board can impose a temporary wage increase pending a settlement. The wage increase would equal the employees' normal wages multiplied by the average increase in wages and benefits reported in the Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) quarterly report for major collective bargaining settlements.

Two problems make that an unsatisfactory solution:

1. The proposed legislation would not allow an employer to appeal some labor board decisions, such as who is to be represented by the union. An employer could get a court hearing on that question only by refusing to bargain.

HAZARD FOR EMPLOYERS

Refusal to bargain, therefore, can be a simple attempt to stall, but it also can be the only method to get a court hearing on a legitimate question. The "make-whole" provision, by not recognizing such distinctions, would make it hazardous for employers to seek their day in court.

2. The "make-whole" provision would impose a settlement that might have no relevance to the situation. The BLS statistics come from collective bargaining settlements that involve 5,000 employees or more. Should that settlement be imposed on a store owner with a dozen employees? That is what the provision would require.

The authors of the bill were acutely aware of potential employer violations of an employee's rights, but oblivious to potential—and real—union violations of employees' rights.

NO SECRET BALLOT GUARANTEE

As introduced, the House bill would have even done away with the guarantee of a secret ballot for union representation. The bill does not consider the possibility that, for instance, a supervised, secret-ballot election might be a fairer way to determine whether workers want to strike.

A major goal of the bill is to speed up the election process. Union organizers in effect determine when the election is to be held; they call for it when they feel union sentiment is reaching its peak. It isn't surprising, therefore, that the sooner the election is held, the better the organizers like it.

But why assume a decrease in union support is due to widespread illegal activity by employers? Unions have great latitude in the arguments and promises they can make, while employers are sharply restricted in what they can do or say to discourage organization. Speeding the election process infringes on an employer's right to state the case against a union. So does the bill's requirement that employers who argue against unions during work hours must give unions equal time. Should a company be required to underwrite part of a union's organizing campaign?

THEME OF LAWLESSNESS

The theme that runs through the bill is that employer lawlessness is the major obstacle to unions, particularly in the South. It's understandable that union leaders prefer to believe that, but the explanation is less simple. Employer lawlessness exists, as do corrupt union leaders and union pension funds that underwrite shady deals with mobsters. But other factors are perhaps more important.

Since World War II, government action has contributed to the marked decline in the fortunes of unions. National legislation (due, in part, to union political clout) has produced great advances in wages and working conditions. Anti-discrimination laws have removed much of the arbitrariness from employer-employee relations. Ironically, organized labor's achievements have helped many employees today feel they don't need a union to get a fair shake on the job.

THE DARK SIDE OF UNIONS

Another factor is a growing awareness of the dark side of unionism. Most unions are no longer simple bands of workers fighting for on-the-job justice. Bigness has given unions power, but it has also given some of them an agenda that often has little to do with the welfare of workers. Just as an employer's first concern is the company, a union's first concern is the union. To a worker the arbitrariness of union bosses can be as vicious as that of company bosses.

In addition, many employers have learned it is good business to pay the wages and create the working conditions that remove the irritations and frustrations that once forced employees into unions.

It is not union wages and benefits that many employers fear, but arbitrary work rules, featherbedding and restrictions that can prevent companies from adapting to changing economies and technologies.

Not that employers have seen the light and will be guided by the Golden Rule. The practice of squeezing a captive work force has not been relegated to history books, particularly in the South. Still, every corporation does not yearn to emulate J. P. Stevens Co.; the threat of unions is an incentive for many employers to treat their workers well.

UNIONS ON THE RISE HERE?

Union membership in the South probably will increase in the coming decades—in part because of the changing nature of the region's industry and in part because many employers will continue to make employees believe unions are necessary to get fair treatment. In most cases, unions don't organize workers—employers do the job for them.

While labor reform is needed, the present bill unfortunately isn't it. The bill is too one-sided to be a satisfactry remedy for some specific problems, and is not broad enough to be a comprehensive reform bill. Unless it can be greatly amended, which seems unlikely, it should be killed.●

PERSONAL STATEMENT ON ALASKA LANDS BILL

HON. HENRY S. REUSS

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, May 19, the subcommittee on the city held long-scheduled hearings in Ada, Okla. I chaired those hearings and was thus unable to be here for the final day of consideration of H.R. 39, the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act, of which I am a cosponsor. For the record, I want to indicate that I would have voted "no" on rollcall Nos. 338 and 339, and on rollcall No. 340, the vote for final passage, I would have voted "aye."

I am delighted that the House has completed action on a strong bill to protect the lands and resources of Alaska, and I hope that the Senate will soon do the same.●

HONORING U.S. WAR DEAD

HON. MATTHEW J. RINALDO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Speaker, although we should never lose sight of the fact that many dedicated Americans have given their lives in the defense of their country, the observance of Memorial Day, provides us with an opportunity each year to pay particular tribute to these heroes of the past. As is well known, Memorial Day was initially established to honor the war dead of both the North and the South shortly after America's Civil War. With the ensuing years, and additional military conflicts, this special day has broadened in scope to include Americans who have made the supreme sacrifice during World War I, World War II, the Korean war, and the Vietnam war.

Indeed, the very foundation of our Republic was established at the cost of 4,435 lives. These defenders of freedom took a definitive stand to fight to their deaths to throw off the yolk of colonialism in order that future generations might enjoy liberty.

The Civil War was a dark period in our Nation's history, in which 140,414 Americans lost their lives in the grim battle of differing opinions over national economic and social policies. Another 224,087 casualties were sustained, although not in direct battle, before the hostilities mercifully drew to a close, and the tradition of memoralizing America's war dead emerged as the Nation reflected upon its self-inflicted wounds.

Early in this century, the winds of war whipped across the face of Europe, and before the convulsions there could be subdued, President Wilson reluctantly committed our countrymen to aid our Allies. Before the "Great War" was over, 116,516 Americans died to keep the world "safe" for democracy.

A scant generation of peace occurred between the World Wars, before fascism's bloody crusade in Europe and Japan's attack on Pearl Harbor, forced the United States to again call her sons to battle. For 4 long years the fires of war raged in the European and Asian theaters, at a cost of 405,399 American lives.

A 4-year hiatus from hostilities transpired before America's Armed Forces were sent to the aid of South Korea. That war, lasting almost as long as the previous respite, took 54,246 American lives. And the toll did not stop there. The following decade was a period of extreme divisiveness for U.S. citizens, with thousands of young men conscripted into the armed services. America's most unpopular war, left 56,962 of her citizens dead on Vietnamese soil.

As we approach Memorial Day, 1978, let us remember and honor these thousands of Americans who sacrified their lives so that we might live in peace.●

JACK LYNCH AND CONGRESSIONAL HEARINGS

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, an important article appeared in today's New York Times featuring the views and comments on Ireland's Prime Minister Jack Lynch. At this point I wish to insert one paragraph from that article of special interest to me and the 105-member Ad Hoc Congressional Committee on Irish Affairs:

Mr. Lynch will also attempt while he is in the United States to make it clear to Irish-American members of Congress that they should not consider hearings by Represntative Marlo Biaggi's ad hoc committee on Northern Ireland unless the committee invited elected officials from Ireland to balance any testimony from sympathizers of the Provisional Irish Republican Army. Mr. Lynch has publicly criticized Mr. Biaggi, a New York City Democrat, for his closeness to I.R.A. sympathizers.

Let me set the record straight. I have always supported the concept of balanced congressional hearings on Ireland. On this point Mr. Lynch and I agree. To be most effective, all persons and organizations who are parties to the dispute and, therefore, to the solution should use a congressional hearing as a forum by which to present their positions. A hearing should not result in Congress even taking a position on one solution over another or supporting one group over another. Rather the hearing should provide the means and information to help the Irish people make their own determinations on a solution. It is their nation, it is their future.

While it is unusual procedure for the House International Relations Committee to elicit testimony from foreign elected or appointed officials, for a hearing on Ireland such testimony might be necessary to achieve balance. All legally sanctioned political parties as well as key elected officials from the Dublin government and representatives from the British Government should be invited to testify. Such involvement should be encouraged and I would fully support it.

The ad hoc committee does not want a sensational or demogogic hearing. Instead we want to achieve one goal—to advance the cause of peace and justice in Ireland. They will necessarily involve discussions about past and ongoing human rights violations in Ireland. Yet examples of witnesses on this area should include officials from the European Commission and Court of Human Rights which have documented human rights violations as well as representatives from Amnesty International which is conducting investigations into prison conditions in the North.

I recognize the volatile and emotional nature of this subject. But I also recognize the pivotal role which this Congress could play in advancing the cause of peace and justice in Ireland. It appears whereas the Dublin government once totally dismissed the idea of hearings, there is some change in sentiment. I hope it will provide the necessary impetus which will permit these hearings to be scheduled.●

IN PRAISE OF WEST SIDE "CLEAN UP BROADWAY" CAMPAIGN

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I am always pleased to lend my support to citizens who engage in extraordinary public spirited action. An outstanding recent example of this took place this spring when a group of community organizations, businesses and elected officials from Manhattan's West Side organized a "Clean Up Broadway" campaign. In appreciation of their efforts to beautify one of New York's most important thoroughfares, the New York State Assembly passed a resolution commending the West Siders' efforts. As an expression of my support and congratulations, I would like to make this resolution part of the official record.

LEGISLATIVE RESOLUTION COMMENDING THE CONCERNED COMMUNITY GROUPS FROM THE WEST SIDE OF NEW YORK FOR THEIR SPRING "CLEAN UP BROADWAY CAMPAIGN"

Whereas, A group of elected officials and concerned community groups from Manhattan's West Side have gotten together to organize a Spring "Clean Up Broadway Campaign" and is actively recruiting community-wide support of this commendable effort; and

Whereas, Broadway is among the most exciting, commercially vibrant and important avenues and thoroughfares of the City of New York if not of the world; and

Whereas, Sanitation problems have plagued Broadway in the recent past and it is littered with trash which makes it an unattractive place to stroll; and

Whereas, In 1977 the "I Love A Clean New York" campaign sponsored by the West Side Chamber of Commerce was a tremendous success sparked as it was by the enthusiasm demonstrated by Broadway merchants and their input towards the revitalization of Broadway and renewal of the community's pride in this famed thoroughfare; and

Whereas, It is the sense of this Legislative Body that it ought to be in the vanguard of those advocating and supporting this Spring's "Clean Up Broadway Campaign"; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That this Legislative Body pauses in its deliberations and resoundingly commends the elected officials and the concerned community groups from Manhattan's West Side who have gotten together to organize a Spring "Clean Up Broadway Campaign" and wishes these many dedicated persons, firms and corporations, representing the business and residential sections on and contiguous to Broadway, triumphal success in this endeavor and in the recruitment of community-wide support by way of proclaiming this Body's expression of its regards to Broadway and this commendable effort; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution, suitably engrossed, be transmitted to the Mayor of the City of New York, to the West Side Chamber of Commerce and to the Honorable Ted Weiss, Member of Congress.

Adopted in Assembly on April 10, 1978.

By order of the Assembly,

CATHERINE A. CAREY, Clerk.●

GUAM SEEKS TAX FREE PENSION BENEFITS

HON. ANTONIO BORJA WON PAT

OF GUAM

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. WON PAT. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to introduce legislation which will correct a highly technical oversight in section 805 of the U.S. Internal Revenue Code.

Under existing law, residents of the U.S. Territory of Guam are unable to invest their private retirement funds in tax-free shelters in the mainland. As a consequence, pension programs in Guam are deprived of this added source of revenue which is heavily used by other Americans in their pension plans.

The impact of Guam's deletion from this key section of the IRS Code is of enormous import to island residents. They, like each of us, look forward to the day when their retirement will be a happy period, financially secure with their hard-earned pensions. Yet, because private citizens on Guam are denied the use of tax-free sheltered funds, these individuals will be extremely hard pressed to offset the ravages of inflation. The need for this legislation is supported by the ruling received from Mr. William B. Posner, Acting Chief, Employee Plans, Technical Branch, Internal Revenue Service, Department of the Treasury, in response to my inquiry cited as follows:

JANUARY 31, 1978.

Hon. ANTONIO B. WON PAT,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. WON PAT: This is in response to your letter of January 10, 1978, on behalf of the Bank of Guam (Bank) and the Travelers Insurance Companies (Travelers).

The Bank maintains a pension plan for its employees which is exempt from tax under the internal revenue laws of the territory of Guam (which are identical to the Internal Revenue Code). The Bank wishes to invest its plan assets in the qualified tax sheltered reserves of Travelers. However, Travelers has told the Bank that its pension plan funds are not permitted to be invested in its tax sheltered fund. You would like our opinion on this matter and our suggestion as to how this problem can be remedied.

Section 805(d) of the Code defines the term "pension plan reserves" as including the portion of the life insurance reserves which is allocable to contracts (1) purchased under contracts entered into with trusts which are deemed to be trusts described in Code section 401(a) and exempt from tax under Code section 501(a), or (2) purchased under contracts entered into under plans which are deemed to be plans described in Code section 403(a).

It therefore appears that funds deposited into "pension plan reserves" described in Code section 805(d) must come from employees' plans qualified under section 401(a) or described in section 403(a) of the Code. Consequently, it seems that the Bank is not eligible to invest its employees' plan assets in the "pension plan reserves" of Travelers.

It would require an act of Congress to permit inclusion in Travelers' "pension plan reserves" of funds from an employees' trust established in the territory of Guam. Such favorable tax treatment has been provided for Puerto Rican plans by section 1022(i) of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (ERISA). ERISA section 1022(i) states that for tax years beginning after 1973, for purposes of Code section 501(a), any trust forming part of a qualified employees' plan, all of the participants of which are residents of Puerto Rico, shall be treated as an organization described in Code section 401(a) if such trust is exempt from income tax under the laws of Puerto Rico.

We hope this information will be helpful to you in replying to your constituent.

Sincerely yours,

WILLIAM B. POSNER,
Acting Chief, Employee Plans,
Technical Branch.●

STATEMENT OF CHAIRMAN AL ULLMAN, COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS, WITH RESPECT TO THE RULE TO BE REQUESTED FOR CONSIDERATION OF TITLE II OF H.R. 3633, A BILL RELATING TO WILDLIFE RESTORATION PROJECTS

HON. AL ULLMAN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. ULLMAN. Mr. Speaker, on May 15, 1978, H.R. 3633 was reported to the House. Title I, relating to wildlife restoration projects, was considered and approved by the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries. Title II of the bill was approved by the Committee on Ways and Means and imposes an 11-percent excise tax on ammunition component parts.

I take this occasion to advise my Democratic colleagues as to the nature of the rule that I will request for consideration of title II of H.R. 3633 on the floor of the House. The Committee on Ways and Means specifically instructed me to request the Committee on Rules to grant a closed rule for consideration of title II which would provide for:

First, one motion to strike title II;

Second, committee amendments which would not be subject to amendment;

Third, 1 hour of general debate, to be equally divided;

Fourth, waiving all necessary points of order; and Fifth, one motion to recommit with or without instructions.

It is our intention to request a hearing before the Committee on Rules concurrently with the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.●

WHY WE THANK YOU, AMERICA

HON. GLADYS NOON SPELLMAN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mrs. SPELLMAN. Mr. Speaker, if, as Dr. Johnson long ago insisted, "patriotism is the last refuge of the scoundrel," it is good to know that it is, also, often the first subject for a budding poet.

Recently, 10-year-old Lori Wiener, a fourth-grade student at Springhill Lake Elementary School in Greenbelt, Md., wrote a poem-essay for a contest sponsored by the American Legion Auxiliary. Its title is "Why We Thank You, America." Because it was not the proper length, Lori's entry was disqualified. But she was asked to read it at the awards ceremony. I am told it was the "highlight of the evening" and I would like to share it with my colleagues:

"WHY WE THANK YOU, AMERICA"
(By Lori Wiener)

We thank you, America, because we are free,
Free to enjoy the land and the sea.
Long ago we lived in colonies,
Now we are United, you see.
We thank our flag, Red, White, and Blue,
We also thank our minutemen, too,
For winning the Revolutionary War,
That made the British pretty sore.
We have freedom to elect,
They take your secret ballot, and make sure it's checked.
United we stand, divided we fall,
All is for one and one is for all.
Black, Oriental, Spanish, and White,
All created equal, and that is out-of-sight!
We should be thankful that we've won every fight.
From night to day, and from day to night.

We should be thankful that we are united,
We worked really hard, and we really fighted!
King George the third made us pay him taxes,
The Americans felt like chopping his head off with axes!
The Americans fought the British and won.
Now they can rest in peace in the sun.
We're United now, don't you see?
Now we will live in peace and not misery.
We should be thankful for the Indians.
They showed the pilgrims how to build houses and plant corn,
After doing all of that, the pilgrims were pretty worn.

We thank all of our tremendous Congressmen,
Who we vote for every four years time and again.
Senators, Secretaries, and Presidents, too,
Need a great big thanks, from me and you.
We should thank the people who made America great,
We should also thank our Governors of each State.
Jewish, Baptist, Christian, what ever religion people are,
They are welcome in America, living near or far.

Every citizen in America today
Works together, they do not play.
Plumbers, Sailors, Fishermen, too.
All work to help keep America going
And that is very true.
Each and every one of them work for money,
Money is not the only thing in this world, Isn't that funny?
Oil, fuel, gas, and electricity help America go stronger than ever,
All that we have to do is turn a knob, or pull a lever.

We should conserve that energy those men get for us,
So in the future, we will have enough gas,
To ride in a car or ride in a bus.
These men do a lot of things for America that takes away their free time,
That's why I am putting them in my rhyme.

Getting back to the freedom part, this is how our freedom did start,
King George the 3rd made American Colonists his slaves,
We could not be the land of the free and the home of the brave.
So Paul Revere one night, took his important ride,
From every village hill, and to every countryside.
Then all of the Colonists snuck around silently,
To hear everything they needed to hear, and to see everything they needed to see.

Then suddenly they heard a big loud gunshot,
Was it the British, was it the British or not?
Then the battle started in that little town
Bullets went up, and bullets came back down.
Then the colonists won the war,
And King George the third did not rule them anymore.
A settlement was made, a Declaration was signed, the colonists were free,
Very many people were happy as we can see.

Women of America put up some big fights,
Women had to do it to get all of their rights.
Women finally got the right to vote,
That law was passed, and in the law book it was wrote.
All women have equal rights as men,
And never, never, never ever again,
Will women not have those equal rights,
Or women will have those awful fights.
All of the people in America, men, women, all of the people,
All of them are created equal.

We should be thankful that us kids go to school,
And do not have to live by a dictator's rule.
In other countries they pick out your schools,
Some good, some bad, and that isn't cool.

We are also a very historic country too,
People made it historic, some like me, some like you.
George, Thomas, Lincoln and even Franklin
They are some people that are worth thanking.
George Washington fought in the Revolutionary War,
The one that made the British pretty sore.
George was a president, the very first of our country,
Another great congressman was Senator Hubert Humphrey.
Most of these great and wonderful men died,
At that time some amount of people really cried.
These men served their part,
All of these men really did have a heart.

These are just some things that we should be thankful for,
There are lots of others, very many more.
I am sorry at this time,
We will have to end this rhyme,
But if you help, and keep on giving,
America the Beautiful will keep on living.

The End.●

NEMESIS IN KATANGA

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, history seems to keep repeating itself in Zaire.

How many times will the West have to go to the rescue of Mobutu? The seeds of the present conflict were sown in the early 1960's when the so-called UN force intervened in what was then called the Congo, in order to prevent Moise Tshombe and his followers from setting up Katanga province as a separate nation. Tshombe was a great leader and a Christian. He later was Premier of Zaire in 1964. Had he lived and had he not been murdered by the Algerians, the story of Zaire and Katanga might have been different. The Cubans and the Soviets have taken advantage of this long-standing discontent to launch invasions twice. It is also of considerable interest to note the sharp western press reaction of horror to the slaughter of whites in Zaire and their seeming unconcern over similar type slaughters in Rhodesia of whites and black terrorists. The London Daily Telegraph recently summed up this problem in an editorial on Saturday, May 20, 1978, pointing out how the West and the United Nations, have made these problems worse in Africa, not better. The editorial follows:

NEMESIS IN KATANGA

No special pleading is needed to urge Katanga's strategic importance to the West; even the compulsive Panglosses of Washington are now apprised. Intervention, ostensibly to save Europeans, is on the way. But the clamour of arms should not silence the muse of contemportry history. On the contrary, this is precisely the time to ask why what had been the richest, most stable and most pro-European part of the Congo should have become a disaffected objective for Communist penetration. This could not have come about without the short-sighted and self-destructive policies by the Western powers, from their participation in Dag Hammarskjold's crusade to Andrew Young's encomia on the stabilising influence of Castro's expeditionary force.

The West's self-satisfied intervention against TSHOMBE's autonomous Katanga destroyed one of the most potentially viable and loyal units in Africa, rich in mineral wealth, leadership and political savoir faire. Instead, Katanga was turned into an unwilling province of a despotic, corrupt and bankrupt example of what our masters are pleased to call majority rule, or one man one vote, the one man exercising the vote being MOBUTU. The whole of the Congo is disaffected; how could it be otherwise? But Katanga has the greater means of expressing that disaffection: long accessible frontiers with Angola, Zambia and Tanzania; a sense of separate identity; and memories of quasi-independence with an armed struggle of sorts before being over-run by the U.N. in its role of peacemaker militant.

It is sad yet understandable that the Katangese, led by veterans of that short war, should seek their allies where they can find them, and equally understandable that the Communists should enter the auction. What have they to lose? They have done well in sub-Saharan Africa following the United State's demoralisation. Angola, Mozambique, Ethiopia, prospects of involvement in Rhodesia. Katanga, with its copper and its position athwart the trans-continental routes would fortify their position and serve as a base for exerting pressure on the rest of the Congo, as well as on Tanzania and Zambia should the need arise.

This time Western forces should be able tc tip the balance, but this will not be the last crisis so long as the political vacuum in the province co-exists with Communist expansionary zeal. The man best fitted by convictions and talents to hold Katanga for the West, the late MOISE TSHOMBE, was allowed to die at the hands of the Barbary Pirates in Algiers, where he was taken after kidnapping and held against all international law, without a word of protest from the West and the U.N. The episode should give cause for second thoughts about the drift of Western policy.●

NONGAME FISH AND WILDLIFE CONSERVATION ACT OF 1978

HON. GOODLOE E. BYRON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, many of my colleagues in the House of Representatives have been receiving mail from our constituents who are concerned about certain provisions in H.R. 10915, the Nongame Fish and Wildlife Conservation Act of 1978. This bill would establish an 11 percent excise tax on camping equipment, such as tents, sleeping bags, air mattresses, lanterns, camping stoves, water jugs, coolers, binoculars, and an 11 percent excise tax on wild bird seed, bird houses, bird feeders, and bird baths. The revenue from this tax would be used to fund conservation programs for nongame fish and wildlife.

This bill is patterned after the successful Federal program which uses an excise tax on guns and ammunition to finance conservation programs to replenish the population of animals which are hunted, such as deer, rabbits, pheasants, and so forth . . . This new bill, H.R. 10915, would extend this same principle to animals which are not hunted by using the excise tax on camping equipment and bird products for nongame wildlife conservation purposes.

I have discussed this subject at considerable length with Mr. William Kemsley, Jr., the chairman of the American Hiking Society, and Mr. James A. Kern, the president of the American Hiking Society. These two gentlemen are highly respected individuals and dear friends of mine. They have raised a number of valid and persuasive concerns about this legislation and I would like to take this opportunity to bring their thoughts to the attention of my Colleagues and other readers of the RECORD.

First, it is important to keep in mind that hikers do not now receive a fair proportion of their Federal tax dollars for recreation, and additional taxes on them, along with campers, would not be warranted. President Johnson once said that the hiker "is the most neglected outdoor recreational user in America."

U.S. Forest Service trails, which provide most of the opportunities for hiking, have been reduced from about 150,000 miles to only 97,000 miles. This has occurred despite the fact that there are now 10 times the number of hikers in our country than there were just 10 years ago.

The Federal Government has done very little to provide trails or other facilities for hikers. Until the passage of the Appalachian Trail bill earlier this year, the involvement of the Federal Government in our national trails had been very meager. Most trails used by hikers, including the Appalachian Trail, were built and are maintained by the volunteer efforts of thousands of hikers.

A survey conducted recently by the Opinion Research Corp. found that there are an estimated 45 million hikers in this country. That number sounds a little high. There have been more conservative estimates of 25 million. In either case, it is clear that hikers have not received adequate services from the Federal Government for their recreational tax dollar. The Federal Government has provided far more generous facilities to meet the recreational needs of other citizens.

The Nongame Fish and Wildlife Conservation Act of 1978 would add to the inflationary pressures which have already been burdening millions of American hiking and camping families. The cost of the average goose down sleeping bag would be increased by $17, tents would be up an average of $18, and of course other camping equipment would be increased in price by 11 percent. This tax would be added on top of the already increasing cost of hiking and camping equipment. For example, the price of goose down, which is widely used in sleeping bags and outdoors clothing, has risen by more than 300 percent in the past 2 years. The Federal Government should be encouraging families to engage in outdoor activities such as camping and hiking, which can make such important contributions to the physical and emotional health of the public. We should not be discouraging hiking and camping through expensive new taxes.

While expanding our wildlife conservation programs for nongame animals is certainly a worthwhile objective, it does not appear that the use of an excise tax on campers and hikers is an appropriate method to raise the money for this purpose. While the supporters of the Nongame Fish and Wildlife Conservation Act of 1978 cite the success of the 42-year-old Federal program of excise taxes on hunters for wildlife conservation, this does not establish a justification for taxing campers and hikers for the same purpose. Hunters, of course, reduce the number of animals through the practice of their sport. Therefore, a tax on hunters to help the game population to grow is certainly warranted both to preserve the future of the sport and to protect our wildlife resources.

Campers and hikers, however, do not reduce the number of nongame animals in our parks, woodland, and prairies. As any visitor to campgrounds in our national parks knows, campgrounds have inadvertantly become the most rewarding foraging areas for many species of wildlife. Motorists reduce the numbers of wildlife far more significantly than do campers. I have yet to see a single animal larger than an insect harmed by a collision with a hiker. If the sponsors of H.R. 10915 really want to enact a new tax to help wildlife, they should tax drivers or developers or others who reduce the wildlife population, not simply the hikers and campers who appreciate it.

If it is the object of H.R. 10915 to tax those who enjoy our wildlife, then it would be more fitting to tax wildlife television and motion picture programing in order to raise the appropriate revenue for this purpose.

The amount of revenue for the Government which would result from this tax would not be substantial. While the excise tax on guns and ammunition raises $66 million annually, it is estimated that the tax on camping equipment and birdseed would raise only about $5 million each year. One therefore must wonder why campers, hikers, and those who feed birds are being singled out for extra taxation in this bill. It certainly is not because this tax is favored by hikers. At two meetings held last year by the American Hiking Society, an excise tax on hiking and camping equipment was opposed unanimously by representatives from 23 hiking and conservation organizations. One possible explanation for the emergence of this proposal is the fact that until recently hikers were not organized effectively and lacked a strong voice in Government circles. By temperament, hikers would prefer the solitude and tranquillity of their pastime and are not known for joining organizations and organizing themselves into the vocal groups that characterize other interests.

For this reason, all Americans who enjoy hiking owe a debt of gratitude to the leadership of Bill Kemsley, Jim Kern, and the many others who are active in the American Hiking Society. It is through the work of these individuals that the interests of the hiking public will be protected.●

OSHA REBUKED

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, I share the great admiration and gratitude of millions of small businessmen and workers for the Supreme Court's decision this week that struck down warrantless searches and inspections by the Occupational Safety and Health Administration.

This decision was a needed rebuke of OSHA, which has exhibited an arrogant attitude in conducting hundreds of thousands of unannounced inspections of businesses during its 7-year existence—presumably all of them in violation of the Constitution.

The Supreme Court decision is also a needed message to Congress that Federal regulatory agencies must not be given such broad bureaucratic powers—but must be restricted to strict constitutional guidelines when dealing with businesses as well as with individual citizens.

The Nation owes a debt of gratitude to Mr. Bill Barlow, and all those who supported his effort to fight OSHA all the way to the Supreme Court.

I would like to include at this point in the RECORD an editorial from the Arizona Republic concerning this great victory over an arrogant bureaucracy:

[From the Arizona Republic, May 24, 1978]

OSHA REBUKED

The Labor Department understandably is in a cranky mood since yesterday's Supreme Court ruling outlawing unannounced inspections of American workplaces.

The no-knock, no-warrant inspections by Occupational Safety and Health agents was central to the police-state mentality of Labor's bureaucrats. Without it, OSHA could not have carried out relentless and mindless harassment of businesses in the name of protecting workers from workplace hazards.

Now the high court, by a 5-3 vote, has ended OSHA's assumed powers to barge in wherever it pleases. The court ruled that OSHA must conduct itself like other policing authorities—to wit, it must observe prohibitions set forth in the U.S. Constitution against unreasonable search and seizure, and must obtain a warrant if it has evidence of gross safety violations.

The hero of yesterday's justice decision—a thunderous blow in behalf of the Constitution—is F. G. "Bill" Barlow, a once-obscure Pocatello, Idaho, electrical contractor. When OSHA's man tried to storm into Barlow's small 35-employee company to check on worker safety Barlow stood in the doorway and said nuts.

He continued to refuse to knuckle. Facing the full force and fury of the federal government's army of tax-supported lawyers, Barlow fought his case to a three-judge appeals court which sided with him.

Convinced it still had storm trooper privileges, OSHA appealed to the Supreme Court, whereupon it took a well-deserved beating at the hands of the justices.

We leave it to the reader to decide whether there is a police state mentality in the Labor Department. Attorneys for OSHA, for example, argued in their appeal that unless OSHA can swoop down unannounced on a businessman and without a warrant, some cagey boss just might allow an unsafe condition to persist.

Heavens. The Constitution and a variety of court opinions have held that constituted law enforcement agencies have no such power, even if it means a known criminal goes scot free and incriminating evidence is destroyed.

OSHA is a premier example of government regulatory power gone amok. Congress created OSHA, then let OSHA create its own rules and regulations without being accountable to anyone. For the nearly seven years it has been operating, OSHA has conducted more than 400,000 spot inspections—presumably all of them in violation of the Constitution.

Were it not for Barlow, a feisty little businessman who refused to roll over when OSHA's agents showed up, heaven only knows how much farther the abuses would have gone.

The nation, and champions of constitutional liberties, owe a sizeable debt to Barlow. And to the five justices who abhorred OSHA's brazen disregard for privacy, and brought it to an abrupt halt.●

TRIBUTE TO VICE PRESIDENT ROCKEFELLER

HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to join in the tribute to one of the greatest American public servants of the 20th century, the Honorable Nelson Rockefeller of New York.

The honors bestowed upon him today in this Capitol are long overdue, but in a larger sense, they have been merited many times over.

I have known Vice President Rockefeller since my early days in Congress in the concluding months of World War II. At that time, he was serving his Nation in the State Department, his talents, at an early age, being recognized by a predecessor Governor of New York, Franklin Delano Roosevelt.

As the descendant of a proud, accomplished, and wealthy American family, he could have been content to enjoy life in a more relaxed fashion, but indeed he did not choose to do so. In fact, the contributions of Nelson Rockefeller have consistently excelled those of any 10 men in one lifetime. Nelson Rockefeller's total dedication has been to his Nation, and to his fellow man. And what greater service can society demand from one of its members.

In an hour of uncertainty and great concern, he put aside his private life to accept the high honor of becoming the Vice President of the United States. And still, he rose to greater heights, as he brought greater dignity and honor to his country once more.

That, in short, is the story of Nelson Rockefeller, a public servant in the finest sense of the word. We can be proud of the awareness that Nelson Rockefeller has served us all so well, and today, this honor is but a mere token of the awards he so richly deserves.●

TAXING CREDIT UNIONS

HON. DOUGLAS WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, the recent proposal by the administration to tax credit unions in the same fashion as banks has attracted a great deal of criticism from many credit union members. I feel these complaints are justified. The administration has asked Congress for this change because it believes credit unions are no longer the small entities with close bonds among members that they once were, but instead argues they are so large they are functionally identical to savings and loan associations.

I just do not believe this is so. Credit unions are chartered under law to provide services to groups or individuals bound by common ties of employment, association, or residence. Almost 75 percent of the Nation's 22,500 credit unions have assets of less than $1 million. The assets of the 1,540 credit unions in Pennsylvania are still less than each of the three largest banks in Pittsburgh. Most importantly, we must remember that credit unions provide needed loans to many who are unable to obtain loans from their local banks.

The board of directors of the Pennsylvania Credit Union League and the delegates to the Pennsylvania Credit Union League annual membership meeting have adopted a resolution stating their opposition to the taxation of credit unions. I would like to share this resolution with my colleagues:

RESOLUTION

Whereas, credit unions are nonprofit self-help organizations, democratically owned and controlled by their members; and

Whereas, credit unions are in existence only to serve the economic needs of members within a specific common bond as delineated in the charter issued by either the Federal Government or the State Government; and

Whereas, credit unions are, indeed, small entities with 79% of all Pennsylvania credit unions having less than $1 million in assets and 40% having less than $200,000 in assets; and

Whereas, there are at least ten financial institutions in Pennsylvania, each chartered to do business with the general public, each of which individually has assets exceeding the sum total of all assets of ALL 1,540 credit unions in Pennsylvania; and

Whereas, more than 1.4 million Pennsylvanians look to their credit unions as a source of low-cost credit and friendly financial counseling, and to fly in the face of American tradition and tax these nonprofit cooperatives would be endangering the very existence of this important segment of the economy; and

Whereas, to subject credit unions to taxation would, in effect, be taxing the volunteer efforts of more than 20,000 Pennsylvanians who give time and service to their credit unions, without financial remuneration, and upon whose efforts the credit unions depend for their continued operation; and

Whereas, to tax the credit unions as organizations would result in double taxation, inasmuch as credit union earnings are divided among the members as dividends on savings and thence become subject to individual Federal Income Tax;

Now therefore be it resolved: that we, the delegates assembled in Annual Meeting of the Pennsylvania Credit Union League, representing the 1,540 credit unions of this Commonwealth and their 1.4 million members, do hereby call upon the U.S. Congress to reject any and all proposals to impose taxation on credit unions.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I was necessarily absent for part of May 22 and for the entire day of May 23.

Had I been present on May 22, I would have voted: "aye" on Roll No. 348, House Concurrent Resolution 555, extending most favored nation trade status to Hungary; "aye" on Roll No. 349, House Resolution 1193, the rule providing for the consideration of H.R. 12602, Military Construction Authorization for Fiscal Year 1979; "aye" on Roll No. 350, final passage of H.R. 12602, the Military Construction Authorization; and "aye" on Roll No. 351, an amendment to H.R. 10729, fiscal year 1979 Maritime Authorization, to strike increases in ship mortgage guarantees.

Had I been present on May 23, I would have voted: "nay" on Roll No. 353, to pass under suspension Senate Joint Resolution 4, establishing the Aboriginal Hawaiian Claims Settlement Study Commission; "aye" on Roll No. 354, to pass under suspension H.R. 12299, Domestic Violence Assistance Act of 1978; "aye" on Roll No. 355, to pass under suspension H.R. 3050, Tax Treatment of Returns on Magazines, Paperbacks, and Records; "aye" on Roll No. 356, to pass under suspension H.R. 8535, IRS Amendments for Dependent Care Services; "aye" on Roll No. 357, to pass under suspension House Resolution 238, Common Market Regulations for Dried Fruit; "aye" on Roll No. 358, to pass under suspension H.R. 11370, Reimbursement of Social Services Expenditures; "aye" on Roll No. 359, an amendment to H.R. 10729, fiscal year 1979 Maritime Authorization, to prohibit authorized funds from being used to pay any item of wage costs of the Transportation Institute, the Joint Maritime Congress, or the American Maritime Officers Service, or to any other organization which engaged in lobbying activities; "aye" on Roll No. 360, an amendment to H.R. 10729, to prohibit use of subsidies to pay any part of wage costs for the training of new entrants into the maritime industry; "aye" on Roll No. 361, an amendment to H.R. 10729, to prohibit the use of funds to subsidize the carriage of grain to Russia; "nay" on Roll No. 362, final passage of H.R. 10729, fiscal year 1979 Maritime Authorization; and "aye" on Roll No. 363, House Resolution 1188, the rule providing for the consideration of H.R. 10929, Department of Defense Authorization Act of 1979.●

CHARLES AND BERYL GRAEFF—HELPING HARRISBURG'S OLDER RESIDENTS

HON. ALLEN E. ERTEL

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. ERTEL. Mr. Speaker, the month of May is Older Americans Month. There are many older Americans in the 17th Congressional District who I would like to publicly thank for their hard work and the respect they have gained during their exemplary lives. But there is one older couple, in particular, whom I would like to bring to the attention of the House of Representatives.

Capt. Charles Graeff and his wife, Beryl, have unselfishly helped hundreds of older residents of the Harrisburg area over the last 5 years in filling out an untold number of income tax returns and myriad forms that today's senior citizens are required to complete. Captain Graeff, a retired Coast Guard officer, and Beryl, a notary public, are part of the retired senior volunteer program for Harrisburg. They live at 2174 Brookwood in Harrisburg, and their phone number is 717–564–6116.

Captain and Mrs. Graeff's home is competely taken over as an office—phones constantly ringing with frantic pleas for help. A question about the Federal income tax has a caller stymied. Another wants to know details about rent and real estate rebate forms. A little while later, an urgent voice needs advice on filling out a medicare reimbursement request. More calls throughout the day on tens of other mystifying forms.

The Graeffs take it in stride. They offer to help them all. In fact, any problem that bothers senior citizens, Captain and Mrs. Graeff lend an understanding ear. They give advice over the phone, make appointments for questioners to come to their office or the Graeffs visit those who cannot come to them. They also have an impressive list of volunteers organized and call upon them according to ability and type of service each is willing to provide.

The Graeffs' spirit was heralded in 1974 when former Vice President Rockefeller, on behalf of the National Center for Voluntary Action, presented them with the National Volunteer Award. In the true spirit of volunteering the Graeffs then returned their $500 award to the former Vice President for donation to charity.

National honors have not slowed down the captain, nor caused him and Mrs. Graeff to rest on their laurels. Despite ill health, hospitalization, and doctor's orders to rest and take life easer, the Graeffs have not stopped helping those older citzens who cannot afford professional help with modern-day paperwork. As one local resident put it, "He's not concerned how long he lives but what service he can render to his fellow man in this short life."

Mr. Speaker, Charles and Beryl Graeff are the kind of dedicated people that continue to make this country great. I am proud to represent them and to know that they are maintaining the vigil to help those in need. On behalf of the people of Harrisburg and the 17th District during Older Americans Month, we salute the captain and his good wife Beryl who is always at his side.●

PUBLIC INFORMATION ON BIRTH DEFECTS

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, one of the most noticeable developments in the past 2 years in Federal health planning is a growing recognition of the value of preventive health care programs. When HEW Secretary Califano launched his antismoking campaign he stressed that preventive health programs are the most fruitful, the most cost-effective, and the most humane expenditures we make in the Federal health budget. Determining and addressing the causes of illness is a dramatic shift in American health care delivery which historically has been oriented to treating serious illness in a hospital setting.

Concurrent with this new emphasis on preventive health care is greater consumer interest in self-care and lifestyle changes that can prevent or postpone serious illness, and prolong life.

The March of Dimes, which was founded in 1938 by President Franklin D. Roosevelt to find a means to prevent poliomyelitis, has made a significant effort to keep the public informed about the very latest findings on the causes of birth defects. When Salk vaccine was licensed in 1955, and immunization programs to fight polio were organized in 1958, the March of Dimes directed its national research efforts at prevention and treatment of birth defects and genetic counseling.

Birth defects are the Nation's No. 1 child health problem. Every year, more than 250,000 babies in the United States are born with birth defects. Of this total, 200,000 have structural or metabolic disorders that can be detected early in life. Another 50,000 babies are threatened by markedly low birthweight—4 pounds 6 ounces or less. Their organic systems are too immature to function normally. Of all newborns, these infants are at greatest risk of death or lifelong damage.

If we want to assure that as many of our people as possible can lead the most productive lives, we must do all we can to prevent birth defects, or provide early diagnosis and treatment. There are now 15 million Americans whose daily lives are affected in some way by birth defects. Each year, 1.2 million infants, children, and adults are hospitalized for treatment. More than 62,000 persons of all ages die every year as a consequence of birth defects.

I would like to conclude my remarks by having reprinted in the RECORD two March of Dimes pamphlets on the subject of preventing birth defects caused by rubella, and on Tay-Sachs disease. Better public information on birth defects not only increases the likelihood that we can prevent some defects in the future; it also increases public understanding of the importance of preventive health care. These pamphlets and others like them are available from the March of Dimes for distribution to constituents. It is my hope that by informing my colleagues of this resource, better public understanding of the causes and prevention of birth defects will result.

TAY-SACHS DISEASE

Tay-Sachs disease is an inherited disorder. It was first recorded by Warren Tay, a British eye doctor who noted the typical, white-ringed, cherry red spot in the eye of a disabled one-year-old. In 1887 an American neurologist, Bernard Sachs, first described it as a hereditary degenerative disease. In this century researchers pinpointed the enzyme (chemical) activity of Tay-Sachs disease, and it was placed in the group known as "inborn errors of metabolism". These are genetic defects of body chemistry which usually result in organic, nerve, or muscular disabilities.

WHAT IS TAY-SACHS DISEASE?

An inherited condition, always fatal, Tay-Sachs disease strikes its victim at about the age of six months. The brain and nervous system gradually become unable to function. A healthy baby becomes unmoving and unfeeling. The child stops crawling or turning over, loses its ability to grasp or reach out, losses sight and hearing, and is unable to eat or smile. By the age of 18 months he or she is blind, paralyzed, and unaware of the surrounding world. Usually at the age of three or four years, death occurs.

Tay-Sachs is related to a small family of diseases caused by an overabundance of some fatty substances (sphingolipids) found in certain cells. Tay-Sachs babies are born without the blood chemical that is necessary to break down dangerous fatty accumulations in brain and nerve cells. The affected cells gradually become totally clogged and the central nervous system stops working.

WHO INHERITS TAY-SACHS DISEASE?

Victims are primarily descendants of Central and Eastern European (Ashkenazi) Jews, although members of any group may inherit the disease. Some 90 percent of American Jews are of Ashkenazi origin. Approximately one out of 25 American Jews carriers the Tay-Sachs gene, which is about ten times the number in other ethnic groups. Many geneticists calculate that one in 625 American Jewish couples run the risk of having a Tay-Sachs baby

HOW IS THE DISEASE TRANSMITTED?

Heredity is the only means of transmission so, if inherited, Tay-Sachs disease will be present at birth.

It does not develop later in life.

It cannot be caught from another child who has it.

A child must inherit two Tay-Sachs genes, one from each parent, to have the disease. A child who inherits only one Tay-Sachs gene becomes a carrier and will not have the disease. A carrier is completely normal and healthy. But a carrier should know that he or she has the Tay-Sachs gene. Because if two parents are carriers, there is a 25 percent risk with each pregnancy that their child will have the disease. There is another 25 percent chance that the child will be free of the Tay-Sachs gene forever. And the odds are 50–50 that each child will be a carrier, like the parent.

When a carrier and a non-carrier become parents, each of their children has a 50 percent risk of being born a carrier, but none will have the disease.

HOW CAN PEOPLE FIND OUT IF THEY ARE CARRIERS?

By having a simple blood test. A small amount of blood, taken from the fingertip or a vein, is measured for the amount it contains of the chemical (an enzyme known as Hex A) that helps break down certain fatty substances in brain and nerve cells. Tay-Sachs carriers have half as much of the enzyme as non-carriers, although the amount is entirely adequate for an individual's needs.

WHO SHOULD BE TESTED?

American Jews of childbearing age who intend to have children and young adults who have children and plan to have more. Since the odds with each pregnancy are three out of four that a child of two carriers will not inherit the disease, such parents may have had healthy children never knowing they were carriers.

Most babies with Tay-Sachs disease are born into families where the defect had never been known to occur. Anyone who does have a family history of the disease has strong reason to be tested. Individuals who have been tested and are found to be carriers are asked to notify relatives of their test results to encourage further family testing.

Many Jewish leaders prefer screening before marriage, followed by both social and religious counseling for young people found to be carriers.

IS THERE ANY TREATMENT FOR A BABY WITH TAY-SACHS DISEASE?

Tragically, no.

There is no cure and no treatment that will prevent the disease from running its fatal course. Affected children can only be made as comfortable as possible for their remaining months. Parents of Tay-Sachs victims have few places where they can place their children for care, and where such facilities exist, the cost is almost prohibitive without state or other aid.

CAN TAY-SACHS DISEASE BE DIAGNOSED AND TREATED BEFORE BIRTH

Yes, it can be diagnosed; no, it cannot be treated before birth, although researchers are working toward this possibility. Amniocentesis is the method through which Tay-Sachs and many other defects can be diagnosed before birth. An obstetrician who is qualified in this procedure inserts a hollow needle through the pregnant woman's abdomen, into the sac that surrounds her fetus. He withdraws a small amount of fluid containing cells that have been discarded by the fetus and analyzes it for the chemical needed to prevent excessive fatty accumulation. If the chemical (an enzyme known as Hex A) is present, the baby will not have Tay-Sachs disease. If it is missing, it will. This prenatal test should be given early in the fourth month of pregnancy.

CAN TAY-SACHS DISEASE BE PREVENTED?

Voluntary screening by young men and women of Jewish heritage to learn if they are carriers, prenatal diagnosis, and genetic counseling are methods now being used in efforts to prevent this disease. In some cities with large Jewish populations, pamphlets explaining Tay-Sachs disease and advising couples where to go if they wish to be tested are available at marriage license bureaus. Mass screening programs to identify carriers are conducted in several large cities.

WHAT IS THE MARCH OF DIMES DOING ABOUT TAY-SACHS DISEASE?

In sixty-eight research centers throughout the country, scientists are working on techniques that may someday lead to a successful treatment of Tay-Sachs disease.

For example: Some researchers are looking for ways to supply normal enzymes into the brain and nervous system to break down the deposits of fatty substances accumulated there. These normal enzymes would take over the functions not performed by the defective or missing enzymes found in the Tay-Sachs victim.

Scientists are trying to transplant genes from normal cells into cells which lack the gene or in which the gene is defective.

Others are exploring ways to graft healthy cells into patients with abnormal cells so that the transplanted cells can manufacture the enzyme the patient lacks.

Someday Tay-Sachs disease may be treatable and controllable. But until that time, testing for carriers of the disease and genetic counseling facilities are the primary lines of defense against this deadly heritage.

PREVENTING BIRTH DEFECTS CAUSED BY RUBELLA

Every year, more than a quarter-million children in this country are born with a defect. The National Foundation-March of Dimes is dedicated to preventing these tragedies. Prevention won't happen overnight, but one vaccine which can prevent birth defects caused by rubella (German measles), has been available for several years.

RUBELLA—KILLER AND CRIPPLER

About 50,000 American children died before birth or were born with defects because their mothers contracted rubella while pregnant during the 1964-65 epidemic. The vaccine, which was licensed in 1969, ultimately can eliminate rubella.

Primary targets for vaccination are children aged one to 12. They are main sources of rubella infection. If enough children are vaccinated, the rubella virus may be wiped out.

THE HIDDEN MENACE

The mere existence of a vaccine is not enough to stamp out a disease, however. The real danger of rubella is that too many people do not take it seriously enough. Many people know it only as three-day measles—an innocent-sounding alias. Almost everyone thinks of it as a harmless, childhood disease. But this is not only a disease of childhood, and therein lies its danger.

Fourteen per cent of the women of childbearing age in this country are still susceptible to rubella. This is one woman in seven. Rubella is dangerous to the fetus if a woman catches it while she's pregnant because the placenta offers no barrier against the virus. The first three months of pregnancy are the time this disease poses the greatest threat to the growing embryo. It can cause a miscarriage, a stillbirth, or a birth defect.

Because the virus in the vaccine may damage the unborn, doctors warn against inoculating women of childbearing years, unless it is certain they are not pregnant or will not become pregnant within three months of inoculation.

A doctor can tell from blood tests taken before and at intervals during pregnancy whether a woman is susceptible to rubella, and if she is, whether she remains uninfected. If so, the doctor probably will recommend vaccination right after delivery to protect any future babies she may have. If there are older children in the family, they should all be vaccinated.

Rubella symptoms, ironically enough, are quite mild: low-grade fever, a rash starting on the face and spreading down the body, and swelling of the lymph glands in the neck. These signs may be so slight that a pregnant woman doesn't even know she's had the disease—until her child is born with defects.

Rubella is usually over in one to three days with no lasting effect, unless the victim happens to be an unborn child. Then the effects are lasting indeed. Loss of hearing, impaired vision, congenitally damaged heart, and mental retardation are common among German measles babies. Many do not survive.

Clubs and organizations in many areas participate with public health officials and medical authorities in encouraging large-scale rubella inoculation programs for children through public health education and community services.

Keeping the public aware of the continuing need to vaccinate each new generation of children is extremely important. Otherwise the effectiveness of widespread immunization can disappear within a few years, and again pose danger of infection to pregnant women.

RUBELLA VERSUS "REGULAR" MEASLES

Many people think rubella is the same as "regular" measles. They're wrong. They are two different things. The fact that a "regular" measles vaccination campaign has been conducted over the last 10 years has given many people the false impression that their children have already been inoculated against all types of measles. Vaccination against "regular" measles is no protection at all against rubella.

WHAT OF THOSE ALREADY STRICKEN?

Many of the children born with birth defects caused by rubella have not just one, but two or more afflictions. Often handicapped by loss of hearing, impairment of vision, and perhaps a defective heart, they also require early, intensive training if they are to realize their full potential.

Unfortunately, few schools exist for multi-handicapped children. The thousands of children born with defects after the 1964–65 epidemic and now in school threaten to swamp even the schools for the singly handicapped. Society must face this problem squarely. We must see to it that these children, blind or deaf or brain-damaged already, are not hurt further by our neglect.●

THE EASTERN ORTHODOX MEN'S SOCIETY 16TH ANNUAL AWARDS DINNER

HON. CHARLES J. CARNEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. CARNEY. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, May 21, 1978, the Eastern Orthodox Men's Society annual awards dinner was held at St. Michael's Carpatho-Russian Orthodox Church hall in Youngstown, Ohio.

The Eastern Orthodox Men's Society was the first organization of its kind in the Midwestern United States. It has effectively become the instrument by which its members, representing the Orthodox churches in Mahoning County, are able to join together as one family of brothers in Christ.

The idea of forming the Eastern Orthodox Men's Society originated with a group of dedicated orthodox laymen. Their purposes were: To effect a more perfect and harmonious understanding between the community at large and the members of the various Eastern Orthodox churches in the Mahoning Valley; to stimulate the spirit of good fellowship and cooperation, and to serve the community and country by taking a more active role in community affairs.

The official motto of the society is "Unity Through Truth," signifying its existence because of the truth which the Eastern Orthodox faith represents, and the belief that through truth alone can unity come about.

The Eastern Orthodox Men's Society has made a great contribution to better understanding, cooperation, and good will among all the people of the Mahoning Valley. Because of the society, more men and women are taking an active interest in the well-being of our community and the Nation.

Each year, the Eastern Orthodox Men's Society presents awards to recognize individuals who have contributed in some outstanding way to the community. The Community Service Award this year was given to Stephen R. Olenick in recognition of the outstanding contributions he has made to our community. With the objective of rewarding service performed, the Clergyman of the Year award was given to Rev. John Alexandrou for outstanding lay activity and personal achievement. The Eastern Orthodox Men's Society also honored Mr. Theodore Senediak and Mrs. Dorothy Marion Sirbu as the Eastern Orthodox man of the year and woman of the year. For his part in the formation and leadership of the Eastern Orthodox Youth Society, Terrance A. Bilas was presented the Youth of the Year Award.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to heartily commend all of the officers and members of the Eastern Orthodox Men's Society, and to congratulate this year's award winners.

I would also like to insert portions of the 16th annual awards dinner program in the RECORD at this time:

PROGRAM

Raising of the Colors: Boy Scout Troop 111—St. John Orthodox Church—Campbell, Ohio—Scout Master John Kundracik.

Pledge of Allegiance.

Invocation: Rev. James Dokos, Pastor, St. Nicholas Greek Orthodox Church.

Welcome: Nicholas Pavelko, President, Eastern Orthodox Men's Society.

Toastmaster: George Mays.

Entertainment: Music by the Liby-4 Tamburitzas.

Remarks: Phillip J. Richley, Mayor—City of Youngstown.

PRESENTATIONS

Community Service Award to Stephen R. Olenick. Presented by Senator Harry Meshel.

Eastern Orthodox Clergyman of the Year Award to Rev. John Alexandrou. Presented by Rev. Fr. Kiril Antonoff.

Eastern Orthodox Man of the Year Award to Theodore Senediak. Presented by Dr. Matthew Siman.

Orthodox Woman of the Year Award to Dorothy M. Sirbu. Presented by Olga Bilas—President of Eastern Orthodox Woman's Society.

Orthodox Youth of the Year Award to Terrence A. Bilas. Presented by Socrates Kolitsos—Youth Advisor.

Mahoning County Resolutions to the Award Recipients. Presented by George Bindas, County Commissioner.

Ohio State Senate Resolutions. Presented by Senator Harry Meshel.

Closing Remarks: Dr. Matthew Siman.

Benediction: Very Rev. William Olynyk, Pastor, Sts. Peter and Paul Church.●

ANNOUNCEMENT OF NATIONAL GOAL TO LAND ON MOON HISTORIC MOMENT 17 YEARS AGO

HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. TEAGUE. Mr. Speaker, today is the 17th anniversary of President John F. Kennedy's historic 1961 announcement of our national goal of landing a man on the moon and returning him safely to Earth before the end of that decade.

Mr. Speaker, as the Members of this body know, that goal was overwhelmingly approved by Congress. In fact, the House Committee on Science and Astronautics had advocated such a goal 10 months earlier. And, as a result of the Presidential commitment, we saw an accelerated space program that was to have a critical impact on the future of this Nation.

President Kennedy's announcement was made in his state of the Union address to Congress on May 25, 1961. He reported that:

With the advice of the Vice President, who is Chairman of the National Space Council, we have examined where we (United States) are strong and where we are not, where we may succeed and where we may not. Now is the time to take longer strides—time for a great new American enterprise—time for this Nation to take a clearly leading role in space achievement which in many ways may hold the key to our future on Earth.

And, at a NASA press conference that day following the President's call to Congress for the accelerated space program, NASA Administrator Webb pointed out that the long range and difficult task of landing a man on the Moon and returning him safely to Earth before the end of the decade offered a chance to beat Russia.

The following day, the White House handed Congress a new set of budget figures to increase funding for NASA projects. And, in testimony before the House Science and Astronautics Committee, Dr. Hugh Dryden, NASA Deputy Administrator assured Congress that:

The billions required in this effort are not spent on the Moon; they are spent in the factories, workshops and laboratories of our people for salaries, new materials, and supplies which in turn represent income for others. The national enterprise involved in the goal of a manned lunar landing and return within this decade is an activity of critical impact on the future of this nation as an industrial and military power, and as a leader of a free world.

Mr. Speaker, the year 1961 is regarded as the most hectic year in NASA's history. The acceleration of the space program called for a reorganization of the space agency. Plans for flights around the Earth using the Apollo spacecraft were moved up from 1967 to 1965, and circumlunar flights from 1969 to 1967. A budget add-on permitted the establishment of a target date for the lunar landing in the 1969–70 time period.

Much of NASA's long-range planning was altered, especially in lunar-related activities. New hardware had to be developed and much research conducted. In early 1961, there were many unknowns concerning the problems that would be encountered in achieving the manned lunar landing. It was the beginning of a period of rapid growth that was necessary for the national goal to be met.

Mr. Speaker, the glory days of the space program came in the 1960's. It was full of life and the Nation's intention to explore space for peaceful purposes for the benefit of all mankind had the full support of the American public.

Millions of people throughout the world thrilled to Astronaut Neil Armstrong's announcement on July 20, 1969, "Tranquility Base here: The Eagle has landed."

And, with that historical mission, the United States met its national goal. Man for the first time set foot on another celestial body, began its exploration, and returned safely to Earth. This accomplishment caused a cooperative feeling that transcended national boundaries. The devotion and skill of thousands of men and women over many years made that success possible.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud of the contribution made by this body toward the successful accomplishment of the national lunar landing goal. There are many challenges ahead for the American people in all fields of national interest and I believe that we should pause and reflect upon the successful manned lunar landing as an outstanding example of what a united American people are capable of accomplishing.●

WHERE WE STAND

HON. WILLIAM M. BRODHEAD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. Speaker, soon the House will begin debate on tuition tax credit proposals. While the controversy over tax credits for elementary and secondary school tuition has captured the attention of most of us, we should not overlook the issue of tuition tax credits for postsecondary education.

A tax credit for postsecondary education tuition holds out a false promise of meaningful assistance to hard-pressed, working class, middle income families struggling to educate their children. Before promising the families of students that they will receive real help through a tuition tax credit, we should carefully examine exactly what this proposal really provides.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I commend to the attention of my colleagues a recent article by a highly respected leader in education, Mr. Albert Shanker, president of the American Federation of Teachers, entitled "Tax Credits No Answer to College Costs":

WHERE WE STAND

Most of the bitter fight over tuition tax credits has focused on elementary and secondary schools. The reason for this is clear. Tuition tax credits which would pay parents up to $500 per child for private and parochial school education (with inevitable pressure in later years to increase the amount) would destroy our public schools. The fight over this issue has been so hot and heavy that most people have forgotten the original purpose of the tuition tax credit proposal. It was confined to higher education and designed to help with the cost of going to college. Many, many families have found college costs increasingly burdensome—and this is especially true if their income is not enough to meet these costs but too much to qualify for the special help available to the poor. Some studies, of course, have shown that middle class family income has increased more than college costs over the same period. But there is little question that a family of modest means which has several children in college finds itself hard-pressed each year to come up with the thousands of dollars required for their education.

The effects of tuition tax credits for college education would not be the same as their impact on elementary and secondary schools. Public higher education would not be destroyed. Nevertheless, almost all of the national groups which are fighting against tuition tax credits for elementary and secondary schools are also against the higher education tax credit—but for reasons which are quite different.

One reason is that the financial assistance would go to all who are in college regardless of need. This means that the taxpayer would be asked to foot the bill for the college education of those from very rich families and that the very rich would get the same help as the middle class and the very poor. For the rich, $500 means a little extra spending money; for the poor, it is not enough for college.

There is another inequity along the same lines. Families with higher incomes tend to send their children to private colleges and universities with high tuition—and would be eligible for the full $500 tax credit in the pending Senate legislation. Families in the lower income ranges more often have children in public institutions—municipal or state colleges—which have much lower tuition. In some instances, that tuition is less than $1,000—which means that such a family could not get the full $500. Of course, there would be an incentive for public colleges to raise their tuition, which would put more money in the family's pocket from tax credits but take it out again in the form of higher costs.

Another reason for the massive opposition to higher education tuition tax credits is that they would ultimately come to replace programs which already exist to aid college students. These programs are now inadequate, but President Carter has proposed vast improvements in them. At the end of last month, the President asked Congress for $1.21 billion to implement the middle-income student assistance plan he first set forth in February—a program which would extend eligibility under Basic Education Opportunity Grants and open up college work-study programs and guaranteed student loans. This amount would be in addition to student aid increases the President asked for in his regular budget for next year. In a statement commenting on the various types of financial assistance, the American Council on Education said: "There is no question in our minds that [families who need help to meet the costs of college] would receive far greater benefits, with far greater equity, for the student aid approach advanced by the Administration . . . than from any tax credit bill."

Another approach to tuition aid—called the Tuition Advance Fund (T.A.F.)—was hailed this week by The New York Times as "a bold plan." Proposed by Rep. Michael Harrington of Massachusetts and John Silber, president of Boston University, the idea is to have the federal government advance $5,000 a year to students—who would pay back the money (plus interest) after graduation at the rate of 2 percent of annual earnings. The money would be collected with income taxes. Those with higher earnings would pay more annually and complete their obligation faster—those whose earnings were less could take much longer. "But, in every case," said The Times, "the tuition barrier to college would be lowered, and the burden largely transferred from parents and taxpayers to the students themselves."

The Tuition Advance Fund idea merits further study. But clearly, like the President's proposals, it would provide the kind of tuition assistance that would be real—that would make the difference for many families between obtaining a college education for their children and not obtaining it. Much more money would be available than with a $500 tax credit.

If other alternatives are better, the question which immediately comes to mind is: Why is the tuition tax credit idea so popular? Why has it spread so rapidly? The answer is that the tuition tax credit is a simple idea. Everyone knows just how much he or she will get—$500 under the Senate proposal, somewhat less in House bills. Most students would get more under the Carter programs, but since these are based on formulas—with different aid going to different students—it's impossible quickly and simply to demonstrate that students will be better off than with the tax credits. If each student, perhaps with the help of a high school or college counselor, actually figured out the help under both systems, the tuition tax credit support would dwindle rapidly.

Before Congress plunges into enacting tuition tax credit, even for higher education, perhaps representatives and senators ought to find out what their constituents really want. Do they want something which barely makes a dent in the college bill—with a disproportionate amount of the total benefit going to the wealthy? Or do they want legislation that will make college truly possible without a destructive kind of self-sacrifice? If the latter is what they want, tuition tax credits are not the answer.●

JIM SCHNEIDER: TAKING THE INITIATIVE IN THE CAUSE OF FREEDOM

HON. JOHN M. ASHBROOK

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, nowadays when the Federal Government is promising everything but eternal salvation via Federal aid, the story of James C. Schneider, editor of Gun Week of Sidney, Ohio, and his efforts to free two Soviet citizens from Communist oppression are encouraging, edifying, and instructive.

His lesson of individual initiative and responsibility is heartening proof that these values, both at home and abroad, are so necessary if the cause of freedom is to eventually encircle the slave states of the world while preserving American citizens from degenerating into Federal automatons and lock-step wooden soldiers.

In May of last year Jim visited Israel and met Mrs. Lazaris, whose husband had been for 4 years awaiting official approval to leave the Soviet Union. He also met Wolf Gordin, whose son, Yaskov Gordin, had first sought to leave Latvia, now under Soviet control, in 1963. Returning home Jim began his crusade to free the Soviet captives. His strategy, allies, and weapons were quite simple:

Average Americans can help bring freedom to other human beings. And for Americans it doesn't require war or revolution, only some time spent writing letters.

After months of letter writing to American officials, who in turn confronted Soviet officials, word was received last February that both Lazaris and Gordin were safe in Israel.

Typically, Jim Schneider attributed their success to a cooperative effort on the part of concerned citizens:

There were dozens, perhaps hundreds, of people working to get Lazaris and Gordin out of the Soviet Union long before I got involved in the effort. It wouldn't be fair to underestimate their efforts.

I insert at this point in the RECORD the column by Ray Saidel entitled "One Man Can Fight Evil" which appeared in the Manchester (N.H.) Union Leader on February 23, 1978:

[From the Manchester (N.H.) Union Leader, Feb. 23, 1978]

ONE MAN CAN FIGHT EVIL!

(By Ray Saidel)

I have a hero—he is James C. Schneider. He lives at 873 St. Mary's Ave., Sidney, Ohio, and he edits Gun Week Newspaper.

Jim took on the U.S.S.R. in a tug-of-war over two men. He is important—not for the lives he pried from the jaws of the world's biggest bureaucracy, not because of the happiness he brought waiting relatives but because of the lesson he teaches—individuals, with courage, self sacrifice and determination can fight and succeed—even against tremendous authority and evil. He has proven the value of individual effort.

Esther Lazaris, wife of Vladimir Lazaris, and her son, Rafi, had been waiting more than four years for the Russians to release her husband. In May of 1977, Mrs. Lazaris told me, "My husband is still in Moscow all these years refused exit; first on the grounds that he knew state secrets . . . this is absolutely untrue because he worked in an Institute of Research for Building Materials, work never listed as secret; never did he have secret files."

Vladimir, 30, was dismissed from work after applying to leave the U.S.S.R. in October 1974. First refused on grounds of "State Secrets"—subsequently refused with no explanation; being "blacklisted" and out of work is serious in the Soviet Union; you can be sent to prison. Vladimir was hounded almost daily by the KGB.

Yaakov Gordin, born Feb. 23, 1946, a laborer in Riga (Soviet occupied Latvia), applied to leave the U.S.S.R. in 1963; applications were denied as "inexpedient." Drafted into the Soviet Army in 1966, he served as an ordinary soldier until 1968—then his applications were denied on the grounds of army service.

Ten years more passed. Yaakov's parents and brother waited for him in Israel—in 1974 his mother died; he was refused permission to attend the funeral.

Last May, in Israel to gather story material about wildlife preservation, shooting sports, etc.—Schneider met Mrs. Lazaris and heard her story; he also met Gordin's father, Wolf.

Jim paid special attention and told me if there was one thing he was going to do in the next year it would be to rescue these two men. He had no previous experience with the "Struggle of Soviet Jewry"; why should he? Jim lives in Sidney, Ohio (population 13,000), not exactly a center of Jewish culture. He belongs to a Christian religious denomination—The WAY.

Frankly, I appreciated his fervor, but felt fighting the Russians, would wear him down—it didn't.

Jim is interesting; 34 years old, an accomplished writer and editor—somewhere along the line he's made a decision to do his utmost to make the world a better place. It affects his every action.

In June of 1977, I started to receive copies of a stream of letters Jim sent out, along with notes explaining his follow-up; progress and setbacks; the people who should have helped but who were "too busy" with vacation plans; the Senators and Congressmen who responded—and those who didn't.

In July, Jim received a letter from Mrs. Lazaris dated June 26, 1977 stating that KGB "searches and threats" to her husband had stopped in mid-June. He was starting to have an effect.

Months passed; he kept at it. The State Department and the Russians were being driven up the wall by a one-man task force who wouldn't quit.

One November morning, my phone rang. Jim had just been informed by Sen. Clifford Case's office that the State Department had information the Russians were granting Vladimir Lazaris an exit visa.

We talked about it in January.

Jim said: "IT CAN BE DONE, the point is most people, even relatives and those who should be intimately concerned like American Jews don't even attempt to help get these people out of the Soviet Union because they don't think their efforts would do any good. They are wrong. Before I started I wanted to be sure my efforts wouldn't hurt more than they would help. Mrs. Lazaris told me, 'When you apply to leave the Soviet Union, you have already stuck your head in the noose; the more publicity from outside the Soviet Union, the better the chances the noose won't be tightened.' This destroys the theory of millions of Americans that it is better to sit back and quietly let the State Department handle these matters in a 'discreet' manner."

Jim told me of the excellent response he had with most members of Congress taking action via the State Department. Sen. Birch Bayh of Indiana and Sen. H. John Heinz III of Penn. contacted Soviet ambassador Dobrynin; Sen. Case of N.J. contacted the Helsinki Commission; Sen. Lugar of Indiana wrote Col. Obidin, chief of Dept. of Visas in the U.S.S.R.; Sen. Moynihan of N.Y. worked through the U.S. embassy in Moscow; Sen. Harrison Williams Jr. of N.J. wrote personally to Chairman Brezhnev and the U.S. Embassy in Moscow raised the Lazaris case with the Soviet Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

On Feb. 8, Jim called again. He had just received word that Vladimir Lazaris and Yaakov Gordin were safe in Israel. Jim said: "Average Americans can help bring freedom to other human beings. And for Americans it doesn't require war or revolution, only some time spent writing letters."

He reminded me of Esther Lazaris's comment: "When you apply to leave the Soviet Union, you have already stuck your head in the noose." He said: "To a surprisingly large extent, the American public has the power to cut the rope. Of course by sitting on their duffs the American public also has the power to kick the chair out from under those tens of thousands of Soviet Jews who have already put their necks in the noose."

Others made a try but James Schneider's devotion and work is what freed these men—I know. He said to me: "There were dozens, perhaps hundreds, of people working to get Lazaris and Gordin out of the Soviet Union long before I got involved in the effort. It wouldn't be fair to underestimate their efforts."

That's just like Jim.●

HOUSE APPROPRIATIONS COMMITTEE CUTS RENEGOTIATION BOARD'S FISCAL YEAR 1979 BUDGET REQUEST BY 59 PERCENT

HON. MARK W. HANNAFORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. HANNAFORD. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House Appropriations Committee reported legislation which tells the Renegotiation Board that it will receive only $3 million out of a requested $7,277,000 for fiscal year 1979 and that these funds will only be available until March 31, 1979.

Mr. Speaker, the action taken by the Appropriations Committee is commendable and proves that within a year's time many other Members of Congress have been convinced of the Board's ineptitude and the fact that it is a bureaucratic anachronism.

I also wish to call to the attention of my colleagues the report language accompanying this legislation. The committee report at page 50 states that:

The Committee feels it is appropriate to consider termination of the Renegotiation Board itself.

The report further states that:

The Committee recommends the appropriation in order to give the Board an opportunity to deal with cases having the most potential for recovery of excess profits and in order to give the appropriate authorizing committees of the Congress an opportunity to deal with the question of the continued existence of the Board.

I believe that the committee's recommendation is a wise one and that it addresses the heart of the controversy surrounding the Renegotiation Board. Specifically, the Board spends thousands of hours on cases involving small businesses having negligible "excessive" profits. As a matter of fact, in fiscal year 1977, the Board's actual cash recoveries were only about $600,000 and it cost $6 million to operate the Board. Furthermore, between 1972 and 1976, the Board made "excess" profits determinations totaling about $85 million which were appealed to the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims, after review, eliminated more than $50 million of the Board's determinations. Thus, the average annual amount of determinations over a 5-year period equals roughly $6 million before taxes. It is apparent that the Board's operations are cost-ineffective.

It makes no sense for agencies of the Federal Government to pursue policies which penalize innovation and efficiency in the private sector or those that attempt to control profit levels as this agency does.

The Defense Department's 3 separate contract administering and monitoring agencies' employees number about 54,000 and include 9,000 auditors. Their operations cost about $1 billion a year and one agency, the DCAA, can recover for the U.S. Government $20 for every $1 spent in auditor salaries. Moreover, these agencies protect taxpayer funds by stringently negotiating costs, and costs—not profit levels—are the essential factor.

Mr. Speaker, report language accompanying the committee's legislation also instructs the Board to "concentrate on the disposition of the backlog" and advises the Board against rewriting regulations as the Board has done in the case of foreign military sales and segmentation. The committee states that such activities of the Board "seem highly inappropriate in view of the fact that no extension of the Renegotiation Act has been granted." ●

CARTER'S PERFORMANCE

HON. SAMUEL L. DEVINE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. DEVINE. Mr. Speaker, with good reason, a number of columnists seem to feel that the public is disenchanted with the record being compiled by President Carter.

The New York Times today, in an article entitled "On Urban Policy," by Carla Hills, former Secretary of Housing and Urban Development, carefully analyzes Carter's urban policy.

ON URBAN POLICY

(By Carla Hills)

WASHINGTON.—The most disappointing aspect of President Carter's recently announced urban policy is that its framers have learned so little from the past. They might have considered, for example, President Gerald R. Ford's interim report on urban policy, issued in October 1976.

The Ford report found the delivery of Federal aid to urban areas through a multitude of disjointed and overlapping categorical grants to be inefficient and ineffective. Individual Federal grants for sewers, parks or similarly narrow categories of urban need undercut local government's capacity to link public and private resources. Citizens at the neighborhood level were frustrated when no Federal program was available to meet their community's pressing needs but money was visably available for less-essential purposes.

For example, Federal funds were often available to build nonessential sewers in a community but not to rehabilitate the much-needed housing stock in its troubled neighborhoods. Such program restrictions insulated local officials from accountability to their citizens. When urban renewal destroyed sound urban neighborhoods, local officials blamed Washington—while Federal bureaucrats, without electoral accountability, made detailed plans for communities they had never seen.

The Ford report recommended a dramatic restructuring of Federal aid to the cities. It proposed the consolidation of many existing Federal aid programs into broader, more flexible block grants. The report recommended consolidation of Federal housing assistance, urban surface transportation, health, and education aid programs into four block grants, with other similar reorganizations to follow. These grants would encourage state and local governments to adapt Federal aid to their conditions.

Accountability for the use of these new grants would be clearly fixed—usually in elected officials who answer at the polls for their decisions. The participation of citizens and their neighborhood associations in the management of the grants would be mandated. The rights, needs and interests of minority citizens would be protected. Local management and planning capacities would be improved and performance standards imposed. The flexibility of block grants would encourage regional cooperation.

Like the Ford report, the Carter statement called for an increased emphasis on restoring the economic health of cities and for directed Federal aid to distressed people and places. Both reports recognize that Government alone cannot solve the cities' problems and call for new public-and-private partnerships. The recommendations for tax incentives, job scholarships and Federal guarantees for economic development are strikingly similar.

But the strength that might have come from these similarities is lost in the approach Mr. Carter's proposal adopts to deliver Federal resources.

Unlike the Ford proposal, in Mr. Carter's not a single existing Federal program is to be consolidated or eliminated. Instead, Mr. Carter proposes to multiply the already dizzying array of narrow categorical grant programs and the maze of red tape that plagues local officials. Every domestic agency seems to have received a payoff in the form of a new program or added funding for an existing one.

For example, the report proposes additional funding for parks, and a host of other equally narrow programs thus again causing local citizens to ask: How can the Government make money available for projects that we do not need in our community yet refuse to make money available for projects we desperately need here?

The cornerstone of the report is the Urban Development Bank, a massive new entity, created to duplicate functions already being performed elsewhere and to be run by three different Federal agencies—not one—which clearly should be the case.

The recipients of this labyrinth of new programs would include neighborhood groups, mayors, governors and various newly created entities, independent of local elected officials. This broad dispersal of decision-making muddies accountability and hamstrings local government's capacity to put scarce public resources to their best use.

President Carter's approval of the recent Urban Policy Report is sadly inconsistent with his rhetorical commitment to reorganizing government to improve efficiency, responsiveness and accountability. Giving something to everyone may have allowed him to avoid tough political decisions but it regretfully reduces this nation's ability to meet the needs of its cities.

George Will, in a column earlier this week, outlined Administration policies as defeatist and included a great deal of thought provoking material.

ADMINISTRATION POLICIES ARE DEFEATIST

(By George Will)

WASHINGTON.—As is often the case with the Carter administration, the kindest interpretation of the timing of Zbigniew Brzezinski's trip to Peking is that the administration does not know what it is doing. As is often the case, that interpretation is too kind.

The administration allowed the national security adviser's trip to be scheduled to begin May 20, the day the Republic of China (Taiwan) will inaugurate a new president. No representative of the Carter administration attended the inauguration. The administration is collaborating with the Communists by signaling disdain for a nation with which the United States has—inconveniently in the opinion of some people—relations of friendship, a defense treaty, and trade second only to that with Japan among Pacific nations.

The administration is riddled with people who would, if they could, sever ties with the Republic of China and leave it at the mercy of Peking. They cannot do so because Congress and the country would not stand for it. And there is fresh evidence that a movement of opposition to the administration's foreign policy is taking shape and finding voices.

The evidence is in the transcript of a conversation published in the American Enterprise Institute's magazine Public Opinion (May–June 1978). The conversationalists, Henry Kissinger and Sen. Daniel Moynihan, agree that (in Kissinger's words):

". . . at the second and third levels of this administration, many people came in who are 'graduates' of (the) Vietnam period . . . They have convictions that if America is not to be punished for its presumption, then at least we must be sure that the country is never presumptuous enough to undertake any more distant enterprises."

One problem, according to Kissinger, is the recurring tendency of complacent societies "to escape current dilemmas by making the most favorable assumption about the future. This temptation . . . is one reason why the communist challenge has been interpreted in the most benign fashion in every decade in the existence of communism." Moynihan believes that another important problem today is fear, as shown in recent debates about Africa.

"We are continually told today," says Moynihan, "that we have to do this or that, accept this or that unattractive option because if we do not, the Russians will send in the Cubans. And this settles an argument!" "What has become of our country," asks Kissinger, "when we explain foreign policy by the myth of the invincible Cubans?"

What Kissinger calls the "defeatist consensus" in the "traditional establishment" is apparent in the administration's approach to strategic arms limitation.

"Remarkably," says Moynihan, "we now have senior officials of this administration coming around to us in the Senate saying we must have a SALT treaty soon because if we do not, by the mid-1980's the Soviets will have surpassed us in strategic power. I can imagine what you, Henry, would think about a negotiating position in which the other side had only to wait 2,000 days to get to where they want to be."

Surely, Moynihan insists, the United States must be able to make a believable threat to increase its defense effort enough to convince the Soviets that they must negotiate acceptable limits. The administration is unwilling to make any such threat and as Moynihan says, ". . . if you have psychologically discarded that bargaining technique, then, in fact, you are disarmed."

The similarity of Kissinger's and Moynihan's views is interesting; so is the dissimilarity of their situations. When Moynihan, a Democrat with a large and growing constituency in the country, agrees with Kissinger's diagnosis ("I do not believe . . . that there is a public problem. In this country we have a leadership problem."), the logic of Moynihan's thought points toward action.

When Moynihan says that "American policy is beginning to accommodate to the assumption that the Soviets are now, or soon will be, the superior military power," he and the administration do not have what Milton called "neighboring differences." What is at issue is fundamental. It is the adequacy of the administration's policy affecting the safety of the state. And in a nation that provides for regular and orderly challenges to incumbent leadership, such an issue should produce a political challenge.

Finally, Columnist Jim Bishop, who is not known for being a conservative Republican, published an article in the Columbus, Ohio, Citizen-Journal of May 23, entitled "You've lost another supporter, Mr. President." All Members should read this discerning article which concludes as follows:

I'm stubborn in my loyalties. But not, I hope, crazy . . .

YOU'VE LOST ANOTHER SUPPORTER, MR. PRESIDENT

(By Jim Bishop)

It required considerable soul-searching on my part, but I no longer see the president as our grinning saviour. I championed his cause in the days of the early primaries when people were asking "Jimmy who?" His popularity rating is of small importance. His efficiency is poor.

I have worked in and around politics for four decades and I know of no chief executive in history so well endowed with intellect and self-proclaimed honor. At every other turn in the road he has failed us.

When he assumed office on Jan. 20, 1977, our problems were unemployment, inflation, energy, the Middle East and the dollar. Fourteen months later the same enigmas plague us.

Carter called himself the "outsider," the non-establishment non-Washingtonian. In this he was eminently correct. A successful president needs allies in the House, the Senate, the Supreme Court and the press. Carter alienated all of them in the first year.

He even tried to alter his personality. For a few months he was sweet, closing, coaxing. When it didn't produce results, Mr. Carter changed to his aloof, above-politics attitude. When that failed, he became the harsh critic who denounced the Soviet Union, Israel, the Bar Association and the American Medical Association.

He is the first president who refused to support the American dollar. When it collapsed on foreign markets, the Japanese and the Germans spent billions trying to put crutches under it. Carter did nothing.

Retail prices and wages go higher and higher, but our president will not threaten wage and price controls. He could ration gasoline and oil by fiat to cut our witless use of energy, but he won't. Carter desires to "persuade" Americans. He does not seem to realize that we have always been accustomed to having the best, and we will not settle for less on a volunteer basis.

This man of peace, a reborn Christian, sells more weapons to the world than anyone since F.D.R. and World War II. He preaches human rights to Russia, Africa and Brazil, but he hasn't got it here. As a nation, we are powerful, not noble.

In his early days, he inundated the Congress with so many bills that Speaker of the House Thomas P. O'Neill almost disappeared behind his desk. Carter's leader in the Senate, Robert Byrd, couldn't reach Carter on the phone. As Jody Powell said: "It's surprising that a man who would stop to shake hands with any man on any street refuses to phone a congressman to ask for his support."

The president says he has not given a thought to a second term. This from a man who swore that he would never lie to us. Unless he is incapacitated, Carter is sure to run for a second term.

At that time, he will be busy explaining how he not only cannot balance the budget, but how he managed to drop us deeper into debt. It will be difficult for the Democratic Party to dump an incumbent. It cannot be done without a sense of shame.

In the summer of 1932, the Republican Party decided to stick with a loser, Herbert Hoover. By November, the party was in tatters. It was beaten so decisively that it remained out of power for 20 years. Then it nominated a hero who had never voted and wasn't sure he was a Republican—Dwight D. Eisenhower.

I'm stubborn in my loyalties. But not, I hope, crazy.●

GUARANTEED STUDENT LOAN PROGRAM

HON. ANDREW MAGUIRE

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Speaker, last week Congressman WILLIAM STEIGER and I introduced H.R. 12756, the Capital Availability for Higher Education Amendments of 1978.

This legislation addresses many of the severe problems of the Guaranteed Student Loan program, a program which in concept provides students the type of financial assistance they need most without draining the Federal Treasury.

I wish to share with my colleagues the following description and summary of the Guaranteed Student Loan program, its benefits, potential, and problems, together with a discussion of what the Capital Availability for Higher Education Amendments seek to accomplish:

THE GUARANTEED STUDENT LOAN PROGRAM

Financial institutions participating in the Guaranteed Student Loan (GSL) Program are the single best source for directing private capital to higher education. The GSL Program leverages Federal expenditures about four times over since it relies chiefly on privately raised capital. The costs to the Federal government result from defaults, deaths of borrowers, interest subsidies, payback deferrals, and special interest allowances to lenders. Moreover, as a loan for which the borrower is responsible, the choice of a more expensive education rests with students who know they will ultimately have to bear the full cost of their decisions.

The GLS Program, however, suffers from several problems that have kept it from fulfilling its full promise:

Geographical Unavailability.—Institutions choosing not to participate do so in geographic patterns. Availability is good in the Northeast for historic reasons and because of supportive State laws, but very poor on the west coast and in California where one bank holds more than half the outstanding loans. This is a deficiency in a National program.

Case-to-case Capriciousness.—Frequently small institutions discriminate between those borrowers with a deposit relationship and likely to remain customers, and those who don't have such a relationship for a year before applying. Banks view GSL's as a "consumer giveaway" similar to blenders or alarm clocks. Nondiscrimination clauses in current law are not effective.

Loan Ceilings Too Low.—Currently, under law, students may borrow only $2,500 a year even when they have access to a lender, and this is frequently insufficient to pick up the gap in financing they need to choose the education of their choice. A ceiling of $3,500 would, in virtually all instances, assure full financing when supplemented by other resources usually available.

Aversity to poor risk loans.—"Poor risks" include the lions share of most needy students, and most of them would, in fact, pay off the loan if given a chance. This is the very group for which policy should be most accommodating, and for which a Federal guarantee should, in principle, most leverage Federal contributions. But three problems confront lending institutions:

(1) Federal lending origination standards measure performance by defaults, so there is a great incentive to "cream" the best borrowers; in fact, many defaults are accounted for by ripoffs of financing substandard educations—mail order degree factories and so forth;

(2) The inflexible loan servicing systems banks are willing to institute require a steady stream of monthly fixed payments regardless of income; more flexibility before default would sustain the borrower's credit rating and increase the ease of collection;

(3) Servicing costs associated with "poor risk" borrowers are significantly higher since the borrowers tend to be harder to keep track of. In general, the administrative problems of managing the collection system of long-term, unsecured loans are burdensome and much nonparticipation in the Program is attributable to this.

Shortage of funds.—The GSL program has been lending in excess of $1 billion annually. This is not enough to pick up the slack in financing needs. The Student Loan Marketing Association (Sallie Mae), a quasi-public federally chartered market similar to Fannie Mae, has not adequately funnelled capital to private lending institutions to relieve them of holding the loan paper themselves. For example, out of $6 billion of loans outstanding, Sallie Mae only owns or has financed about $600 million, a much smaller percentage than secondary markets provide for home mortgages.

Possible too low return for lenders.—Lenders supply funds to the GSL Program, in the marginal case, only if the return is competitive with other uses of capital. But under the current "special allowance" formula (which subsidizes the interest return to the bank during the collection period based on short-term market interest rates for government securities), banks may not be receiving a high enough return to include as many marginal cases as would otherwise be desirable.

THE CAPITAL AVAILABILITY FOR HIGHER EDUCATION AMENDMENT OF 1978 (H.R. 12756)

This program of immediate changes in the GSL Program is intended to take significant steps toward ameliorating the above problems, and otherwise enhance capital availability. It is expected that it will be very appealing to the Nation's banks, as well as to students who are seeking, not a free ride, but a place to borrow money to purchase the ticket.

I. Increase Borrowing Ceilings to $3,500 from $2,500.—This should broaden the choice of affordable institutions of higher education at once for a substantial group of students from middle income families.

II. Permit Participating GSL Lending Institutions to Purchase Loan Collection Service from the Federal Government.—While loan origination practices should be carefully monitored to assure the government agrees to collect only eligible loans, this would relieve the banks of substantial administrative and managerial burdens they are ill-equipped to handle—a significant cause of patchy program participation nationwide. Additionally, direct payments to banks from the government would not be subject to overly rigid "performance" criteria relating to default rates, since the government would have responsibility for collecting the loan. Further, a firm non-discrimination standard will be enforced for banks purchasing the collection service. Banks relieved of the added costs associated with "poor risks" will again consider this group as qualified borrowers. The government will then pay obligations directly to banks as due. The collection service will cost banks one half percent of the interest subsidy the government pays during the repayment period. The savings on this subsidy—called the "special allowance"—will help finance any additional cost to the IRS.

III. The Government will Collect the Loans through the Internal Revenue System.—Collections will be through the income tax to which all citizens are subject, and be based on the student borrower's ability to pay as measured by his or her adjusted gross income. Borrowers will make annual installments until they have repaid the principle and 7 percent interest on the outstanding balances—the current rate charged for GSL's. The Internal Revenue Service shall provide simple tables to facilitate computations, and take other administrative steps to ease the responsibility of the borrower. This method of collection benefits from economies of scale since the collection system is already in place, and the IRS endeavors to keep track of all taxpayers already. The flexibility permitted by the system would increase the likelihood of faithful paybacks.

IV. Appointment of Blue Ribbon Panel to Report to Congress Within the Year.—A Blue Ribbon Panel composed of two College administrators dealing with the National Defense Student Loan Program, two representatives of participationg GSL institutions, one from a non-participating institution, two academics familiar with the field of student assistance, the appropriate assistant secretaries of HEW and Treasury, a former student GSL borrower or representative of a student organization, and an expert from Sallie Mae. The panel will be instructed to review:

(1) The adequacy of the special allowance formula to draw sufficient capital into the program, with consideration of an "incremental special allowance" graduated to provide additional incentives the higher the loan volume handled by an institution;

(2) The feasibility of instituting a Student Loan Bank of Last Resort, with attention to the problems of avoiding substitution for currently offered loans; and

(3) Other major questions as they shall identify.●

LET US REPEAL METRIC CONVERSION

HON. ELDON RUDD

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, an article in the latest issue of U.S. News & World Report indicates that there is widespread opposition throughout the United States to metric conversion.

Public opposition to changing our system of weights and measures from the traditional English system to the metric system is especially strong in my own State of Arizona. Judging by the reports I have read, people everywhere are similarly angry about Government efforts to force them into using this foreign measurement—switching from inches and feet, ounces and pounds, and miles per hour, to centimeters and meters, grams and kilograms, and kilometers per hour.

I do not believe that our Government should impose such an unpopular change in our lifestyle upon the American people. It is my belief that Congress should avoid wherever possible legislation that will cause undue or harmful socioeconomic dislocations as the result of Federal Government programs or actions.

I have therefore today introduced a bill to repeal the Metric Conversion Act of 1975. I will welcome cosponsors of this proposed legislation, and hope that Congress will have the wisdom to repeal Federal Government efforts to promote and impose the metric system upon an unaccepting public.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to include the U.S. News & World Report article, a good column on this subject by Patrick Buchanan, and the text of my proposed bill, at this point in the RECORD:

[From the News & World Report, May 29, 1978]

SOME POTHOLES ON THE ROAD TO METRICS

(A funny thing happened to the big changeover to liters and meters, supposed to be under way now. Consumer resistance is upsetting plans.)

America's much-heralded shift to the metric system is turning out to be highly uneven—and is meeting with increasing public resistance.

As a result, while you'll almost certainly be measuring soon in liters and probably will be using Celsius for gauging temperatures, it will be a long time before you are forced into routine use of meters or kilograms, much less hectares, kilopascals and newtons.

The facts about slow conversion to metrics are these:

Everyone who buys bottles of almost anything will need to know about liters shortly. All of the major U.S. soft-drink companies began converting to liter packaging in 1976, and there is a big trend toward the 2-liter no-return polyester bottle. After this year, wine will be sold only in metric sizes.

Most '78-model cars are being built largely to metric measurements, but this won't affect drivers much. Mechanics, however, will have to use tools marked off in centimeters and millimeters in repairing the newer U.S. cars.

Computers and business machines are also in the process of conversion from inches to centimeters. International Business Machines Corporation is just past the halfway mark and expects to complete its shift to metric by 1982. But this, too, will not require most people to learn and use any different measurements.

CHEMICAL CONVERSION

One major industry—chemicals—is planning a complete changeover, with a deadline in the near future. The shipping and billing of bulk and packaged chemicals for industrial use are to be wholly metric by the end of 1980, industry representatives say. Conversion from ounces to grams for all packaged chemicals sold to consumers is to be completed two years later.

Meanwhile, the process of converting highway signs from miles to kilometers is under way, and signs using both measurements appear on many interstate highways. But the driver resistance is increasing, judging by letters to editors and complaints to highway departments. So a complete conversion to kilometers is nowhere in sight.

Prospects for shifting weather reports completely from Fahrenheit to Celsius are rated a bit higher; forecasts in both measurements are becoming common on radio and TV.

Little has been done to convert gas pumps from gallons to liters. Oil firms are unwilling to make the investment involved in the face of what they see as public opposition to such a change.

Apparel sizes also are remaining in inches rather than shifting to centimeters. The apparel industry is said to fear consumer resistance to the move.

Food measurements are up against the same barrier. No food processor wants to be first to shift from pounds and gallons to kilograms and liters and thus risk alienating his customers.

There are some awesome legal barriers to change in that field as well. Some 35 states, for example, now regulate the packaging of milk and bread on the basis of traditional English measurements. One Montana baker tried putting out kilogram loaves of bread instead of the state-mandated 1 or 2-pound loaves. When his case was tried last year, he was found guilty of violating the law by not using pound measurements, and the court ordered him to stop using the metric system.

While there has been a great deal of shifting from inches to centimeters by big manufacturing firms that export to foreign markets, the change has been almost imperceptible in local industries and service firms. Construction, for instance, is a major industry with little real incentive to move to metric. As one authority says, "It's so fragmented, the whole industry doesn't have a GM or IBM to make that decision or lead the way."

NO SALE

Retailing firms are even slower to move toward metric. Few stores are measuring their offerings by grams, centimeters or milliliters (one fifth of a teaspoon in volume) for fear of antagonizing customers.

The latest Gallup Poll gives evidence of growing resistance to the use of metric measurements. Between February, 1977, and the end of the year, the number of Americans who said they wanted the U.S. to adopt the metric system dropped from 29 to 24 percent.

Opposition to the metric system, the poll showed, was greater among women than men, high-school graduates than those who were college-educated, clerks than businessmen, Southerners than Northerners, and people over 50 than those under 30.

A vast majority in the poll could not guess even approximately how many inches are in a meter, liters in a gallon, or miles in 100 kilometers.

Homemakers seemed to have a particular aversion to shifting to metrics. As one Atlanta woman commented: "Even the discussion of metric recipes is enough to make you swear off cooking. The recipes are available all right, but who wants to learn how to cook all over again if she doesn't have to?"

A SPECIAL HELL FOR METRIC FANS

(By Patrick J. Buchanan)

WASHINGTON.—In 1975 Congress took a radical step that will eventually require the rewriting of record books and cookbooks, the replacement of road signs, a revolution in the bottling industry, the discarding of all our old scales and thermometers.

It enacted the Metric Conversion Act.

Under its terms we have seven years left in which, voluntarily, to shift from our customary way of measuring weights, distances, volume and temperature to the metric system.

This social revolution is being imposed from above. It was done without national debate, without consultation with or the consensus of the people, without necessity or cause.

If the little duchies of west Europe wish to measure their circumscribed ground space by kilometers, why should we ape them and cease measuring our continent-wide country in miles?

Since prohibition, when a Yank enters a liquor store he has bought his bourbon, scotch, gin and vodka by the pint, the fifth, the quart or the half-gallon. Come 1985, all our hooch is to be sold in fractions of liters, and multiples of liters.

Prof. Lester W. Schlumpf, principal of New York's John Adams High School, who assisted in working up a handbook called "Metrics Made Easy," is elated over the coming changes.

"The metric system is so superior to ours and so much easier to use that it is rapidly replacing the customary system for every measurement in the United States . . . One thing is certain—metrication is coming to America."

Don't bet your Big Mac bonds on it, Lester.

Grass-roots resistance to metrication is rising. Americans, deo gratias, seem to be following intuitively the counsel of Thomas Jefferson: "I hold it that a little rebellion now and then is a good thing, and as necessary in the political world as storms in the physical."

Why should we abandon our familiar Fahrenheit methods of measuring the temperature for Celsius? With 180 degrees between freezing water at 32 and boiling at 212 (with only a 100-degree spread on Celsius) Fahrenheit gives us a far more exact measurement of heat and cold. And every American has grown accustomed to such expressions as "It's 40 below today in International Falls," and "110 in the shade."

All the standing and fallen barriers of athletic accomplishment have been written in traditional usage.

There was the 4-minute mile. The 18-foot pole vault. The 7-foot-high jump. When we read of old records falling at Churchill Downs and Belmont Park, do we want them recorded on the sports pages in kilometers and meters, or miles and furlongs?

Sure, the metric system is simpler, just as prose is simpler to understand than poetry. But when Howard Cosell talks about a Dallas lineman weighing in at "265 soaking wet and standing 6-9 in his stockinged feet," do we want that changed to 206 centimeters and 120 kilograms on the scale?

Under metrication a teaspoon of salt and a tablespoon of sugar in your favorite recipe would be translated into 5 milligrams and 15 milligrams, respectively. What grinch would want to throw out the joyful expression, "It's a beautiful 8-pound baby boy," preferring "The child weighed almost 3.7 kilograms at birth"?

The poet Dante is already warming up a special place in hell for those clergy of the Tin Bar who have mangled the Bible and the Book of Common Prayer to make them more easily understandable to yahoos and dingbats. Space needs to be reserved in the same niche for the acolytes of metrication.

H.R. —

A bill to repeal the Metric Conversion Act of 1975 (89 Stat. 1007)

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Metric Conversion Repeal Act of 1978".

FINDINGS AND POLICY

SEC. 2. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the majority of American people do not favor conversion from standard U.S. weights and measures to the metric system, despite U.S. involvement as an original signatory party to the 1875 Treaty of the Meter (20 Stat. 709), and the fact that use of metric measurement standards in the United States has been authorized by law since 1866 (Act of July 28, 1866; 14 Stat. 339);

(2) the latest manifestation of public opposition to metric conversion by the United States, since passage of the Metric Conversion Act of 1975 (89 Stat. 1007), occurred in 1977 when the Department of Transportation proposed to convert Federal highway signs solely to the metric system beginning in 1978, but later withdrew the proposal because the public outcry was so strong;

(3) it is in the interest of the United States to eliminate Federal Government programs or entities when it is clear that their objectives are not supported by the people or their existence is unnecessary to an overriding public need.

(b) The Congress declares that it is the policy of the United States—

(1) to pursue a vigorous effort to avoid wherever possible undue or harmful socio-economic dislocations as the result of Federal Government programs or actions; and

(2) to eliminate Federal Government programs or entities that would cause undue socio-economic dislocations, or whose objectives or existence are not needed or supported by the American people.

REPEAL OF METRIC CONVERSION

SEC. 3. The Metric Conversion Act of 1975 (89 Stat. 1007; 15 U.S.C. 205(a), (b), (c), (d), (e), (f), (g), (h), (i), (j), (k)) is repealed.●

SENIOR CITIZEN INTERNS

HON. TOM HARKIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Speaker, during the last week it has been my pleasure and privilege to have four hard-working senior citizens from southwest and central Iowa in my Washington office as interns. They were selected from among 350 applicants from throughout the Fifth Congressional District of Iowa.

These four senior citizen interns are a tribute to the contributions that older Americans can make to their communities. Each of them has served in civic office, is active in the planning and operation of senior citizen programs, and has served local educational and religious groups as well.

I would like to tell you a little about each of them.

Elsie Bryant is a retired teacher who is now mayor of the town of Treynor. She works as a substitute teacher, and was selected last year as the Outstanding Senior Citizen Woman in Southwest Iowa.

Leo Heisterkamp is a retired businessman who was mayor of the town of Breda for several years. Leo serves on three advisory boards for the area council on aging.

Gayle Strickler is a retired minister and serves on the Town Council of New Virginia, Iowa. He is the part-time coordinator of senior citizen programs for the city of Urbandale.

Lois Whitson is a part-time nurses' aide in the town of Shenandoah. She is president of the Page County Commission on Aging, and taught school for 45 years.

During their time in Washington, these senior citizen interns have kept a busy schedule. They have met with representatives of the Committee on Aging from both the House of Representatives and the Senate. They have talked with officials of the HEW Administration on Aging and the Social Security Administration. They have also met with senior citizen groups such as the American Association of Retired Persons and the National Council on Senior Citizens.

Not only have they learned about the Federal process, but in turn they have served as "ambassadors" for all elderly Iowans, by imparting their special expertise on the problems and concerns of the rural elderly to administration and House officials.

But these interns have also worked on their own. Each of them chose to research an issue or two of interest to them and of importance to senior citizens in their own rural communities. Each intern then studied these issues, which included medicare, new legislation to create a national meals-on-wheels program, Federal funding for senior citizen centers, energy and the elderly, and mandatory retirement legislation.

Mr. Speaker, the benefits of this program have been numerous. The interns have been able to learn about programs for helping senior citizens. When they return to Iowa, they will be able to share what they have learned with their senior citizen groups in their communities. And their comments and advice to me have been invaluable. My knowledge of the concerns of senior citizens has been expanded by talking with them over the last week.

From this experience, I would strongly urge my colleagues to consider a senior citizens intern program in their own office. I have found this to be a most informative program, and one that I hope to continue in the future.

I would like to thank the four senior citizens who took part in this program for their time and efforts. They have helped me greatly, and have made a major contribution to the understanding of the problems that affect a large segment of our society.●

CORRESPONDENCE AMONG CONGRESSMEN, ERTEL, THE SPEAKER, AND THE MINORITY LEADER ON CONGRESSIONAL CAMPAIGN OFFICE FACILITIES

HON. ALLEN E. ERTEL

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. ERTEL. Mr. Speaker, I include the following as an appendix to my remarks:

JULY 14, 1977.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL,
Speaker of the House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: On June 27, 1977, I announced my intention to introduce an amendment to the Legislative Appropriations Act that would have removed the various Congressional campaign committees from federal office space. I did not offer my amendment because Gary Hymel of your office assured me that you shared my feelings on the matter and were prepared to order the campaign committees from the House office buildings. I am entirely satisfied by Mr. Hymel's assurances.

I write to you today to suggest that the Committees in question be served immediate notice that they must remove themselves from federal property. This notification will serve to permit the committees time to relocate and, at the same time, it will begin to fulfill our shared goal of eliminating this most inappropriate use of public space.

Sincerely,

ALLEN E. ERTEL,
Member of Congress.

JULY 27, 1977.

HON. JOHN J. RHODES,
Minority Leader,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR JOHN: For some time now, we have felt that our respective campaign committees should not operate on government property. With this in mind, we have already made arrangements for our campaign committee to move to private quarters on the Hill.

We are asking that you also remove your campaign committee to other quarters.

This move would make available to our committees, both on the majority and minority side, valuable space to conduct official business.

According to our records, the Republican Campaign Committee now occupies Rooms 508 through 522 in House Office Building Annex #1.

With best regards,

Sincerely,

THOMAS P. O'NEILL,
The Speaker.

OFFICE OF THE MINORITY LEADER,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July 27, 1977.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL,
Speaker of the House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR TIP: I received your request asking that we remove our Campaign Committee to private quarters. I understand and concur in the purpose of the move, but was unaware you were making the decision without more advanced notice.

We will remove our Congressional Campaign Committee to commercial office space just as soon as we are able to make proper arrangements.

Sincerely,

JOHN J. RHODES,
Minority Leader.

July 28, 1977.

Hon. JOHN J. RHODES,
Minority Leader, House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR JOHN: Thank you for your prompt reply to my letter regarding the movement of the campaign committee offices.

Your support and cooperation in this regard are most appreciated.

With warmest regards,

Sincerely,

THOMAS P. O'NEIL, Jr.,
The Speaker.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., July 29, 1977.

Hon. ALLEN E. ERTEL,
Longworth House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR AL: In response to your letter of July 14, I am pleased to report that the Democratic and Republican Campaign Committees are moving out of the House Office Buildings.

Your suggestion was certainly a worthy one, and I appreciate your support on this issue.

With warmest regards,

Sincerely,

THOMAS P. O'NEILL,
The Speaker.

REPUBLICAN NATIONAL COMMITTEE,
October 1, 1977.

Hon. GUY VANDER JAGT,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR GUY: In response to your request, the Republican National Committee is moving forward with its plans to build an addition to the existing structure currently housing the R.N.C. This building will be within the complex of the Eisenhower Center and will provide sufficient space in which to house the National Republican Congressional Committee.

While we have adequate space upon which to construct an addition at present, we are negotiating the acquisition of the remaining property adjacent to the space currently being utilized as a parking lot.

We have requested estimates for the construction of such an addition based on existing architectural plans. It is expected that we should have little difficulty in obtaining the funds necessary for the construction of the building, particularly based upon your Committee's agreement to sign a long term lease, which will certainly be of assistance in obtaining the requisite financing.

It is our intention to move as rapidly as possible and barring any unforeseen events, this new facility should be available for occupancy by your Committee on or about November 15, 1978.

I will continue to keep you periodically advised.

Very truly yours,

BILL BROCK, Chairman.

NOVEMBER 1, 1977.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL,
Speaker of the House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR TIP: On July 14, 1977, I wrote to you urging that the Democratic and Republican Campaign Committees be removed from the House Office Buildings. In a letter dated July 29, 1977, you assured me that both committees would be relocating.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee is now situated in private office space, but, as of this date, its Republican counterpart continues to occupy federal quarters. I have sought to determine if the Republican Campaign Committee has arranged to move. However, repeated phone calls from a member of my staff to Steve Stockmeyer at the Committee have not been returned.

I presume that prior to your July 29 letter to me, you received assurances from the directors of the Republican Campaign Committee that they were in the process of securing other offices. Enough time has elapsed for them to have accomplished this task. Accordingly, I ask that you order the Republican Campaign Committee to relocate by the time we begin the second session of the 95th Congress. This time limit is quite generous insofar as it permits an additional two and one-half months for them to complete a move that presumably began some time ago.

Sincerely,

ALLEN E. ERTEL,
Member of Congress.

November 4, 1977.

HON. JOHN J. RHODES,
Minority Leader,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR JOHN: On July 27, I wrote asking that you vacate offices occupied by the Republican Campaign Committee.

We have completely moved our campaign committee to private quarters, and I have had to allocate your committee rooms (508–522 in Annex I) to satisfy our most pressing needs.

Anything you can do to expedite this move would be greatly appreciated.

Sincerely,

THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
The Speaker.

THE SPEAKER'S ROOMS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., November 9, 1977.

Hon. ALLEN E. ERTEL,
Longworth House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR AL: Your letter concerning the relocation of the Republican Campaign Committee has just come to my attention.

I have again directed the Republicans to vacate, telling them that the matter is an urgent priority with me.

Your support in this endeavor is appreciated.

Sincerely,

THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
The Speaker.

OFFICE OF THE MINORITY LEADER,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
November 17, 1977.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR TIP: I have received your note of November 4 regarding the Republican Campaign Committee space and assure you I will do my best to comply as soon as possible.

Perhaps we can discuss this personally in the near future.

Yours sincerely,

JOHN RHODES.

OFFICE OF THE MINORITY LEADER,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., November 8, 1977.

Speaker TIP O'NEILL,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR TIP: This letter will confirm the desire and intent of the National Republican Congressional Committee to leave its existing premises at the earliest possible date. As I mentioned to you, I'm sending you a copy of a letter Bill Brock sent to Guy Vander Jagt, indicating that the third building of the Eisenhower Center will be completed and made available to house the NRCC.

We recognize the sensitivities which ultimately require the NRCC to vacate its existing office space in the Annex. At the same time, however, we have severe difficulties with the short notice that has been given. The Committee's investigation has shown a serious lack of facilities adequate to house our 40 employees. As a result, we determined that the only realistic alternative is to enter into an agreement to build a new structure.

To update the information in Bill Brock's letter, an agreement has been made to purchase the property for the new structure. In addition, the architectural plans are all but complete, and the construction by the George Hyman Construction Company will start as soon as the necessary arrangements are finalized.

For the interim, we propose the Committee be allowed to remain in its current space and pay rent to the government. Besides the almost impossible situation involved in finding adequate housing, an interim move would be extremely difficult. The Committee is prepared to begin to pay a fair market rate for its current space; such rate to be set by an appraiser acceptable to you. As you know, the Committee had always paid rent for the space in the Annex prior to the time Congress took over the building.

Tip, thanks for your help in this matter.

Sincerely,

JOHN J. RHODES,
Minority Leader.

DECEMBER 12, 1977.

Hon. JOHN J. RHODES,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR JOHN: Pursuant to our conversation of December 7, this is to formally notify you that it will be necessary for the Republican Campaign Committee to move from Rooms 508–522 in the House Office Building Annex No. 1 by April 1, 1978.

As you know, the Democratic Campaign Committee has already moved.

Sincerely,

THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr., Chairman,
House Office Building Commission.
JIM WRIGHT, Member,
House Office Building Commission.

OFFICE OF THE MINORITY LEADER,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., December 22, 1977.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR TIP: This refers to your letter of December 12. I'll be meeting with Guy Vander Jagt as soon as possible concerning your notification as to National Republican Congressional Committee loss of space, and will advise you further.

Sincerely,

JOHN J. RHODES,
Minority Leader.

NATIONAL REPUBLICAN CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE,
HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING,
Washington, D.C., March 1, 1978.

HON. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker, Chairman, House Office Building, Commission, United States House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.
HON. JIM WRIGHT,
Majority Leader, Member, House Office Building Commission, United States House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER AND MR. MAJORITY LEADER: Please excuse this somewhat belated response to your recent letter on behalf of the Building Committee instructing the National Republican Congressional Committee to terminate its occupancy of the space it is presently occupying in the former Congressional Hotel Building. The delay has been caused in great part by our surprise at being so notified and our agonizing over how to deal appropriately with the problem compliance with your request would impose upon the Committee.

In view of the plans we have for relocation of our Committee's activities, as we will more fully detail later on in this letter, we trust that you can readily see the timing of the move you have dictated would pose a distinct and, we think, unreasonable hardship upon the Committee.

In contemplating what should be our response to your notification under these circumstances, we felt it essential that we establish the facts relative to our present occupany in order that we might better evaluate the propriety of your request. We, therefore, have attempted to talk with everyone who has any knowledge regarding the arrangement under which the Committee occupied its present quarters as well as any conditions with respect to termination of such occupancy.

As you know, the use of space in buildings under the jurisdiction of the House of Representatives by our Congressional Committee is not unique; the Democratic Congressional Committee having similarly occupied House of Representatives space for many, many years, and other, at most, quasi-official groups continue to do so.

Without going into all of the details, discussion, and deliberations which have transpired over the past several years involving your predecessors and ours, we think such a review by you would cause you to arrive at the same conclusion we have reached, that is, that the present use of House of Representatives space by the National Republican Congressional Committee is in accordance with an understanding reached whereby similar treatment has been accorded both the Republican and Democratic Congressional Committees; and, no specific termination date was established for either Committee under this accord.

Your predecessors and you, and our predecessors and we, have recognized the need to as promptly as possible discontinue the use of space by our Congressional Committees in buildings under the jurisdiction of the House of Representatives. Your Congressional Committee has accomplished that move (but not under any mandated deadline, to our knowledge) and our Committee has finalized plans, as we will point out, to do the same.

In this regard, we are sure you know that the NRCC has been in the forefront of the effort to sever partisan and other non-official functions by both Parties from the official administration of the House of Representatives. Over three years ago, we removed our employees from House payrolls and last year we eliminated direct supplements to our Members' official activities. A year ago, we proposed that the Campaign Committees begin paying rent to the House of Representatives for the space they were using.

Consistent with the foregoing, we last year investigated the availability of commercial space in reasonable proximity to the House of Representatives and found none available to meet our needs. You also know that we began negotiations last fall with the Republican National Committee for the construction of a new building to house the NRCC. Those negotiations have now been completed, the land has been purchased, construction plans and financing have been finalized and approved, and all necessary zoning actions have been favorably completed. As you can see from the copy of the enclosed letter from our architect, occupancy of the new facility can be achieved by November of this year.

In view of all the foregoing and in view of the fact that the Executive Committee of the National Republican Congressional Committee is, for all intents and purposes, the de facto, if not the de jure, tenant of the present space, we thought it necessary to bring your letter to the attention of such Executive Committee and this has been done at a meeting called for that and other purposes. After a full discussion of the matter at such meeting, the Executive Committee unanimously concluded that the April 1 date was unreasonable and could not be accepted. The Executive Committee, therefore, instructed us to so notify you and to arrange for the payment of rent to the House of Representatives for the space the Committee is occupying; such rental payments to commence immediately.

To determine the fair market rental to be paid, we engaged the services of Reynolds and Reynolds, Inc. for the purpose of conducting a professional appraisal of the rental value of our current facilities. A copy of that appraisal is enclosed. You will note that the appraisal estimates the annual rental value to be $28,000, and our check in the amount of one-twelfth thereof, $2,333.33, made payable to the House of Representatives is also enclosed which represents payment of rent for our present space for the month of February, 1978. While we have every reason to believe this is a fair and appropriate rental figure, we would consider any other similarly justified rental determination you might care to suggest and submit.

In view of the whole background and history of our occupancy of the present space and inasmuch as firm and complete arrangements have been made for our termination of use of the present space within just a few months, Mr. Speaker and Mr. Majority Leader, we trust that you will recognize that our inability and unwillingness to comply with your termination date is not a decision arbitrarily or capriciously reached but, rather, is a decision reached after much deliberation and consideration of the excessive and unreasonable cost that would be incurred should we attempt to comply with your deadline.

With best regards,

JOHN J. RHODES,
Minority Leader.
GUY VANDER JAGT,
Chairman, National Republican Congressional Committee.

NATIONAL REPUBLICAN CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE, HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING,
Washington, D.C., March 24, 1978.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
Speaker, Chairman, House Office Building Commission, United States House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.
Hon. JIM WRIGHT,
Majority Leader, Member, House Office Building Commission, United States House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER AND MR. MAJORITY LEADER: Subsequent to our letter of March 1, 1978, regarding the office space of the National Republican Congressional Committee, it occured to us that we should be paying rent for our current facilities in advance. Accordingly, enclosed is a check in the amount of $4,666.66 and made payable to the U.S. House of Representatives for the months of March and April, 1978. In the future, we will make payment by the close of each month for the next month's rent.

Sincerely,

GUY VANDER JAGT,
Chairman.●

TUITION TAX CREDITS: A SOCIAL REVOLUTION

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I read in the morning paper that Arthur Flemming of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights opposes tuition tax credits on the grounds that such legislation might foster racial segregation in the schools.

To me this is a unsubstantiated charge that completely distorts both the purpose and the effect of the proposal, which aims to make educational opportunities available to the poor as well as the rich, to minority group members as well as to whites, and which is carefully drawn to prevent even a dollar of tax relief from going to persons who attend racially segregated schools.

At the conclusion of these remarks, I am submitting a recent article by UCLA Prof. Thomas Sowell, entitled "Tuition Tax Credits: A Social Revolution." It is worthy of note that Dr. Sowell is a distinguished economist who is himself black and whose research has included careful study of "patterns of black excellence," especially the kinds of schools in which black youngsters obtain the best education.

Professor Sowell observes that few groups have so much at stake in the fate of this bill as ghetto blacks. He explains with considerable care that tax credits for elementary and secondary school tuitions would increase, not decrease, the degree of racial integration in the society and would extend important opportunities to black parents who want to make a better future for their children.

I am also submitting the testimony that Mr. Victor Solomon, director of educational affairs for the Congress of Racial Equality, offered at the Ways and Means hearings on tuition tax credits. As he says:

> Black people are sick and tired of having smokescreens and programs of busing and other things forced upon them, while the hungry cry out for education. What is needed in this country is choice.

Finally, there is the specific question raised by Mr. Flemming. How will we make sure that students in racially segregated private schools do not receive tuition tax credits? The Vanik amendment—and the Senate bill, H.R. 3946 as amended—is carefully drawn to require, as a condition of eligibility, that in order to qualify for a tax credit the student must be enrolled in a school that is exempt from taxation under the Internal Revenue Code. This is a key provision, for the Internal Revenue Service will not confer that status on any private school that discriminates on racial grounds.

I submit for the record a letter that IRS Commissioner Jerome Kurtz recently sent to Senator MOYNIHAN in reply to an inquiry by the Senator concerning the adequacy and effectiveness of these enforcement requirements. The Commissioner explains that Revenue Procedure 75–50, 1975–1 C.B. 597, imposes affirmative obligations on a private school to adopt a nondiscriminatory policy in its charter or bylaws; to include reference to that policy in school brochures, catalogs, and so forth; and to publish or announce annually this racially nondiscriminatory policy. Audits of private schools have been increased substantially, and examination guidelines, check sheets, training material, and other procedures assist agents examining the schools in determining if a school is in fact racially nondiscriminatory.

Clearly, the Internal Revenue Service is committed to enforcement of this requirement, and Commissioner Kurtz feels that existing law is sufficient to undergird that enforcement effort.

In my judgment, the Internal Revenue Service is more than competent to handle this important assignment. I am, however, open to any and all suggestions for strengthening its enforcement powers, including further legislation if necessary. I have been in touch with Senators PACKWOOD and MOYNIHAN and am happy to report that they are also most receptive to such suggestions and are willing to offer any appropriate amendments when the bill reaches the Senate floor. Given the intense and widespread support for tuition tax credits within the minority and civil rights communities, I believe that all Members of the House can in good conscience support both the Ways and Means bill and the Vanik amendment:

TUITION TAX CREDITS: A SOCIAL REVOLUTION

(By Thomas Sowell)

The Packwood-Moynihan tuition tax rebate legislation is, as Professor E. G. West aptly calls it, "a crucial event in the history of education."[1] Its "revolutionary potential for low-income groups"[2] has been missed by most other commentators and critics and deserves further exploration.

Why is this bill so important—and to whom? It is most important to those who are mentioned least: the poor, the working class, and all whose children are trapped in educationally deteriorating and physically dangerous public schools. Few groups have so much at stake in the fate of this bill as ghetto blacks. To upper-income families with children in college, the maximum $500 tax relief is hardly of decisive importance, when annual college costs range up to ten times that amount. The campaign of misrepresentation by the education establishment has depicted the affluent as the chief (or sole) beneficiaries, when in fact the opposite is nearer the truth. There are many times more students in elementary and secondary schools than in college, and among those children enrolled in pre-college private institutions, there are more whose parents earn from $5,000 to $10,000 a year than those whose parents are in all the brackets from $25,000 on up.

Even the current enrollees in private education are not primarily the affluent. The average family income of private elementary and secondary school children is about $15,000. But since the whole purpose or effect of the tuition tax rebate is to extend to others the opportunity for private education, the question is not so much who now goes to private school, but who could go after this legislation is in effect. No doubt those who went to college in past generations, before the G.I. Bill and other educational subsidies, were far more affluent than the general population, but to object to the G.I. Bill as aid to the affluent would be to miss the whole point—that it extended a privilege previously enjoyed by a few into an opportunity open to millions more. That is precisely what this bill does. That is precisely why it is being opposed and misrepresented by those whose jobs, pensions, and power derives from the public school bureaucracy.

While $500 does not begin to cover college costs, it does cover all or most of the cost of sending a child to many private day schools. Most of those private schools are not the expensive Andover or Exeter stereotypes, but rather schools costing a fraction of the tuition they charge—and having costs per pupil that are a half, a third, or a fifth of the per pupil cost in the public schools. It is not uncommon for Catholic parochial schools costing a few hundred dollars a year to have test scores higher than public schools in the same neighborhoods with per pupil costs well over a thousand dollars. One of the misrepresentations by opponents of the tuition tax rebate is that it would cost billions of dollars. They are talking about Treasury disbursements, which may be politically important. What is economically important is that a shift of students to lower-cost private schools can save billions of dollars for society as a whole.

Most of the private schools do not have the runaway pay scales or plush pensions that teachers' unions have extracted from politicians handing out the taxpayers' money. Few parochial schools are surrounded with tennis courts or contain many of the other expensive amenities or status symbols that add little to the education of children, but which have become part of the fringe benefits of public school administrators. Indeed, most private schools have far fewer administrators per hundred pupils, which is no small part of the reason for their lower costs or for the opposition of public school administrators to allowing parents a choice of where to send their children.

The crux of the controversy over this bill is choice and power. If parents are given a choice, public school officials will lose the monopoly power they now hold over a captive audience. That monopoly power is greatest over the poor, but it extends to all who cannot afford to simultaneously pay taxes for the public schools and tuition at a private school. Public schools in affluent neighborhoods where parents already have that option must pay some attention to those parents' wishes and be responsible. But parents in poorer neighborhoods and ghettoes have no such leverage to use to get attention, response or even common courtesy. The mere prospect of being able to remove their children to private schools changes all that. In other words, the benefits of the availability of tuition tax credit do not end with those who take advantage of it, but extend to those who keep their children in the public schools and never collect a dime from the Treasury—but whose children's needs now have to be taken seriously by public school officials no longer insulated or assured of a captive audience.

Much has been made of the fact that most of the enrollment in private elementary and secondary schools is in Catholic parochial schools. Like many other statements about the situation before this bill is passed, it is far from decisive in determining what the situation will be afterwards. The government is constantly overestimating the revenues to be gained from imposing a given tax by assuming that the pre-tax situation will continue unchanged except for the collection of the tax. In the same way, some are now assuming that the social, economic, and religious composition of families with children in private schools will remain unchanged after a subsidy that will put such education within reach of tens of millions of other people. Moreover, not all of the children enrolled in Catholic schools are Catholic. In urban ghettoes, especially, it is not uncommon for many Protestant black families to send their children to Catholic schools, as an escape from ineffective and dangerous public schools. About 10 percent of the ghetto youngsters in Chicago are in parochial schools. In some places, a majority of the enrollees in a Catholic school are non-Catholic. A parochial school can be a social service activity, like a denominational hospital that does not limit its medical care to co-religionists.

The Constitutional ban on government support for religious establishments raises legalistic issues for legislation whose initial impact may be more pronounced on Catholics. The First Amendment, as written, would not prohibit tax rebates for individuals to do with as they please, and the G. I. Bill is used at Catholic colleges and universities, but the Supreme Court has sometimes drawn an arbitrary line between higher and pre-college education and made the Constitution more restrictive on the latter. However, the uncertain course of the Supreme Court in this area in recent years and some evidence of at least a pause in the trend toward judicial policymaking under the guise of interpretation leaves reason to hope that extremist extensions of the "separation of church and state" doctrine will not nullify a bill that offers major benefits to all segments of the population. As things stand now, there is no Constitutional limitation on an individual's choice to donate money received from the government—whether as salary, tax refund, or Social Security benefits—to a religious organization. To say that the individual cannot choose to buy an educational service from the same religious organizations with money originating from the government seems inconsistent at best.

Another red flag to many is the possible effect of parental choice on racial integration. Visions of "segregation academies" are sometimes invoked (even though the tuition tax rebates cannot be used for any institution practicing racial discrimination). Quite the contrary is the case. In most of the nation's largest urban public school systems, there are not enough whites left to integrate, so any further racial integration in such places may be achievable only by the voluntary movement of black children into private schools. But even this is objected to by some "liberals," because blacks who take this opportunity to get ahead and leave the ghetto public schools and would leave behind only the children of "the least educated, least ambitious, and least aware."[3] In other words, black parents who want to make a better future for their children must be stopped and their children held hostage in the public schools until such indefinite time as all other people in the ghetto share their outlook. Ethnic minorities in the past rose out of the slums layer by layer, but for blacks it must be all or none! This arrogant treatment of millions of other human beings as pawns or guinea pigs would be impossible when parents have individual choice. That is precisely why both the education establishment and the social tinkerers are opposed to it.

STATEMENT OF VICTOR SOLOMON

Mr. SOLOMON. I am Victor Solomon, director of educational affairs for CORE, the Congress of Racial Equality. CORE has come through many battles for quality education and is today in touch with the needs in black communities throughout the Nation. Thus, we are in a unique and important position to speak on this tuition tax credit legislation, particularly in terms of its effects on the poor and minority communities.

As black people generally have done, we have relied in the past on the Government of this country to educate our children and enable our people to better their condition. In contrast to some other organizations, we have consistently fought for community control of Government, and we have mobilized to bring greater effectiveness in public school teaching. We are not now giving up on public schools; rather, we seek to improve them. In fact, there many examples of excellent public scools. We believe it is not individual public schools that are the problem so much as the bureaucratized structures that characterize public school systems, particularly in our major cities.

What have been the results of our struggles? Let me use New York City as an example. The capacities of our young people are being stifled. In the past 2 years, the percentage of children reading at grade level in New York City schools has dropped from 47 percent to 40 percent, and this statistic does not even reflect the worst of the pattern of failure, which occurs in areas such as Harlem and Bedford-Stuyvesant.

While in CORE's community school in the Bronx—which was formed in response to demonstrated need in that community—children are reading at approximately grade level, children in the neighboring public schools are 1 to 2 years behind. Further, I cannot even quantify the superior atmosphere of CORE Community School, an atmosphere conducive to learning and sharing, as compared to the area public schools.

Some say the problem is that inner-city children can't learn well because of their family problems and the conditions of society. That position is, quite frankly, bunk, and for public school officials to use societal problems as a consistent excuse for failure is criminally negligent and a dereliction of duty.

We know, from our school and others in impoverished areas, that inner-city children can learn. We take the same types of children as the public schools and we teach them. We challenge the public schools to start working again properly. Schools must provide not only knowledge in the basic skills, but must have proper safety and discipline, which many public schools now lack.

At the same time, we see nearby nonpublic schools doing an adequate job, day in and day out, in the same areas as the failing public schools. This is a nationwide pattern. I have seen this in New York City, in Michigan, and Minnesota, where I have studied the situation.

Furthermore, most of these nonpublic schools are operating at far less cost than public schools. While New York City public schools spend $3,000 annually per pupil, we spend $1,000 at CORE Community School. Even allowing for a number of other factors, it is clear that there is massive waste in our public schools, waste which costs taxpayers billions of dollars annually.

With tuition tax credit legislation, we have a chance to do something about these oft chronicled problems. The rich and the upper middle class in America have always been able to vote with their feet so to speak, on education. If they do not like the public schools, they send their children to private schools. It is time to give poor and minorities the chance to vote with their feet, the chance to use private education, and tuition tax credits will help.

The basic point is this: Blacks and poor people, the most victimized segment of our society, cannot afford to subsidize public schools with their taxes and still pay tuition for private schools.

What will be the effects of tuition tax credits? First, they will help those students who need to be able to go to schools that better meet their needs. It will help those whom the public schools have failed. It is only fair to give such students, who are now falling hopelessly behind, greater options.

Perhaps most importantly, there will be a competitive stimulus to the public schools to improve. As I said at the beginning, we seek the improvement of public schools, not their abolition. The presence of even a fairly small number of alternatives, within both the public and private sectors, can work great changes in the public schools.

Innovation in both public and private education will be stimulated by tax credits. Dedicated individuals will be able to start their own schools which may serve students' needs better.

Also, very importantly for black people, blacks and other groups will have real control over their own schools. Either Government-operated schools will be responsive to their needs, or people will start their own schools. People will be able to choose schools that reflect their own values. Alternative schools in the black community, such as CORE Community School, serve an important purpose in teaching black children to have pride in their heritage and recognize their individuality.

There are objections that will be raised to this bill, quite naturally. Unfortunately, for the purpose of gaining clarity on the subject, most of the opposition comes from those with a vested interest in the present system.

At present school boards and teachers' unions are running the schools almost as if they were a business in which management-employee considerations were dominant, and yet the public system does not have effective competition. In the process, administrators are protected and teachers are protected. But, I ask, why are our children's needs not being considered the primary issue?

It is said that blacks could not properly utilize the greater choice provided by tax credits. This is a condescending, even a racist, assumption. Such views reflect more the fear of the public school establishment that blacks and the poor will use their choice all too well, for them, and reject the monopoly systems of education that have failed them dismally.

We cannot pause because of the objections of vested interest groups that seek to perpetuate their activities, at very high cost to the public. No models in the business world exist, that I know of, that match the public school bureaucracies in inefficiency and waste. Such businesses would not thrive in the competition, and the introduction of some elements of competition in education would be beneficial.

Though tuition tax credits are somewhat costly on the Federal level, it may be that, with reduction in public schools' waste, there could be a net savings to the American taxpayer. Even an overall higher cost, though, would be justified if our children thereby learn properly.

Let me comment on two specifics of tuition tax credit legislation. The refundability provisions of the Frenzel-Burke version, allowing a refund if the credit is greater than tax owed, are very important to poor and minority people and should definitely be included.

Also, the $500 limit of the credit proposed, or $250 in other versions, makes this legislation much more helpful to those of modest means than to the rich who attend elite private schools. But even tuitions of a few hundred dollars yearly are a hardship to inner-city parents, and tuition tax credits are vital to providing options for these parents.

Finally, we feel the responsibility of the Carter administration in this matter is less than shameful. While it offers some relief which has merit to those in need of higher education, the administration proposals unfortunately have been presented as an alternative to this bill across the board, which they are not, and there lies the shame, in that tuition tax-credit bills address the burden of tuition at all educational levels.

Black people are sick and tired of having smokescreens and programs of busing and other things forced upon them, while the hungry cry out for education. What is needed in this country is choice. We feel that every day that this is not granted is a day when more black children fail and are bogged down in public school systems.

We are urging you to act on tuition tax credit legislation without delay.

Thank you. Thank you for this opportunity to present our views.

The CHAIRMAN. Thank you, Mr. Solomon.

[The prepared statement and attachment follow:]

STATEMENT OF VICTOR SOLOMON, DIRECTOR OF EDUCATIONAL AFFAIRS, CONGRESS OF RACIAL EQUALITY

SUMMARY OF POINTS

Where CORE has been: supporting improved and community-controlled public schools, but has met obstacles.

The problems: (1) Abysmal failure of public schools to teach basic skills; (2) lack of safety and discipline in public schools; (3) massive bureaucracies in public system, unresponsive to community; and, (4) meanwhile, private schools in same areas are succeeding, but inner-city parents cannot afford them.

What's needed: options for poor parents, such as tuition tax credit.

Effects of this legislation: (1) Will benefit those enabled to attend superior schools; (2) will stimulate public schools to improve; (3) will give real community control of schools to black parents; and (4) will enable all parents to choose schools that reflect their values.

Refundability provision of Frenzel-Burke version is important.

Answers to some objections: (1) We shouldn't be stopped by those with vested interests, e.g., school boards or teachers' unions; (2) blacks can make greater choice work; they can choose schools intelligently and/or start own schools; and, (3) in considering costs of this legislation, one must also consider the costs of the present waste in public schools.

Poor and minority people need this legislation enacted now.

What have been the results of our struggles? Let me use New York City as an example. Instead of real community control, we got decentralization, which is a shame. The citizen fighting for educational quality now has two bureaucracies to deal with, one on the district level and one at the central board. Individual districts lack power over their own budgets and hiring. The same problems exist in Detroit and other cities which have adopted decentralization schemes.

The worst problem, however, is the dismal failure of public schools to teach basic skills to children in the inner city. The capabilities of our young people are being stifled. In the past two years, the percentage of children reading at grade level in New York City schools has dropped from 47 percent to 40 percent, and this statistic does not even reflect the worst of the pattern of failure, which occurs in areas such as Harlem and Bedford-Stuyvesant.

BLACKS SEE SYSTEM FAILING AND OPEN PRIVATE SCHOOL; CORE ALTERS POLICY TO FIND "BETTER" WAY

(By David Medina)

In a reversal of previous policy, the Congress of Racial Equality has given up on the idea that poor black and Hispanic children can be properly educated in the New York City public school system.

Instead, the organization now advocates the establishment of private, parent-financed community schools as a better and cheaper alternative.

To prove its point, CORE has opened the first of what it hoped will be a series of community schools at 1637 Washington Ave. in the Claremont section of the Bronx.

"Decentralization hasn't proved anything. It's the same people, the same bureaucracy, the same inefficiency and the same increased costs," said CORE's Executive Director, Roy Innis.

And as for busing, the organization maintains that the cost and the results are not worth the effort.

Innis is now arguing that private education is better because it eliminates "The big Board of Education bureaucracy, the phony union contracts and the featherbedding."

CORE estimates it is costing $1,000 a pupil each year to keep the new school open, which it says is only one third what it costs to educate a child in public school. But tuition at the community school is $420 for each child. A second child of a family pays $350 and any subsequent child in the same family pays $280 tuition per year.

Of course, CORE has agreed to make up the difference in cost with a $100,000 subsidy it maintains through donations.

The other advantage is that the school places rigorous emphasis on the "Three R's" and the "Big D"—reading, writing, 'rithmetic and discipline—all of which, Innis says, have been missing from the public school setting.

Given the higher costs and poorer quality of public schools, CORE has joined its parochial school counterparts in demanding that tax dollars used for public education, about $3,000 a student, be diverted back to parents to enable them to send their children to private schools, if they so desire.

"The money would go directly to the parent, giving him a big savings in his child's education," said Victor Solomon, CORE's director of education. "The parent decides the policy and has a hand in the hiring of teachers."

Not so long ago, this educational approach would have been unheard of for CORE. Then last year, the Archdiocese of New York announced that it was closing down Our Lady of Victory school in the Bronx due to lack of money and parents went into a panic.

About half the 200 students attending the CORE school came from Our Lady of Victory. So did four teachers and Principal Edward Callaghan.

"At first we wanted to limit our enrollment to 120 students but the demand was so great we had to increase it to 200," Callaghan said. "We even got a deposit from a woman who wants to enroll her 4-year-old son in 1979.

"Basically, we have a similar curriculum to Our Lady of Victory but we place greater emphasis on things like health and sex education and black and Puerto Rican history. We believe that unless our kids have a positive image of themselves they can't deal with anything else in the world."

The CORE Community School is located on the top three floors of what is called the Gramercy Boys Club Building and students get in a full schedule from 8:15 a.m. to 3:30 p.m.

"Everyone has pitched in to help," Callaghan said. "Parents, teachers and students were all here over the summer painting walls, cleaning up and getting supplies.

"We had a man from the Virgin Islands who offered to catalogue our library. The nursing department of Lehman College has volunteered to set up a health program for us. A guidance counselor from a nearby public school has offered to put in a few hours a week on his own time. Why, we've even had offers for help from the Metropolitan Opera."

CATHOLIC SCHOOLS ATTAIN STABILITY IN URBAN CORES

(By Edward B. Fiske)

Diane Sanchez is a widow with two children who supports herself by working as a paraprofessional at St. Paul's Elementary School on 113th Street in East Harlem. Out of her income of $6,300 a year, which includes Social Security benefits, she spends $1,100 a year in parochial school tuition and fees.

"I cut things out," she said one day recently. "I don't buy many clothes, maybe once every six months. I get a good pair of shoes that will last a long time. But education is the most important thing, and kids learn more at Catholic schools."

Such attitudes are one reason why Roman Catholic schools in the innercity areas, once widely regarded as having little future, have entered a new period of stability.

Demand has been growing because of widespread belief by parents—non-Catholic as well as Catholic—that religious schools in areas such as the South Bronx, Harlem and Bedford-Stuyvesant provide their children with superior education as well as a safer environment than local public schools.

MAY 8, 1978.

Hon. DANIEL P. MOYNIHAN,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR MOYNIHAN: This is in further response to your letter of April 6, concerning a provision in H.R. 3946 which would provide tuition tax credits at the elementary and secondary school levels. You expressed concern with that aspect of the bill which would limit the tuition tax credit to educational expenses paid to private elementary and secondary schools that are "exempt from taxation under section 501(a) as an organization described in section 501(c)(3)." As stated in your letter and in the accompanying Senate Finance Committee Report on H.R. 3946, the principal reason for imposing the section 501(c)(3) limitation is to bar the use of the tuition tax credit with respect to persons attending the type of schools colloquially known as "segregated academies".

You have asked my views on two points:

1. Are the provisions of present law, in general, and H.R. 3946 in particular, adequate to achieve the purposes of barring tax credits for payments to private elementary or secondary schools that are racially discriminatory?

The IRS announced its position in July 1970, that a private school which has a racially discriminatory policy is not "charitable" within the common law concepts reflected in Code § 501(c)(3) and therefore does not qualify for exemption from Federal income tax under that section. This position, subsequently published in Rev. Rul. 71-447, 1971-2 C.B. 230, is in accordance with judicial decisions. Green v. Connally, 330 F. Supp. 1150 (D.D.C. 1970), aff'd sub nom. Coit v. Green, 404 U.S. 997 (1971). In 1975 Rev. Rul. 75-231, 1975-1 C.B. 158, clarified that church-related schools are also subject to the nondiscrimination requirement.

We are very much aware of the criticism made by some that schools can in some cases allege that they are racially nondiscriminatory in order to secure tax exemption, yet in operation exclude minorities. Revenue Procedure 75-50, 1975-1 C.B. 587, imposes affirmative obligations on a private school to adopt a nondiscriminatory policy in its charter or bylaws; to include reference to that policy in school brochures, catalogs, etc.; and to publish or announce annually this racially nondiscriminatory policy. Audits of private schools have been increased substantially, and examination guidelines, check sheets, training material, and other procedures assist agents examining the schools in determining if a school is in fact racially nondiscriminatory. We are currently reviewing our rules and procedures in this area to determine if additional rules or guidelines might be appropriate or desirable to test a school's assertion of a nondiscriminatory policy.

Although the Service is strongly committed to vigorous enforcement of the racial nondiscrimination requirement of section 501(c)(3), with approximately 16,000 exempt private schools in the country and with limited audit resources, the Service is not in a position to guarantee that every school is in fact operating in accordance with its representations that it is racially nondiscriminatory. As in all areas of our self-assessment tax system, the Service must rely on the assertions of exempt organizations unless those assertions are brought into question on audit or by outside information.

At this time, we do not believe there is a need for additional statutory support of the Service's position that private schools exempt under section 501(c)(3) may not discriminate on racial grounds, and we do not have any suggestions for further substantive statutory rules.

2. Would a rule limiting eligibility to those schools which had previously qualified for exemption no later than some date in the last (e.g., 10 years ago) be desirable?

I do not believe there is any assurance that such a rule would serve a significant purpose in denying the credit for payments to racially discriminatory private schools. In addition, this type of time limitation would be unfair to those bona fide nondiscriminatory schools which were established after the cutoff date.

I appreciate your asking my views on these two points and I hope these comments will be helpful. Please let me know if I can be of further assistance.

With kind regards,

Sincerely,

ALASKA NATIONAL INTEREST LANDS CONSERVATION ACT

HON. GOODLOE E. BYRON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to commend all of the members of the House Interior and Insular Affairs Committee for their work on the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act. I would like to extend a special thanks to Chairman UDALL who introduced the original H.R. 39 and took the first step in securing the interests of all Americans in the protection and conservation of Alaska's D–2 lands. Congressman JOHN SEIBERLING, chairman of the Subcommittee on General Oversight and Alaska Lands deserves equal praise for the tremendous job he did in his own subcommittee, during the final drafting sessions in full committee and finally on the floor of the House. As subcommittee chairman, Congressman SEIBERLING did a remarkable job of facilitating the interests of all points of view in a fair and open manner. There is no doubt that his fine work on this measure has been a credit to this Congress as well as our legislative process.

I would also like to commend Congressman DON YOUNG, whose efforts on behalf of his fine State should not go unnoticed. Together with Congressman LLOYD MEEDS, these two devoted Members brought a balance to the final version of H.R. 39 which would otherwise have been lost.

I would like to personally thank the committee staff for their fine work on this measure and the thoughtful assistance they have continually given both myself and my staff. I am particularly grateful to Loretta Neumann, Stan Sloss, Roy Jones, Dora Trapkin, Fran Sheehan, Harry Crandell, Gunilla Foster, and Bill Horn. A special thanks should also go to the many members of the Alaska Coalition who telephoned or dropped by my office frequently. The efforts of these energetic young people was certainly an important contributing factor to the success of this landmark legislation in the House.●

APPROPRIATIONS BILL FOR 1979 FOR STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND RELATED AGENCIES

Hon. Theodore M. (Ted) Risenhoover

OF OKLAHOMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. RISENHOOVER. Mr. Speaker, last year the House by an overwhelming majority passed a bill (H.R. 3716) containing an amendment to the Federal Trade Commission Act which would allow the Congress to supervise more closely the Commission's rulemaking activities and to overturn those rules which it found unacceptable. I supported that legislation because I believe that the Commission's interpretation of its statutory authority has become so broad as to invite abuse. Indeed recent events have established that section 5 of the FTC Act allows the Commission to condemn any acts or practices which a majority of sitting Commissioners—in the past the Commission has had as few as three members at times—consider unfair on any conceivable basis.

The Commission has stated that, among other things, it may consider acts or practices unfair even where they do not violate the letter or spirit of any law simply because it considers them to be "immoral, unethical, oppressive, or unscrupulous." Since this standard received a degree of approval from the Supreme Court, FTC v. Sperry & Hutchinson Co., 405 U.S. 233 (1972), the Commission has felt free to institute a number of proceedings based upon it.

In my view, the Commission's actions amount to an exercise of legislative authority which should not be allowed to continue without direct supervision by the Congress. As I indicated at the outset, an overwhelming majority of my colleagues in the House agreed with me on this issue. While the Senate conferees insisted that this amendment, providing for a veto of Commission rules by majority vote of both Houses of Congress, be deleted from the conference report, it is significant that the House rejected the conference report in part because it lacked such an amendment by a vote of 146 to 255.

My own feeling about the need for congressional oversight of the Commission is so strong that I cannot, in good conscience, continue to support the full complement of its proposed activities for the coming fiscal year knowing that as one legislator I will have little, if any, control over its final actions. Absent such control and not being a member of the Commission's oversight committee, the only way that this concerned Member of Congress can prevent the Commission from unduly—and often unnecessarily—extending its powers into the lives of the American people is through the budgetary process.

Accordingly, I have undertaken a review of the Commission's budget requests and I am convinced that, in addition to intruding on the rights and functions of the people and the States, many of the Commission's activities hold little, if any, prospect of actually benefiting consumers and that some of its actions are even likely to harm consumers.

If the Commission were to abandon only those matters which, for reasons discussed below, I consider to be unsound or clearly unnecessary in fiscal year 1979, 23 percent of its budget could be saved for the American taxpayers. To this figure I would add an overall reduction of 10 percent on the grounds that (a) the Federal budget must be reduced to assist the President in his fight against inflation, and (b) given the nature of bureaucracies in general, there is likely to be a significant amount of "fat" or waste in the Commission's operations. In absolute dollars this would result in a savings of $21,832,000 which would reduce the Commission's budget from $66,485,000 to $44,653,000.

I intend to introduce an appropriate amendment to accomplish such a reduction as soon as the House Appropriations Committee reports the FTC's budget.

While such a reduction may appear drastic to some, I would point out that, in recent years, Congress has been more than generous with the Commission. In fact, annual increases to the Commission's appropriations generally have more than doubled increases in the cost of living.* To put it another way, if the Commission had continued to provide the same level of antitrust and consumer protection it was providing in 1973, its current budget request would be $41,987,000.

Now some may disagree with the specific criticisms which follow, while others may feel that they are too lenient. But in an emerging era of cost-effectiveness in Government, and in light of the lack of other means of congressional control over Commission actions, it is absolutely imperative that we begin to examine carefully the costs and benefits of the Commission's activities. Based upon my examination of its budget, I believe the Commission would do far better for the American taxpayer and the consumer if the funds for the following programs and projects were eliminated or reduced.

I shall begin with what I consider the Commission's most egregious and ill-advised undertaking—its investigation of monopolization in the automobile industry. Regardless of its past history, this industry in recent years has been characterized by acute competition, particularly from foreign manufacturers who often enjoy subsidies and other benefits from their respective governments. It seems strange, indeed, for the Commission to be harassing this industry while Congress and the administration are attempting to place it on at least an equal footing with its competitors. While the Commission has not yet begun to spend a great deal of money on this matter, if it ever brought an action challenging the structure of the industry, it clearly would require huge sums of money. Thus, by eliminating this investigation now, we have the opportunity to prevent waste in its incipiency.

Second, I would question the need for the Commission's rulemaking proceeding concerning the funeral industry. There the Commission proposes to require funeral directors to make a lengthy list of disclosures and statements—particularly with respect to the costs of their goods and services—to bereaved persons. Not only does this action represent an unwarranted intrusion by the Federal Government into an area that traditionally has been left in the hands of the States, it ignores emotional and religious considerations and assumes that persons involved in planning a funeral want to haggle over costs rather than provide a decent and dignified burial for the deceased. This program has gone too far already; I would eliminate it and save $219,000.

* As shown in the following table the Commission's budget has substantially outpaced the cost of living in recent years.

(In percent)

Year	Cost of Living	FTC Appropriations
1973	6.2	15
1974	11.0	12
1975	9.1	20
1976	5.8	21
1977	6.5	16

Third, I would suggest that certain aspects of the Commission's program concerning cigarette advertising and labeling are highly questionable. For example, it is conducting a massive investigation involving all of the major cigarette manufacturers and their advertising agencies. The breadth and scope of the subpenas issued in this matter indicate clearly that the Commission has no reason to suspect that the industry is violating the law. In light of the Commission's long history of involvement in this industry, I believe it now must either "fish or cut bait"—that it should either bring a complaint or stop harassing the industry merely because it disapproves of the product involved. The American people are well aware of the alleged hazards of smoking cigarettes and it is up to them—not the Government—to decide whether they will smoke or not. I would deny some two-thirds or $400,000 of the Commission's request in this area; the remaining funds should be sufficient to allow the Commission to continue its worthwhile functions of testing the tar and nicotine content of cigarettes and reporting to Congress on advertising practices in the industry.

Fourth, the Commission's proposed rule concerning food and nutritional advertising would require that many advertisements contain numerous and burdensome disclosures. For the most part, this information would duplicate the information which appears on the labels of food products. I find it extremely unlikely that consumers who care about this information in the first place would be able to perceive and understand it in the context of an advertisement better than they can on the label. I would eliminate this program entirely and thereby save $556,000.

Fifth, in its recently announced rulemaking proceeding on children's advertising, the Commission has embarked upon a long and expensive fight to become what the Washington Post has referred to as our "National Nanny." The Post noted, and I agree, that the Commission apparently believes that it must protect children against the stupidity and weakness of their parents. Moreover, the Commission also asserts that it has the power to ban truthful advertising for lawful products based solely upon the vague standard of unfairness. I find the constitutional problems raised by such an assertion to be so serious that I would defer this entire program in order that Congress can consider whether, and in what form, it should proceed. This would save $703,000 for fiscal year 1979.

Sixth, the Commission is conducting an investigation of the life insurance industry to determine whether it should require specific disclosures in policies to clarify for the consumer the actual costs of the policy and the benefits it offers. Now I will be the first to admit that I find life insurance policies to be confusing; however, I question whether the Commission, with no prior experience in this area, is the proper agency to alleviate this confusion. This again, is a responsibility that has been primarily left to the States. I would allow them to continue their efforts in this area unassisted—and unhampered—by the Commission and save $252,000.

Seventh, the Commission is conducting a program designated "Occupational Licensure," which is directed at eliminating certain State laws and restrictions on entering a number of important occupations. While the Commission's stated purpose of improving competition appears to be a noble one, I would point out that the laws it would eliminate represent the judgment of the States as to what is necessary to protect their citizens against "fly-by-night" and unethical operators. At the very least, this program should be deferred until the effects of recent court decisions accomplishing certain of its objectives—such as eliminating bans on advertising—can be ascertained. This would save $1,480,000 for fiscal year 1979.

Eighth, the Commission is investigating various industries to determine whether manufacturers and advertisers should be required to disclose to consumers certain information about their products. This, the Commission believes, would enable the consumers to make better choices in purchasing certain products. My problem with this program is that it appears intended to supplant the consumers' judgment as to what they need to know about these products with the Commission's. Rather than endorse this big-brother, Government-knows-best, philosophy, I would eliminate this program and save $1,139,000.

Ninth, the Commission has two programs in the pharmaceutical industry which I find questionable. The first is its program concerning over-the-counter drug advertising which, for the most part, would duplicate the Food and Drug Administration's program to provide consumers with information about drugs through labeling. I would deny two-thirds of the Commission's request for this program, thereby saving $414,000. The other program I would question concerns prescription drugs and is intended to eliminate various State regulations which protect consumers against receiving cheaper substitutes for drugs prescribed by their doctors. I find this program particularly offensive in that it amounts to a group of unelected officials in Washington overruling the judgment of elected officials of the States as to the welfare of their citizens. I would eliminate this program and save $373,000.

Tenth, I would cut by one-half the Commission's request for its program concerning restrictions on entering various occupations in professional health services and thereby save $802,000. Once again, I would leave most of the regulation in this area where it has been historically, that is, in the hands of the States. I am particularly concerned about any investigation of access to the medical profession, since I do not believe the Commission has the expertise to insure the continued high level of competency in that vital area.

Eleventh, I would also cut by one-half the Commissioner's request for its program to eliminate horizontal restraints in various industries, thus saving $1,282,000. While I applaud certain objectives of this program, such as the elimination of price fixing and collusion, in other respects, it troubles me. I am concerned about challenges to delivered pricing systems before the Commission's recent and novel decision in this area (Boise Cascade Corp., et al.) has been tested in the courts. Also one of the stated purposes of the program is to attack State, and even Federal, regulations.

I am also concerned about a number of specific complaints mentioned only briefly or not at all in the Commission's budget request, but which have come to my attention recently. Specifically, I would have the Commission withdraw its complaints against: First, Du Pont for allegedly "monopolizing" the titanium dioxide industry, since the company has only about a 40-percent share of that market; second, General Motors for monopolizing the distribution of its own "crash parts," since the "monopolization" is merely a lawful and necessary adjunct to manufacturing the automobiles themselves; third, Coca-Cola and Pepsi Co., in which the Commission's decisions threaten to drive small independent bottlers out of business and thereby cause substantial injury to consumers. I would estimate that $850,000 could be saved by eliminating these cases.

In several areas, primarily transportation, the Commission intends to appear before other Federal agencies to attack regulations, which, in its view, adversely affect competition. I believe that protecting the public interest in competition in the regulatory process can best be attained through legislative processes. I would reduce any funds the Commission intends to use in this area by $350,000.

Finally, in the area of economic activities, the Commission recently has begun or proposes to begin requiring of American business, three new and burdensome reports—premerger notification, line-of-business, corporate patterns. Only the first such report is required by statute; I would defer implementation of the others until business has had the opportunity to adjust to it for an estimated savings of $791,000.

The reductions I have recommended thus would lead to other reductions. For example, by eliminating the rulemaking proceedings which I have recommended, the need for funds for public participation in such proceedings would be significantly reduced. Moreover, in the past, various self-appointed consumer activists have taken advantage of the funds provided under this program to represent—often several times over—the same narrow constituency. I would cut this program by one-half and save $548,000.

Similarly, if my figures are correct—and I invite comments and corrections particularly with respect to my estimates regarding matters which are not separate line items—the cuts I have recommended would total $10,159,000. Accordingly to the Commission, administrative and support costs tend to run about 50 percent of these direct costs; hence I would expect my specific proposals to result in total savings of $15,183,000 or about 23 percent of the Commission's budget request.

Finally, as indicated at the outset, I would add to this figure a general reduction of 10 percent to fight inflation and to encourage the Commission to expend greater efforts toward eliminating bureaucratic waste and inefficiency in its operations.●

SEVENTH SESSION OF THE LAW OF THE SEA CONFERENCE

HON. DONALD M. FRASER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. FRASER. Mr. Speaker, the Seventh Session of the UN Law of the Sea Conference concluded its negotiations late last Friday night in Geneva on a high note. This session has been without precedent in the history of the Conference which officially opened in December 1972. After a difficult beginning over the Conference's presidency, delegates voted to continue H. Shirley Amerasinghe as president, and spent the remaining weeks negotiating seven critical hardcore issues: the system of exploitation and exploration, financial arrangements of the authority, the organs and powers of the authority, the right of landlocked and geographically disadvantaged states to the living resources of neighboring states; settling fishery disputes in the exclusive economic zone; defining the Outer Continental Shelf and the question of revenue sharing; and delimiting maritime boundaries between geographically adjacent and opposite states. The United States, other delegations and observers generally agreed that by the yardstick they chose to identify progress—a text sufficiently improved over last summer's informal composite negotiating text that it provided a substanial and enhanced prospect for concensus—substantial progress was made.

Yesterday Ambassador Elliot L. Richardson briefed the members of the Committee on International Relations on the Seventh Session of the Conference. The briefing will be available as a committee print in several weeks. In the meantime, I believe that Ambassador Richardson's statement which he made available to the committee provides a useful summary of the sesssion, and request that it be inserted in the RECORD.

STATEMENT BY ELLIOT L. RICHARDSON

The Seventh Session of the Third United Nations Conference on the Law of the Sea began in an atmosphere of doubt that the 142 delegations assembled in Geneva could ever turn their attention to the issues of the oceans.

For the first two weeks of the eight-week session the substantive business of the Conference was in a state of limbo while the question of its presidency was being argued. This long, frustrating impasse was finally broken by a vote favoring the continuation of Shirley Amerasinghe as President.

The third week was devoted to organizing the work of the Conference. There was serious anxiety at this point as to whether the Conference could summon the will to redeem itself. Rather, a new skepticism surrounded the old question: Can the nations of the world negotiate a treaty governing mankind's use of the oceans, or is the task too broad, too complex, and simply too difficult?

Whether stung by the critical tone of world opinion or spurred by awareness of the amount of time that had slipped away, delegates agreed to devote the remaining five weeks to negotiation of the most critical hard-core issues. They focused on these with an intensity and a spirit of sober determination without precedent in the history of the Conference.

When the Geneva phase of the Seventh Session ended last Friday, delegates could take deserved pride in the solid record of accomplishment they had built. By common agreement, success with respect to each hard-core issue being considered by the Conference was defined as a text sufficiently improved over the Informal Composite Negotiating Text that it offered a substantially enhanced prospect of consensus. Under this criterion, the list of successes is substantial.

Perhaps the most noteworthy achievement of the Seventh Session was its negotiation of the right of access of landlocked and geographically disadvantaged states to the living resources of the 200-mile exclusive economic zone. This negotiation brought within reach of consensus an issue which had stubbornly resisted compromise during all previous sessions of the Conference.

Some progress was also made toward agreement on a formula defining the outer limit of national jurisdiction over the continental shelf, a matter of vital concern to a number of broad-margin states. A compromise on the issue of revenue sharing in the proceeds of exploitation of the resources of the continental margin beyond 200 miles also made headway. Considerable hard work, however, remains to be done on these related issues.

A companion issue—settlement of disputes over the living resources of the EEZ—also gave way before hard bargaining. From the extremes of rejection of any dispute settlement of fisheries questions to an insistence on compulsory adjudication in all cases emerged the middle ground of compulsory conciliation of claims that the coastal state has abused its power.

The United States drew considerable satisfaction from the negotiations on maritime pollution. In concert with France and Canada, we were the driving force behind improvement in the text with respect to the prevention, reduction, and control of pollution from ships.

The new texts expand the obligation of the world community to protect endangered species and fragile ecosystems from pollution. They widen jurisdiction to establish ship-routing systems needed to protect the environment, clarify the right of the coastal state of obtain prompt notice of events that may result in pollution off its coast in adequate time to act, and remove certain restraints on the powers of the coastal state to establish and enforce discharge standards stricter than international standards for ships in innocent passage in the territorial sea.

In the area of marine scientific research in the EEZ, the U.S. sought comparable progress. The Soviet Union and a large number of coastal states, however, continued to insist that the existing text on scientific research represented a reasonable balance that ought not to be disturbed. We took issue with this view when it was expressed in the Plenary and gave notice that we intend to persist in our efforts to make the text more compatible with freedom of scientific research.

Another "first" for the Seventh Session was its willingness to come to grips with many of the seemingly intractable issues associated with deep seabed mining. There was none of the public posturing characteristic of earlier debate on these issues. Rather, the Conference revealed a more sophisticated understanding of the economic stakes at issue and broad acceptance of the aim of making the parallel system of seabed exploitation workable.

All of the texts dealing with the seabeds represent improvement over the ICNT. In some cases the improvement is significant; in others it is marginal. Many developing countries continue to view with suspicion the sincerity of the commitment of the developed countries to the viability of the Enterprise side of the parallel system. These apprehensions are reflected in the revised texts, particularly those on transfer of technology and the review clause.

Transfer of technology is no longer a precondition of obtaining a contract to mine. This is a major improvement. Under the new text the contractor must undertake to transfer such technology to the Enterprise at any time after the contract is approved—if the Enterprise so requests—on fair and reasonable commercial terms and conditions to be negotiated in good faith by the parties. The fulfillment of this obligation would be subject to conciliation and arbitration.

A new and highly controversial addition to the text requires transfer of technology to developing countries in certain quite limited cases. The U.S. is opposed to this requirement, which is not needed to make the parallel system of exploitation viable, and will seek to have it eliminated in a later stage of negotiations.

The review clause negotiated in Geneva is significantly better than the ICNT in that it eliminates automatic conversion to a unitary system and contains certain other textual improvements. However, the review clause remains a serious problem because of the power given to the Assembly—if the Review Conference is deadlocked after five years—to impose a moratorium on new contracts and new plans of work for the Enterprise with the exception of areas already reserved.

The U.S. voiced strong reservations on this provision, emphasizing that it would not agree to the possible termination of its right to access to deep seabed minerals at the time the need for them may become acute.

U.S.-Canadian bilateral discussions produced a new production-control formulation. This formulation is clearly an improvement over that contained in the ICNT. Like all compromises, it confronts both producers and consumers with painful decisions, but we hope that it provides the basis for final resolution of this longstanding issue.

Considerable improvements were also made in the texts dealing with financial arrangements. These texts had not previously been the subject of substantive negotiations, and the progress made during this session was encouraging. Nevertheless, much work remains to be done on the financial terms of contracts, and we shall have to dispel misconceptions of the value of seabed minerals and the economics of their exploitation before a consensus text can be obtained.

The issue of composition and voting of the Council—the executive arm of the Authority—was seriously and intensively discussed, but was not resolved at Geneva. Differences remain clear-cut and fundamental. The developing countries tend to regard the Council as simply an arm of the Assembly with priority for the principle of equitable geographic distribution.

The U.S. does not challenge the concept that the Assembly should operate on the basis of one nation, one vote. We believe strongly, however, that the Council—responsible for directing the operations of the Authority—should reflect not only a geographic balance among members, but also should assure adequate protection of the major economic interests affected by a deep seabed mining treaty; specifically those of seabed miners of manganese, nickel, copper, and cobalt; consumers of these metals; and land-based producers. Only if such protection is clear and convincing will the massive investments required to begin seabed mining be made.

In summary, the Conference made sufficient progress on the hard-core issues to support the hope that with additional time and the same high level of patience and dedication shown in Geneva, it can cut significantly deeper into these issues. It made sufficient progress to reinforce the conviction of the United States that it is still worthwhile to persist in the effort to construct a framework of international cooperation in the oceans.

Hence, when the Seventh Session resumes in New York for a four-week period beginning August 21, the United States will again do its best to help the Conference in its striving for a treaty.●

OLDER AMERICANS MONTH

HON. ANTHONY TOBY MOFFETT

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. MOFFETT. Mr. Speaker, President Carter has declared May to be "Older Americans Month." For too long, the assumption has been that, as one gets older, one becomes less and less "useful." But at last the trend has begun to reverse itself, as we begin to recognize that older Americans are invaluable social, intellectual, and cultural resources to our society.

I am pleased to see that steps are being taken at the Federal, State, and local levels to improve interaction between people of all ages, while at the same time providing for the special needs of the elderly. For example, the House recently passed the Mandatory Retirement Act, to insure the right to work until the age of 70. Many other bills will have equally significant impacts on our lives.

Several bills currently before the House would affect the accessibility of medical care and drugs. Revisions in the Omnibus Crime Control and Safe Streets Act that are specifically designed to reduce danger to elderly people are being considered in the Judiciary Committee. The Committee on Labor and Public Welfare is considering a bill to amend the Older Americans Act to provide a national meals on wheels program for the home-bound elderly.

In my own State of Connecticut, two programs stand out for their effectiveness and compassion. The retired senior volunteer program (RSVP) and the seniors tutor for educational progress (STEP) project have been especially good at bringing different age groups together for mutual exchange and interaction.

All these legislative initiatives are moving us away from the fallacies of a former era. We are no longer legislating isolation, inaction, and dependence on others into our programs designed to serve older people. Instead, we are trying to recognize in our laws and policies that all ages in any society must be integrated in their jobs, their neighborhoods, their leisure activities and their personal lives to derive maximum benefit from our existence.

"Older Americans Month" can be seen as an important symbol of what we are striving for: a healthy combination of compassion and respect for the many contributions to our lives which older people have made and will continue to make. But more must be done in the area of private medical care. We need to provide more humane convalescent health care. The institutional approach to health care for the elderly is a dehumanizing experience; viable alternatives to nursing home treatment must be developed.

It is a matter of giving the elderly the basic dignity they deserve.●

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, May 31, 1978

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Reverend E. Colvin Baird, president-elect, Memphis Theological Seminary of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, Memphis, Tenn., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Creator and Redeemer of all humankind, we revere the memory of the founders of this great Republic, and we rejoice to see the work of humble men and women whose dedicated service keeps us strong. How firm, how strong, how sovereign Your presence in peoples who are open to Your energy. We pray for knowledge whereby the oppressed may be set free and for the skills whereby the oppressed and the oppressors may be joined in common cause. Grant that the riches of Your wisdom may lead us to high duty so that selfish inclinations may not determine the actions of this Congress. Keep us open to Your truth whatever its apparent source, and give us grace to celebrate it with people of every nation. Father, we offer this prayer hoping that Jesus Christ is joined with us in these petitions. Amen.

THE JOURNAL

The SPEAKER. The Chair has examined the Journal of the last day's proceedings and announces to the House his approval thereof.

Is there objection to the approval of the Journal?

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

The question is on the approval of the Journal.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. SYMMS. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 318, nays 14, present 1, not voting 101, as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments in which the concurrence of the House is requested, bills of the following titles:

H.R. 3996. An act for the relief of Mrs. Young Hee Kim Kang, Hee Jae Kang, Hee Jin Kang, and Hee Soo Kang.

H.R. 5029. An act to amend title 38 of the United States Code in order to authorize contracts with the Republic of the Philippines for the provision of hospital care and medical services to Commonwealth Army veterans and new Philippine Scouts for service-connected disabilities; to authorize the continued maintenance of a Veterans' Administration office in the Republic of the Philippines; and for other purposes.

H.R. 10882. An act to authorize appropriations to carry out conservation programs on military reservations and public lands during fiscal years 1979, 1980, and 1981.

H.R. 10884. An act to authorize appropriations to the Council on Environmental Quality for fiscal years 1979, 1980, and 1981.

H.R. 11302. An act to authorize appropriations for environmental research, development, and demonstrations for the fiscal year 1979, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 415. An act to amend the Anadromous Fish Conservation Act to include fish in Lake Champlain that ascend streams to spawn.

S. 990. An act to amend title 5, United States Code, to provide special allowances to certain physicians employed by the United States in order to enhance the recruitment and retention of such physicians.

REV. COLVIN BAIRD

(Mr. JONES of Tennessee asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JONES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, it is a real pleasure for me to have this opportunity to present Dr. Colvin Baird to this body today as our visiting chaplain. I have known Dr. Baird for a number of years. He served as the pastor of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church in my hometown of Yorkville, Tenn., for over 8 years. He is currently associated with the Memphis Theological Seminary in Memphis, Tenn.

Dr. Baird has long been involved in the affairs of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. He is a 1942 graduate of Bethel College in McKenzie, Tenn. In addition, he has obtained graduate degrees from Cumberland Presbyterian Theological Seminary, the Louisville Presbyterian Seminary, and the Princeton Theological Seminary.

He has devoted his life to the ministry and was first ordained by the Princeton Presbytery in 1940. He has served his fellow man well having served as a military chaplain, a church pastor, and as professor of church and society and field education director in the Memphis Theological Seminary. He is currently president-elect of the Memphis Theological Seminary, Memphis, Tenn.

Dr. Baird brings a wealth of knowledge in a wide range of fields to those he must deal with daily in his current role in the church. He is widely known as an author and a theological expert.

I consider it an honor and a personal privilege to have Dr. Baird among my most treasured friends. He is a man completely devoted to his vocation and to the service of his fellow man. He is also a very beloved family man and a man of accomplishment. It is fitting that he begins our session today with our prayer.

I welcome Dr. Baird to this Chamber and extend my appreciation to him for taking time out of his busy schedule to be with us today.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., May 26, 1978.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
The Speaker,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: Pusuant to the permission granted on May 25, 1978, the Clerk has received this date the following message from the Secretary of the Senate:

"That the Senate passed without amendment H.R. 11370, an Act to authorize an appropriation to reimburse certain expenditures for social services."

With kind regards, I am

Sincerely,

EDMUND L. HENSHAW, Jr.,
Clerk, U.S. House of Representatives.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to announce that pursuant to the authority granted him on Thursday, May 25, 1978, he did on Saturday, May 27, 1978, sign the following enrolled joint resolution:

Senate Joint Resolution 137. Joint resolution reaffirming the unity of the North Atlantic Alliance commitment.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., May 26, 1978.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
The Speaker,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I have the honor to transmit herewith a sealed envelope from the White House, received in the Clerk's Office at 11:55 a.m. on Friday, May 26, 1978, and said to contain a message from the President wherein he transmits the 16th Annual Employment and Training Report of the President.

With kind regards, I am

Sincerely,

EDMUND L. HENSHAW, Jr.,
Clerk, U.S. House of Representatives.

SIXTEENTH ANNUAL REPORT PERTAINING TO EMPLOYMENT AND TRAINING REQUIREMENTS, RESOURCES, AND UTILIZATION—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

To the Congress of the United States:

I am transmitting to the Congress the 16th annual report pertaining to employment and training requirements, resources, and utilization, as required by section 705(a) of the Comprehensive Employment and Training Act of 1973, as amended. This Employment and Training Report of the President also includes reports required by sections 209, 413, and 705(b), of the same act, as well as a report on services for veterans, as required by 38 U.S.C., sections 2007(c), and 2012(c).

JIMMY CARTER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 26, 1978.

CREDIT DUE PRESIDENT FOR FACING UP TO AFRICAN CRISIS

(Mr. SIKES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, credit is due President Carter for the emphasis he now is placing on the danger to the United States and the free world from continuing aggression in Africa by Russia and Cuba. It is reassuring to note support for the President's position from most of his close advisers.

An agreement reached between President Carter and President Giscard d'Estaing of France to offer support in weapons and supplies to African nations which unite for their own protection against Russian aggression is encouraging. Our interests have suffered because of lack of a positive program to deal with Russian and Cuban activities on the continent of Africa. Russia consistently disregards notes of protest, but a specific program of support for nations willing to resist aggression can be effective.

African nations have not shown a strong inclination to work together. Generally, they have relied upon European powers for support in times of crisis. There are organizations in which most African nations participate, but they have not been productive of joint efforts, particularly for defense.

The sands of time are running out for the West in Africa. The Soviets and the Cubans have succeeded in installing Marxist governments in one nation after another. As many as 45,000 to 50,000 Cubans in 16 countries do the bidding of Russia in these endeavors. Their major objectives are the Horn of Africa and the cape. Control of these strategic locations would allow them to dominate shipping lanes where much of the world's oil and minerals must travel. Both oil and minerals are essential to the West. While the Russians are reaching for these goals, they continue to take advantage of opportunities to advance Marxism in other countries. The Zaire adventure is the latest. There the United States reacted timidly to an invasion of Angola into copper-rich provinces essential to the economy of Zaire. It was French and Belgian troops who prevented a takeover of Zaire. However, the Russian-backed invasion; the slaughter of whites and the destruction of the mines may have crippled Zaire too badly for the present government to survive.

President Carter's new initiative should have strong backing in Congress during this crucial period in Africa. The outcome will have a very important bearing on America's future and that of the free world.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIKES. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I note with sadness that my esteemed colleague, the gentleman from Florida, is leaving these Chambers. Many of us who are here will miss the gentleman's courageous advocacy of American interests. You are a patriot and you have spoken time and time again about vital issues affecting the survival of our Nation.

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is very kind.

PRESS ASSISTANT L. T. (TEX) EASLEY RETIRING AFTER 41 YEARS OF DISTINGUISHED SERVICE

(Mr. POAGE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

● Mr. POAGE. Mr. Speaker, at midnight, tonight, a long-time friend of this House, L. T. (Tex) Easley, will retire after 41 years of distinguished service in Washington. Tex, who is currently the press assistant of the House Committee on Agriculture, first came to Washington in 1937 as the Associated Press representative covering Members of Congress from the Southwest. Prior to this assignment he had served as a young reporter for the Denver Post and Dallas Times Herald.

Tex has earned the respect of countless Members of Congress for his fair and accurate reporting abilities. He is an old-time journalist who has always done his own research and own legwork when pursuing a story.

All of Tex's friends know him to be one of the most delightful people they have ever met. I have never known Tex to lose his temper or speak unkindly of a single soul. Indeed he is a unique individual.

In 1967 I asked Tex to join the Agriculture Committee staff after he had completed one career, having served 30 years with AP, and it proved to be a wise move. He has performed an admirable service at the committee.

While Tex has earned his retirement and he does have endless projects he and Bonita have planned for many years, including a marathon trip to South America, I hope Tex will take the time to write about his experiences. I know for a fact he has hundreds of interesting tales to relate about happenings in Washington during the 41 years he has been here.

Tex will be missed by all of us, but he has promised to keep in touch. I know we have enjoyed him as a friend and fellow worker and we wish him and Bonita happy and exciting days ahead.●

ARE THESE THREATS NECESSARY?

(Mr. VANIK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, the saber-rattling by the administration during the past several days is frightening and ominous.

I hope that it is not a diversionary tactic to bolster the sagging popularity of the administration.

Complaints have been made by the administration about congressional restraints on its ability to adventure abroad. A case has not been made as to what constitutes the restraints or what actions would have been justified and what commitments would have been made if the administration had a free hand.

The American people are as worried about an African involvement as they were about Vietnam. They should be; the risks are infinitely greater. In this risky and threatening climate, Congress is not likely to abdicate its power of review.●

TAX CREDITS FOR PRIVATE SCHOOL TUITION: THE CONSTITUTIONAL RESPONSIBILITY OF CONGRESS

(Mr. ASHBROOK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I firmly believe that Federal legislation to give tax credits for tuition payments to private elementary and secondary schools, including church-related schools, is—and by any reasonable standard ought to be—constitutional.

I also firmly believe that such legislation is sound public policy, in that it would benefit all American education by helping to preserve freedom of choice and much needed diversity in our total system; it would help also to insure the first amendment guarantee of free exercise of religion for families for whom tuition payments are an increasing financial burden.

Yet, I am troubled by the nature of the continuing controversy over the constitutionality of such legislation. There is, of course, general acceptance of the constitutionality of tax credits for tuition payments to colleges and universities. But some of my colleagues have seized upon the rather clouded opinions of the Supreme Court to argue that benefits should not be extended to parents at the elementary and secondary school level. I think that argument is spurious. Worse, it is a misconception of the constitutional role of Congress.

Whatever the personal views of a Member of Congress may be on this issue, it is imperative that all of us remember some fundamental concepts of our constitutional structure. One is the separation of powers. The Congress not only has the sole constitutional right to legislate, but also to make its own independent determination of the constitutionality of its actions. It was in deference to this responsibility that the U.S. Supreme Court very early fashioned the doctrine of the presumption of the constitutionality—an act of Congress is presumed at the outset to be constitutional and the presumption may not lightly be overturned.

As in any rebuttable presumption in law, all reasonable doubts are resolved in favor of the presumed constitutionality. Justice Brandeis, one of our truly great scholars of the law to serve on the Supreme Court, provided a comprehensive discussion of the doctrine in Ashwander v. Tennessee Valley Authority, 297 U.S. 288 (1936). He wrote of "the long established presumption in favor of the constitutionality of a statute," quoting Chief Justice John Marshall in Dartmouth v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518 (1819), to the effect that the Court even by that time had declared repeatedly:

> That, in no doubtful case, would it pronounce a legislative act to be contrary to the Constitution.

Finally, Justice Brandeis reminded his readers of the admonition of Chief Justice Tilghman of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, in 1811, that—

> An Act of the legislature is not to be declared void, unless the violation of the Constitution is so manifest as to leave no room for reasonable doubt.

I stress this constitutional history as expounded by Justice Brandeis, because it is critically relevant to the judgment the Congress will have to make. First, the judgment of constitutionality is ours to make in the first instance, and it will have great legal weight in any subsequent determination the Supreme Court may be called upon to make. We ought to fully understand that. Second, the 1973 case in which the U.S. Supreme Court struck down a New York State statutory provision somewhat similar to the one we have under consideration can be distinguished from proposed Federal legislation. In my judgment—and a number of constitutional scholars concur in it—the decided cases leave not a "reasonable doubt," but a huge doubt that Federal tax credits for private school tuition would offend the establishment clause of the first amendment. Finally, even if we felt that the decision in the one case most in point could not be distinguished, I think the Congress should exercise its own judgment on tax credit legislation and give the Court an opportunity to reverse a decision which in the view of Chief Justice Burger and Justices White and Rehnquist was wrong.

Those who argue that a tax credit on account of private elementary and secondary school tuition payments is unconstitutional always cite Committee for Public Education and Religious Liberty v. Nyquist, 413 U.S. 756 (1973), in which the Court struck down a provision for tax relief for parents of children attending private schools. That provision has been variously described as a tax "credit" and a "deduction," but unlike the proposal before Congress it was unrelated to the amount of tuition actually paid. Moreover, it was a part of a comprehensive measure containing two other more direct forms of assistance (also declared unconstitutional), all of which was specifically designed to aid parents of private school children, over 95 percent of whom attended schools of a single religious denomination. Even so, the Court did not question the secular purpose of the New York statute (the first requirement for constitutionality under the establishment clause of the first amendment), but contended that it had the impermissible effect of advancing religion in that it would act as an inducement for parents to send their children to parochial schools. There are many possible grounds for making a distinction between the proposed Federal tax credits and the New York statute.

The most obvious distinction is that the two are far from identical. The proposal before Congress is tied directly to the amount of tuition paid; it would be part of a legislative package to assist all taxpayers who pay tuition for education, including credits for college and university tuition payments about which there is no constitutional issue (thus the class of beneficiaries is much broader than under the New York statute, which has been a consideration in these cases); the children of parents aided would be attending schools of many religious faiths and denominations as well as a significant number of nondenominational and completely secular schools; it is a Federal, rather than a State statute. The list could be extended, but the point is that Nyquist can be distinguished from a case involving the Federal tax credits. The decision in Nyquist in no sense ought to influence the action of Congress on this issue.

There is another, and in many ways a more compelling, constitutional argument in favor of tax credits on account of the payment of private school tuition. That is simply that the first amendment guarantee of religious freedom is two-pronged: Beyond the prohibition of a "law respecting an establishment of religion" there is the free exercise clause which prohibits interference with the free exercise of religion. Over 50 years ago in the landmark case of Pierce v. Society of Sisters, 268 U.S. 510 (1925) the Supreme Court protected the right of parents to choose a private education for their children by holding that the Constitution "* * * excludes any general power to the State to standardize its children by forcing them to accept instruction from public teachers only." Parental rights and religious freedom in education were emphatically reaffirmed by the Court in Wisconsin v. Yoder, et al., 406 U.S. 205 (1972) when it held that the State could not force Amish parents to send their children to school beyond the eighth grade because:

> The conclusion is inescapable that secondary schooling, by exposing Amish children to wordly influences in terms of attitudes, goals, and values contrary to beliefs, and by substantially interfering with the religious development of the Amish child and his integration into the way of life of the Amish faith community at the crucial adolescent stage of development, contravenes the basic religious tenets and practice of the Amish faith, both as to parent and child.

Thus the Court has been sensitive to and has upheld the free exercise of religion in education as against direct attack by the state. But what we are seeing in America today is an indirect attack upon freedom of choice in education through economic forces largely within the control of the Government.

The ravages of inflation and the ever-increasing burden of taxation threaten to eliminate freedom of choice in education for the average American family as surely as the direct assaults by the state found unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. If all but the wealthier families are priced out of the private school market, the guarantee of free exercise of religion in education will become meaningless. So it is a matter of urgency for the Congress to act to provide relief and for the courts to rethink and reconsider the balance between the establishment clause and the free exercise clause of the first amendment.

But let me return to the fundamental point of congressional responsibility. This January before the Senate Committee on Finance, Antonin Scalia, a distinguished professor of law at the University of Chicago, testified on the constitutionality of tuition tax credits. He began by saying that the committee might be surprised by "the barrage of categorical assertions you receive on both sides of the issue—that the proposal before you, insofar as it provides tax relief for tuition payments to sectarian schools, clearly should be or clearly should not be, regarded as constitutional." He then went on to say:

> I side with the former camp myself, but that is not primarily what I want to talk to you about. The principal point I want to make is that, regardless of how one feels about the "shoulds" of the matter, the issue has not been resolved by any holding, or even by any consistent line of dictum, from the Supreme Court. And for that reason, the responsibility which rests upon you is all the greater. In approving or disapproving the present proposal on constitutional grounds, you will not be following—and cannot pretend to be following—any dictate of the Supreme Court, but will rather be expressing your sense, and the sense of the society, as to what our most profound national convictions require. Your expression, in turn, can be expected to influence the course which the Supreme Court will steer in the future.

That is the constitutional challenge facing the Congress on this issue. It is one I gladly accept. I urge my colleagues to accept it, because that is the plain duty of the Congress. We cannot perform the functions of the Supreme Court; but just as surely, neither can we permit it to perform ours.

MEMBERS URGED TO PAY CLOSE ATTENTION TO CONSIDERATION OF RESOLUTION ON SOUTH KOREAN GOVERNMENT

(Mr. FINDLEY asked and was given permission to address the House 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to urge my colleagues to stay on the floor for at least the next half hour to 40 minutes. The first piece of legislation under suspension of the rules is a resolution dealing with our very important ally, the Republic of Korea. There will be three or four other bills under suspension after that.

If we follow our traditional habits, many of us will leave the floor and not come back until after discussion has been had of all these bills considered under suspension. I ask the Members to please stick around and listen to the discussion of this issue.

Mr. Speaker, we are about to do something very foolish if we enact this resolution on the Republic of Korea. I urge the Members to read the additional views contained in the committee report, especially if they find they cannot stay on the floor and listen to this discussion.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON H.R. 6669, NATIONAL CLIMATE PROGRAM ACT OF 1977

Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 6669) to establish a national climate program, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment thereto, disagree to the Senate amendment, and request a conference with the Senate thereon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California? The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. TEAGUE, BROWN of California, AMBRO, WIRTH, BEILENSON, WALKER, and WINN.

CENTRAL, WESTERN, AND SOUTH PACIFIC FISHERIES DEVELOPMENT ACT

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H.R. 11657) to authorize appropriations to carry out the Central, Western, and South Pacific Fisheries Development Act until the close of fiscal year 1983, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Central, Western, and South Pacific Fisheries Development Act (16 U.S.C. 758e—758e–5) is amended as follows:

(1) Section 2 of such Act (16 U.S.C. 758e) is amended by inserting "with the Pacific Tuna Development Foundation or other agency or organization," immediately after "contract,".

(2) Section 3 of such Act (16 U.S.C. 758–1) is amended by (A) inserting "the Secretary of State," immediately after "Interior,"; (B) inserting "the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands," immediately after the "Trust Territories of the Pacific Islands,"; (C) striking out "and" immediately after "institutions,"; and (D) inserting ", and all appropriate member nations of a South Pacific regional fishery agency (hereinafter referred to in this Act as the 'agency'), if such an agency is formed" immediately after "industry".

(3) Such Act is further amended by inserting immediately after section 3 thereof the following:

"SEC. 4. In addition to the authority granted in section 2, the Secretary, in consultation with representatives of all interested member nations of the agency, and those parties set forth in section 3, may establish in accordance with section 2, a cooperative program for the development of tuna and other latent fisheries resources of the Central, Western, and South Pacific Ocean to be submitted to the President and the Congress within one year following official formation of the agency. The Secretary shall make available to all interested member nations of the agency the results and findings of research or development projects carried out under this Act.".

(4) Sections 4, 5, 6, and 7 of such Act are redesignated sections 5, 6, 7, and 8, respectively.

SEC. 2. Section 8 of the Central, Western, and South Pacific Fisheries Development Act (16 U.S.C. 768e–5), as redesignated, is amended by—

(1) placing the amendment made to such section by the Act of July 6, 1976 (relating to authorizations of appropriations for such Fisheries Development Act) immediately after "June 30, 1976, the sum of $3,000,000"; and

(2) striking out "$3,000,000," the second place it then appears in such section, and inserting in lieu thereof "$4,000,000, and for each of the fiscal years 1980, 1981, and 1982, the sum of $5,000,000,".

Amend the title so as to read: "An Act to amend the Central, Western, and South Pacific Fisheries Development Act to increase the appropriation authorization through fiscal year 1982, to expand the United States fisheries development effort, and to cooperate in the formation and research of the South Pacific regional fishery agency, and for other purposes.".

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will not object, but I do take this time to give the chairman of our committee an opportunity to explain just what we are doing here with this legislation.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORSYTHE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, on May 1, 1978, the House passed H.R. 11657 by a vote of 326 yeas to 23 nays. As it passed the House, H.R. 11657 would do two things.

First, it would include the Secretary of State and the government of the Commonwealth of the Northern Mariana Islands in the list of parties with whom the Secretary of Commerce must consult before carrying out any fisheries development projects pursuant to the Central, Western, and South Pacific Fisheries Development Act.

Second, it would increase the appropriation authorization for the period beginning July 1, 1976, and ending September 30, 1979, from $3 to $6 million and would authorize $6 million to be appropriated for each of fiscal years 1980 through 1983, to carry out the purposes of the act.

Mr. Speaker, on May 18, 1978, the Senate agreed to H.R. 1167 with the following amendments, all of which were germane to the bill:

First, it would specifically name the Pacific Tuna Development Foundation (PTDF) as an organization with whom the Secretary of Commerce may enter into a contract to carry out fishery development projects pursuant to the act. PTDF is comprised of the chief executives of Hawaii, Guam, American Samoa, the Commonwealth of the Northern Marianas, the Trust Territory of the Pacific, four representatives of the U.S. tuna industry, and an at-large member. It is presently the sole party with whom the Secretary of Commerce contracts in carrying out such fisheries development projects.

Second, it would include appropriate member nations of an international South Pacific regional fishery agency in the list of parties with whom the Secretary of Commerce must consult before carrying out any fishery development projects pursuant to the act. There is presently a strong move to form such an international fishery agency, and it would be in the best interest of the United States to closely work with this agency, if it is formed.

Third, it would add a new section to the Central, Western, and South Pacific Fisheries Development Act to grant the Secretary of Commerce the authority to begin a fishery development program in cooperation with interested and affected South Pacific agency member nations should the United States become a member of this agency.

Finally, it would increase the authorization of appropriations for the period beginning July 1, 1976, and ending September 30, 1979 from $3 to $4 million, and would authorize $5 million to be appropriated for each of fiscal years 1980 through 1982, to carry out the purposes of the act.

Mr. Speaker, the maximum cost to the Federal Government in carrying out the House version of the bill over a 5-year period would be $27 million. The Senate version of the bill is estimated to cost only $16 million for carrying out the program over a 4-year period, $11 million less than the House version.

Mr. Speaker, the Senate version of H.R. 11657 is completely acceptable to the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee and I urge the House to concur in the Senate amendments and pass the bill H.R. 11657, as amended.

Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state that I support the Senate amendments, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SEAL BEACH, GREAT DISMAL SWAMP, AND SAN FRANCISCO BAY NATIONAL WILDLIFE REFUGES AUTHORIZATIONS

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 5493) to extend until October 1, 1980, the appropriation authorizations for the Seal Beach, Great Dismal Swamp, and San Francisco Bay National Wildlife Refuges, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 1, strike out all after line 7 over to and including line 5 on page 2 and insert:

SEC. 2. The Act of June 30, 1972 (36 Stat. 391) establishing the Tinicum National Environmental Center, as amended by the Act of October 18, 1976 (90 Stat. 2528), is amended—

(1) by striking "Wanamaker Avenue" in the last sentence of section 2 and inserting in lieu thereof "Darby Creek"; and

(2) by amending section 7 to read as follows:

SEC. 7. For the period beginning July 1, 1972, and ending September 30, 1980, there are authorized to be appropriated $11,100,000 to carry out the purposes of this Act.".

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the House amendment to the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the House amendment to the Senate amendment, as follows:

In the Senate amendment, strike out the matter appearing after "page 2" and insert a period.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do so again to ask the chairman to explain the import of this legislation.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORSYTHE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 5493 passed the House on May 16, 1977. As it passed the House, H.R. 5493 would do three things:

First, it would extend the funding authorization for the San Francisco Bay National Wildlife Refuge for an additional 3 years, until September 30, 1980, at the same level of funding that exists under present law, $20,300,000.

Second, it would extend the funding authorization for the Seal Beach National Wildlife Refuge for an additional 3 years, until September 30, 1980, at the same level of funding that exists under present law, $525,000.

Third, it would authorize to be appropriated for the 3-year period—October 1, 1977, to September 30, 1980—$21,100,000 for the Great Dismal Swamp National Wildlife Refuge.

Mr. Speaker, on May 24, 1977, the Senate agreed to the bill as it passed the House, with an amendment to provide as follows:

First, it eliminated from the coverage of the bill the provision that would extend the appropriation-authorization of $525,000 for the Seal Beach National Wildlife Refuge. This change is not objectionable since the Department of the Interior plans to obtain funds for the administration of this refuge, just as it has in the past, from its general funds.

Second, it added language to the bill for the Tinicum National Environmental Center. This provision is no longer needed since funds for the center were included in H.R. 2817, which passed the House on May 10, 1977, and the Senate on October 19, 1977, and which is now Public Law 95–152.

Mr. Speaker, the amendment which we are asking the House to concur in today, with an amendment, would result in the passage of H.R. 5493 as it originally passed the House, except the provision that would provide funds for the Seal Beach Refuge would be excluded which, as I previously indicated, is no longer needed.

Mr. Speaker, shortly after passage of H.R. 5493 by the House in May of last year, colleagues WALTER JONES and ROBERT DANIEL asked me to hold in abeyance further consideration of the bill pending their reaching an understanding with the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, of the Department of the Interior, as it relates to the administration of the Dismal Swamp National Wildlife Refuge.

I will include the correspondence between colleagues JONES and DANIEL and the Department of the Interior be included in the RECORD of today's proceedings immediately following my statement so that there will be a permanent record of this understanding for future reference.

Mr. Speaker, the Senate amendment to the bill is germane, and it would not result in any additional cost to the Federal Government. The House amendment that we are asking the Members to agree to today also is germane to the bill, and is technical in nature only.

Mr. Speaker, the correspondence referred to is as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., May 9, 1978.

Hon. ROBERT L. LEGGETT,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Fisheries and Wildlife Conservation and the Environment, Longworth House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR BOB: This relates further to your letter of February 21 and to my response of March 20 concerning H. R. 5493.

As I advised you at that time, I wanted to obtain from the property owners a statement concerning whether there was a clear understanding on the part of all concerned what the Secretary meant when he stated that the Department had no intentions of pressuring anyone to sell against their wishes "as long as they continue to manage their lands in a manner that does not adversely impact the swamp."

I enclose for your information copies of two letters, one dated March 24 and one dated April 26, which I believe outline pretty clearly the commitment which the office of the Secretary has made with respect to problems involved with the property owners.

It is pointed out that the Department of Interior has agreed that it was not the intent of the Department that property owners would have to request permission for normal farming operation or for timber cutting.

In view of the commitments made in these two letters, I have no further objection to the provisions of H. R. 5493. I would request, however, that these two letters be made a part of the Committee's record so that there may be no question concerning the intent of the Committee or the Congress with respect to restrictions placed on the property owners in question.

I am forever grateful to you for your patience in this matter and for your cooperation.

With kind personal regards.

Sincerely,

ROBERT W. DANIEL, Jr.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D.C., April 26, 1978.

Hon. ROBERT W. DANIEL, JR.,
U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. DANIEL: In your letter of March 28 you asked for clarification of our intent in regard to acquisition at Great Dismal Swamp.

Basically our position has changed since the letter of February 3. We did want to reserve the right to condemn if lands were to be subdivided and residential or other construction initiated. It was not our intent that private owners would have to request permission for normal farming operations or timber cutting.

Upon further review, we are confident that none of the owners have such intentions. Furthermore, such actions would likely be sufficiently controlled by zoning requirements.

There are opportunities to use the authorization available to acquire land in the main portion of the swamp from willing sellers. Therefore, in our letter of March 24, we made a commitment to purchase from willing sellers only during the period of the authorization contained in H.R. 5493. Hopefully, at the end of that period our studies will be complete and we will have reached agreement with all of the owners as to the means of protecting the swamp.

I trust that this will clarify our intent. If not, please let us know as we are anxious to proceed with passage of the authorization so that we can settle with those owners that are now waiting for their money.

Sincerely,

DAVID F. HALES,
Acting Assistant Secretary for Fish and Wildlife and Parks.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C., April 28, 1978.

Hon. ROBERT L. LEGGETT,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Fisheries, Wildlife Conservation, and the Environment, Longworth House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: At my request the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee has deferred final action on H.R. 5493, a bill authorizing funds for various national wildlife refuges. I asked for this "hold" to enable landowners whose properties adjoin the Great Dismal Swamp National Wildlife Refuge to negotiate with the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service about the proposed boundaries for the Refuge.

I am concerned for the small landowners in the area. Their families have owned these lands for years. They appreciate and love the Dismal Swamp and do not want to do anything to destroy it. Still, they very much want to retain their own lands, fields, and woodlots. I share their belief that boundaries for the Refuge can be set so that these citizens can keep and use their own property.

I believe that the following statements accurately summarize conclusions reached after meetings between myself, landowners, and Fish and Wildlife Service officials:

1. FWS acknowledges that the proposed boundaries circulated last summer were tentative and may be changed.

2. FWS has pledged to redraw the boundaries to lessen impacts on private landowners whenever possible, so long as the integrity of the swamp ecosystem and the Refuge are protected. All parties agree that the Refuge should include only that acreage necessary to preserve the Dismal Swamp proper.

3. FWS will conduct hydrology and biologic studies which will allow the drawing of a "biologic" boundary.

4. FWS will negotiate in good faith on a continuing basis with unofficial committees representing landowners in North Carolina and Virginia to set a satisfactory boundary and to resolve controversies.

5. If private lands must fall within the Refuge boundaries, FWS will pursue non-fee-purchase alternatives, such as water and scenic easements, life tenancies, etc., with private landowners, whenever possible.

6. FWS pledges not to purchase any private holdings, except from willing sellers, during the lifetime of the authorization (until October 1, 1980). FWS will not use condemnation procedures during this time except to clear title of lands of willing sellers.

With these understandings, I now withdraw my request for deferring action on H.R. 5493. I ask that this letter and the attached correspondence be retained in the Committee's official files for future reference with regard to further acquisition and development of the Great Dismal Swamp National Wildlife Refuge.

Many thanks for your cooperation and patience during the time this problem was being negotiated.

With best regards, I am

Sincerely,

WALTER B. JONES,
Member of Congress.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, D.C., March 24, 1978.

Hon. WALTER B. JONES,
House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. JONES: We understand that you requested H.R. 5493, which would extend the authorization for appropriations for Great Dismal Swamp National Wildlife Refuge until September 30, 1980, to be held up by the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee until concerns of landowners along the west boundary of the refuge about acquisition of their land can be resolved. At the center of the controversy is the fear that we will acquire the wooded portions of their farms through condemnation.

With your assistance we are working with landowner committees to resolve the issues of concern. Unfortunately, additional studies as to the hydrology of the area and future management of this portion of the refuge may take some time. The controversy involves only about 4,000 acres, which is a relatively insignificant portion of the 123,000-acre swamp area.

We have on hand options to acquire substantial acreages in the main portion of the swamp. This acquisition is being delayed pending extension of the authorization.

We do not want to delay all progress until we can work out the details with the landowners of the west side. We do not believe that delay in this fringe area is any threat to the swamp. Therefore, to allay the concerns of these landowners I assure you that we will purchase only from willing sellers during the authorization in H.R. 5493. We will not take condemnation action except to assist a willing seller clear title to his land.

It is our understanding that this assurance will remove your objections to passage of this bill. We would appreciate any assistance you can give toward moving the authorization forward so that we can acquire some large ownerships that are essential to completion of the refuge.

Sincerely yours,

DAVID F. HALES,
Deputy Assistant Secretary for Fish and Wildlife and Parks.

Mr. FORSYTHE. Mr. Speaker, I support the amendment, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DIRECTING CLERK OF THE HOUSE TO MAKE CORRECTION IN ENROLLMENT OF H.R. 5493, SEAL BEACH, GREAT DISMAL SWAMP, AND SAN FRANCISCO BAY NATIONAL WILDLIFE REFUGES AUTHORIZATIONS

Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 635) directing the Clerk of the House of Representatives to make a correction in the enrollment of H.R. 5493, to extend until October 1, 1980, the appropriation authorizations for the Seal Beach, Great Dismal Swamp, and San Francisco National Wildlife Refuges, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

H. CON. RES. 635

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That in the enrollment of the bill (H.R. 5493) to extend until October 1, 1980, the appropriation authorizations for the Seal Beach, Great Dismal Swamp, and San Francisco Bay National Wildlife Refuges, the Clerk of the House of Representatives shall make the following corrections:

Page 2, line 6, of the House engrossed bill, strike out "SEC. 3." and insert "SEC. 2.".

Amend the title of the House engrossed bill to read as follows: "A bill to extend until October 1, 1980, the appropriation authorizations for the Great Dismal Swamp and San Francisco Bay National Wildlife Refuges.".

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make an announcement. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 3(b) of rule XXVII, the Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on each motion to suspend the rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule XV.

After all motions to suspend the rules have been entertained and debated, and after those motions to be determined by "nonrecord" votes have been disposed of, the Chair will then put the question on each motion on which the further proceedings were postponed.

SENSE OF CONGRESS THAT KOREAN GOVERNMENT COOPERATE WITH COMMITTEE ON STANDARDS OF OFFICIAL CONDUCT

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and agree to the resolution (H. Res. 1194) expressing the sense of the House that until the testimony of Kim Dong Jo is made available under oath to the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, the transfer of anything of value to the Republic of Korea for nonmilitary purposes should be made only where the refusal to do so would imperil the national security of the United States or the territorial integrity of the Republic of Korea; and that refusal of the United States to make such transfers would not, under present circumstances, imperil the national security of the United States or the territorial integrity of the Republic of Korea, as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. RES. 1194

Whereas the House of Representatives in H. Res. 868, adopted unanimously on October 31, 1977, stated that "the Government of the Republic of Korea should cooperate fully and without reservation with the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct and with its special counsel to provide complete access to all facts relevant to" the investigation being conducted by that committee pursuant to H. Res. 252, adopted February 9, 1977;

Whereas information made public at hearings conducted by that committee establishes that the investigation cannot be completed with regard to some persons without the testimony of Kim Dong Jo, a former ambassador of the Republic of Korea to the United States who is knowledgeable about certain facts central to the committee's inquiry;

Whereas the Government of the Republic of Korea has not cooperated fully with the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct in its efforts to obtain the testimony of Kim Dong Jo;

Whereas the relationship between the United States and the Republic of Korea is interdependent and depends upon mutual trust and full cooperation in all aspects of that relationship;

Whereas the House seeks to obtain the testimony of Kim Dong Jo consistent with international law and practice; and

Whereas a complete investigation is necessary for the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct to discharge its responsibilities and is indispensable to the fulfillment of the obligations of the House of Representatives to the public: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that the Government of the Republic of Korea, in accordance with the principle of comity between allies, should cooperate fully with the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct and its special counsel in the efforts of that committee to obtain information, which is needed to complete the investigation required by H. Res.

252, from Kim Dong Jo under oath, affirmation, or comparable means of assuring reliability which are satisfactory to that committee.

SEC. 2. If Kim Dong Jo should refuse to provide at an early date the information necessary for that investigation, the House, when considering any proposed appropriation of funds for nonmilitary assistance for the Republic of Korea, will regard such refusal as of serious consequence for United States-Korean relations and will be prepared to deny or reduce such assistance unless it finds that such a denial or reduction would harm the national security of the United States or imperil the territorial integrity of the Republic of Korea.

SEC. 3. It is the sense of the House of Representatives that the denial or reduction of nonmilitary assistance for the Republic of Korea would not, at the present time, harm the national security of the United States or imperil the territorial integrity of the Republic of Korea.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) and the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY) will be recognized for 20 minutes each.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI).

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Resolution 1194, as amended, regarding the requested testimony of former Korean Ambassador Kim Dong Jo before the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct.

The basic purpose of this resolution is simple and, hopefully, compelling.

The resolution, as amended, expresses the sense of this House that the South Korean Government should cooperate fully with the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct and its special counsel so that the committee may secure from former Ambassador Kim Dong Jo the information needed to complete its investigation—and the resolution emphasizes that such testimony must be given under oath, affirmation, or other reliabel means of verification satisfactory to the committee.

The amended resolution also expresses the sense of the House that refusal on the part of the South Korean Government to provide this information through the testimony of Kim Dong Jo will be regarded by this body as of serious consequence for United States–Korean relations and, most importantly, that in response to such a refusal, the House will be prepared to deny or reduce nonmilitary assistance to South Korea, unless the House finds that such an action would harm the national security of the United States or imperil the territorial integrity of South Korea.

Mr. Speaker, the resolving clause of the resolution states that it is the sense of the House that a denial of reduction of nonmilitary aid to the South Korean Government would not at the present time, harm our country's national security nor would such action imperil the territorial integrity of South Korea.

The issues addressed in this resolution were first considered by the House less than 2 weeks ago when the distinguished majority leader, at the behest of the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, made a unanimous consent request to pass a resolution, House Resolution 1192, on this matter. At that time several Members correctly pointed out that the resolution, which had been hastily drafted, raised serious questions with regard to the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, U.S. security commitments in Northeast Asia, and U.S. obligations to certain international organizations.

In view of these questions, the unanimous consent request was withdrawn.

A similar resolution, House Resolution 1194 was subsequently introduced.

These resolutions were referred to the Committee on International Relations which met promptly on Monday May 22, 1978, to hear testimony on the measures from Deputy Secretary of State Warren Christopher and from the Special Counsel to the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, Mr. Leon Jaworski.

After hearing the testimony of Deputy Secretary Christopher and Mr. Jaworski, the committee, on May 23, began markup of House Resolution 1194. After concentrated debate and careful deliberation, the committee unanimously adopted, on May 24, a substitute amendment to the resolution which had been prepared by a bipartisan ad hoc group of committee members appointed by the Chair who either supported or opposed the resolution in its original form.

In considering House Resolution 1194, the committee worked diligently to reconcile two divergent goals:

On the one hand we wanted to produce a resolution which would encourage the South Korean Government to provide, through former Ambassador Kim Dong Jo, testimony needed to corroborate information already obtained by the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct in its investigation.

On the other hand, the committee desired that the resolution not violate diplomatic rights, privileges, and immunities protected by international law.

In addition to reconciling those two goals, the committee also wanted to bring to the floor a resolution which would send the clear, unmistakeable message to the South Korean Government that the House of Representatives is serious in its efforts to bring the investigation to an early, just and honorable conclusion and that the availability of Kim Dong Jo is indispensable to that goal.

At the same time, the committee desired that the resolution not be interpreted as a weakening of our resolve to continue to meet U.S. security commitments and responsibilities in Northeast Asia.

I am firmly convinced that House Resolution 1194, as amended, sufficiently meets all of these concerns.

By stating in the resolution that the House will be prepared to deny or reduce U.S. nonmilitary assistance to South Korea if that Government refuses to cooperate, the House is saying in effect that it means what it says here. The resolution is unequivocal in its message that only the fullest cooperation of the South Korean Government will be acceptable.

By stating that the House will be prepared to deny or reduce such assistance unless it finds that such action would harm U.S. National Security or the territorial integrity of South Korea, the resolution is not unmindful of our broader interests and responsibilities in Northeast Asia.

Mr. Speaker, the cloud of suspicion brought about by the alleged improper activities of the South Korean Government has lingered over this body far too long. This resolution says to our friend and ally that the prompt, successful conclusion of the investigation is essential to the integrity of the House and that further delay will be injurious to the interests of both countries.

H.R. 1194, as amended, was approved by a recorded vote of all members of the House International Relations Committee, 37 to 0. I strongly urge the House to give its unanimous support to the resolution as well.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I yield to the distinguished majority leader, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. WRIGHT).

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the distinguished chairman for yielding to me. I take this time to congratulate the gentleman from Wisconsin and the members of the House Committee on International Relations on a thoroughly workmanlike job. This resolution does indeed represent a more carefully drafted statement than the one which I presented some 2 weeks ago on the floor of this House. I believe the committee has done craftsmanlike work in reconciling the two paramount objectives of the House. I support the resolution.

I can report to the Members that I have discussed it with Mr. Jaworski, the Special Counsel of the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct; he supports this resolution. I think it would be very, very unfortunate if we were to produce less than a resounding vote for this resolution today. I therefore, urge all of our colleagues on both sides of the aisle to give this resolution the overwhelming and bipartisan support that it deserves.

Our vote today must be a clear and unequivocal expression of the desire—indeed, the insistence—on the part of this House to remove the cloud of suspicion that has hovered for too long over these alleged relationships. We have drafted this expression in such a way as to respect the rights and the territorial integrity of the Government of South Korea.

This resolution declares in effect our expectation that the Government of South Korea will indeed cooperate with our request. It states the things which the House will be prepared to do in the event that we should be disappointed in that expectation. I trust that the House will indeed be prepared to do those things, but I fully anticipate that the Government of South Korea will cooperate with the House in response to this very clear message today. I urge all Members, therefore, to support this resolution.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I thank the majority leader for his kind remarks about the efforts of the House International Relations Committee. Also I wish to commend the gentleman for his role in counseling our committee on the resolution before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY) is recognized for 20 minutes.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, I pose a parliamentary inquiry.

Is there any way, short of a unanimous-consent request, by which the House could vacate further proceedings under this suspension and postpone until a later date the consideration, subject to the call of the leadership?

The SPEAKER. It would require unanimous consent.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, I will make such a request in just a moment, but before I do I want to explain why I make the request.

The New York Times today published an account from Seoul, Korea, written by one of their respected correspondents, stating:

SEOUL, May 30.—Kim Dong Jo, former South Korean Ambassador to the United States and one of the key figures in the Korean influence-buying scandal under investigation by Congress, is now likely to go to Washington to testify, Western diplomats said today.

After many months of pressure on Mr. Kim, by Congress, Western officials appear for the first time to be confident that there are no compelling reasons why his former diplomatic status should prevent him from giving testimony in Washington.

There is more to the story, but that is the substance of it.

The procedure under which we operate prohibits amendments. If amendments were possible, an amendment to strike sections 2 and 3 would leave the resolution in perfect order, a proper request of an ally for cooperation in the proceedings of the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct. As it is, we cannot amend the resolution.

If we adopt the resolution today, it will amount to a threat, a threat to an ally, a very important ally of the United States, despite the fact that we have news that Kim Dong Jo may already be willing to come to Washington to testify.

For those reasons—and I hope the majority leader has been able to attend to my remarks—in order to give Kim Dong Jo a chance to consider this and hopefully to come to Washington to cooperate by giving testimony, I do ask unanimous consent that the House vacate further proceedings under this request for suspension of the rules, of course leaving the resolution unimpaired and subject to recall by the leadership at any date that the leadership might wish to make such a decision.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this to me is a very important resolution. I am distressed that there are so few Members of the House who are going to attend its consideration.

I oppose the resolution. I urge my colleagues to do so for the following reasons:

First of all, approval of this resolution would constitute a legislated threat against a very important ally, the Republic of Korea, to whom we look for continued cooperation to restrain Soviet expansion in the Far East.

Legislated threats rarely have any value and can complicate the administration of the foreign relations of the United States rather than accomplishing our intended goals. We seem never—and I repeat—we seem never to learn by experience. We are now in the dreadful agony of trying to correct the effect of a legislated threat against another ally, the Republic of Turkey and witness also the stark failure of our legislated threat against another friend, Brazil.

This resolution certainly will not accomplish its stated purpose of securing testimony from Kim Dong Jo. If Mr. Kim testifies, it will be in spite of this resolution and not because of it. In fact, the effect of this resolution is to tend to back the Koreans into a corner. Their cooperation in making the former Ambassador available after such a threat would win them the epithet of being a lackey of the United States which is certainly an epithet they would not relish. Actually it may cause Kim to reconsider what seems to be his intention of cooperating as reported in today's New York Times.

Second, the threat of cutting off all nonmilitary aid contained in this legislation, if carried out, would have unfortunate consequences to the United States. It would actually hurt the United States more than it would hurt Korea. The aid involved is principally $56 million in Public Law 480, title I commodities. Title I commodities are contracts to buy for hard currency. To be sure, these have attractive terms, with low interest rates, but they involve sales markets for U.S. farmers.

Not only would our balance of payments suffer if we should terminate this program, but so would our farmers who are eagerly looking for new markets for grain and for cotton.

A cutoff of economic aid would also violate—and here is a very important matter that reaches into many districts, especially those on the eastern seaboard—it would violate an agreement we have with South Korea relating to Korean textile exports to the United States.

This agreement, known as the "David Kennedy Understanding," went into effect in 1971. It guaranteed a certain level of title I contracts with South Korea in exchange for limitations on the part of Korea on the level of exports of textiles from that country into this country—an agreement that many congressional districts in this Nation feel is very important.

The Koreans have lived up to their end of the agreement. We should not violate our obligations by denying them Public Law 480, title I.

Surely no one would suggest that pulling back Peace Corps people from Korea would amount to much of a threat against them, or much of a credible threat. I am troubled by the approach embodied in House Resolution 1194 which would end a program designed to benefit directly the people—particularly the poor people—of South Korea. Rural development projects and health programs for tuberculosis and leprosy victims.

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, I am reluctant to yield at this time simply because of the limitation of time that we face, and there are a few other points that I wish to make, and then I will be glad to yield to anyone who would like to be heard from if I have the time.

I think we should also realize that this resolution could jeopardize the $1 billion in U.S. farm products that we send to South Korea annually. These are dollar sales. We have a gentleman's agreement with the Republic of Korea that as long as we continue our title I program Korea will continue to import agricultural commodities almost exclusively from the United States, and Korea has lived up to their part of the bargain because, in fact, Korea is the fifth largest importer of agricultural goods which include wheat, corn, cotton, and soybeans from the United States. Further, there are a lot of other countries who would jump at the chance to get into that very profitable market.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, this resolution could also set a very dangerous precedent undermining diplomatic immunity. It conflicts with the provisions of the Vienna Convention by attempting to compel a former Ambassador to the United States from another sovereign nation to give testimony regarding his service as ambassador. If we contend that our domestic judicial processes justify the apprehension and examination of a foreign diplomat, could we reasonably object if, at some future date, the governments of Italy, or Greece, or Chile insist upon testimony on the part of one of our diplomats or former diplomats on their past activities to influence the political processes within those countries? I do not find it a very appealing thought that Henry Kissinger, Dean Rusk, Richard Helm, you name them, all of the CIA directors of the past and other diplomats who have served in for-our former Secretaries of State and eign countries, being forced to testify, I do not relish the prospects of these diplomats being hauled into some sort of judicial proceedings in one of those countries in order for them to examine just what was done in the past in regard to influence in those countries.

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, I have almost completed my presentation and then I will be glad to yield. I recognize that we are grappling with the problem of restoring the integrity of this institution, but I do not feel that the threat of cutting off aid to an ally will enhance either our integrity or our dignity. We should instead continue to press for a cooperative resolution of this issue which, even though it may require additional time and patience, is much more likely to achieve positive results in terms of obtaining information that will clarify which Congressmen, if any, are guilty of wrongdoing. In our frustration over this investigation, we should take care not to implement legislation such as House Resolution 1194 which would have unfortunate consequences for our own interests, economic or otherwise.

If the resolution is approved, as seems probable by a lopsided vote, this vote should not be viewed by the Republic of Korea nor by the regime of Kim Il Sung in North Korea as a measure of the commitment of the U.S. Congress to the Republic of Korea. This commitment, I firmly believe, remains strong. The vote instead would reflect general panic in the face of unfortunate pressure tactics by the Special Counsel of the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct.

Mr. Speaker, I have had several requests for time. I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI).

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I certainly support this resolution, but in acting upon it, we must keep in mind the long-term questions which the Department of State raised relative to the subject of diplomatic immunity. A number of my colleagues and I joined in supplemental views to the report of the House International Relations Committee on this resolution, and I would like to reiterate the points we made.

We completely support the position of the Special Counsel to the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, Mr. Jaworski, that the bona fide testimony of former Korean Ambassador Kim Dong Jo should be provided in order that that committee's investigation be brought to a just, full, and honorable conclusion.

However, we find worrisome the potential broader impact of the resolution with respect to the diplomatic rights, privileges, and immunities enjoyed by the United States under the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations.

It is also important to make clear that our support for the resolution should not be interpreted as a lessening in our resolve that the United States continue to meet its security commitments to the Republic of Korea in addition to its other responsibilities in Northeast Asia.

Mr. Speaker, as the chairman of the committee and the distinguished majority leader pointed out, this resolution has been properly reported from the committee. After it was withdrawn from the floor a week ago, it has been subject to full discussions, full hearings before the committee. Mr. Christopher, speaking for the Department of State, and the Special Counsel for the Ethics Committee have honest differences of opinion. Their views were thoroughly aired before the committee, and based on the situation, along with the supplemental views in the committee report, I urge adoption of the resolution.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New York (Mr. GILMAN).

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Resolution 1194, to secure the full cooperation of the Government of Korea with the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct in its efforts to obtain the information from former Ambassador Kim Dong Jo required to complete that committee's investigation of alleged influence peddling by the Korean Government in the Congress.

I am fully convinced that this resolution is needed to secure the testimony of Kim Dong Jo and thereby help remove the cloud of suspicion that hovers over the Congress. In addition, the resolution does not violate the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations and therefore constitutes no precedent for any improper action that might be taken against an American Ambassador in the future.

My support for this resolution does not indicate in any way a reduction of my support for the legitimate security needs of the Republic of Korea as well as other U.S. responsibilities in Northeast Asia. This resolution provides that in the unfortunate event we are faced with the difficult prospect of either denying or reducing nonmilitary assistance to Korea, our response will in no way harm the national security of the United States or imperil the territorial integrity of the Republic of Korea.

I urge my colleagues to adopt House Resolution 1194 which seeks to help bring the investigation of the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct to an effective conclusion while protecting the broader interests and responsibilities of the United States in Northeast Asia.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ).

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this resolution on three grounds:

First, it is unsound in principle;

Second, it could lead to violations of our own constitutional processes; and Third, it sets a bad precedent in international relations.

The resolution is unsound in principle because it amounts to blackmail.

It is argued that South Korea must be presented a threat of some nature; that is blackmail, pure and simple.

Some will say that the resolution is not binding, and it is true that it does not in and of itself cut off any assistance. But if South Korea were to fail to produce the witness demanded, we would be honor-bound to cut off assistance to that country. Otherwise, we would be uttering an empty threat. The resolution therefore places us on the course of humiliating Korea, if that country capitulates to a naked threat—as no country could honorably do on principles of sovereignty alone—or of humiliating ourselves if we should fail to cut off aid after noncompliance by Korea. The resolution is not binding itself, but places us irrevocably on a course of dangerous conduct.

The House may not unilaterally cut off assistance to Korea, any more than it could unilaterally extend such assistance. For us to utter a threat of this kind requires that we assume that we have the power to carry it out, which is patently untrue. This is not a parliamentary government; it is not a unicamaral legislature; and the conduct of foreign policy is not vested in us. It violates constitutional principles for us to assume, as we do here, that we could cut off aid without the consent and assistance of both the Senate and the President, neither of whom is party to this resolution.

We have to look to the consequences of our actions.

Suppose that the witness is produced.

Mr. Jaworski has said that the witness would be questioned, if necessary, in a third country; that the interrogation could be written interrogatory, with Mr. Jaworski in one room and the witness in another, even in another building, provided only that the witness is duly sworn.

This kind of proceeding would be violative of our basic constitutional guarantees. The witness could lie with impunity, not being subject to any of our laws and remedies. After all, the witness would be immune, and not even on our soil or otherwise subject to our jurisdiction. What is worse, the persons who might be accused would be without any right to confront or cross-examine the witness, or even be represented by counsel at the proceedings. While this might not be a criminal action, the lives and reputations of people are most certainly at stake. There is something sinister about an arrangement that would deny the basic constitutional safeguards to our citizens—but that is exactly what Mr. Jaworski has said that he wants to do, if he follows the kind of proceeding he outlined in testimony before the committee last week.

The two key witnesses in this investigation are not subject to our laws; they are not citizens nor are they residents in this country. They are immune from prosecution for lying or being deceptive. They need not face the persons implicated by their testimony; need not, in other words, go through any of the usual processes that we understand to be valid tests of the truth of what they have to say.

The object of this investigation and this resolution seems to be just to get certain people to talk, at whatever cost, without any regard to testing their veracity and with none for the rights of those who may be implicated. This is wrong; it is unfair; and it is constitutionally unsound.

Third, the resolution establishes an unsound international precedent.

There is no doubt whatever that at times past our Government, through certain agencies, has subsidized political parties in other countries; has made payments to certain individuals in other governments; and has practiced all manner of illegal acts in order to gain information about or influence over other governments and political movements within those governments. We know all of this.

We do not expect any of our diplomats or intelligence chiefs to be called to account for any of these acts because they are immune by international agreement. Yet here we are demanding that Korea hand over an ex-ambassador for questioning. Whether or not his acts were illegal, whether or not he did anything he is accused or suspected of doing, the question is whether he enjoys immunity under international practices, and whether this resolution's demands violate that immunity.

We do not expect our diplomats to be detained or questioned by any country, except in the most limited kind of circumstance, defined as circumstances in which those persons have clearly violated the terms of their status. Are we dealing here with such a case? If we were, then we would not be involved in this extraordinary action.

If we can demand that another country deliver up a diplomat covered by the Vienna Convention, then there is no doubt that we set the precedent for other governments to demand that we deliver to them for questioning our own diplomatic representatives. Could we refuse? We would endanger our national interests and even our national security if we were to establish a precedent that violates the Vienna Convention—and that is exactly what this resolution would do.

Let us investigate and let us have a report. But let us not bind ourselves to a course of action that is neither sound nor fair, nor which is at bottom simple blackmail. We need not go to this extent; if it is necessary to do so, then the game is not worth the candle.

The report of the committee can reveal such evidence as it has, and provide sound conclusions, without extraordinary and unsound actions of this kind. The star chamber might have satisfied kings, but it did nothing for justice. We need not place our imprimatur on a demand that would in fact set up just such a star chamber examination. In our zeal to rescue the honor of the House, if it needs to be rescued, we do not need to burn the Constitution nor blackmail an ally nor burn down principles of fairness and international comity.

This resolution may and probably will not accomplish anything; it needs careful thought, and careful thought, with honest evaluation, will produce a nay vote. I urge the defeat of this resolution.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. BUCHANAN.).

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, the circumstances which prompt the resolution are unusual and, as such, mandate an atypical response.

This House finds itself under a cloud of suspicion raised by the investigation into possible payments to members by the Government of the Republic of Korea.

That government has, to date, refused to permit the testimony of a man who has the ability to answer many of the remaining questions.

Special Counsel Leon Jaworski has affirmed, and there is substantial evidence to indicate, that the testimony of Kim Dong Jo is essential to absolving those not involved and permitting this body to proceed with actions against those who might have violated House Rules or Federal laws.

There are those who see this resolution as a threat. It is not. Through the adoption of this resolution, we are asking a small favor of an ally of long standing, an ally for whom we have committed billions of dollars and thousands of American lives.

The provisions of this resolution represent not a threat, but a plea and a signal. It is a plea from the Congress of the United States to the Government of the Republic of Korea to help us end this investigation and remove the cloud.

There are Members who have long been supporters of Korea who have nothing to hide and nothing to fear except that the truth be not made known.

This resolution is also a signal to the Korean Government that there are many in this Congress, perhaps even a majority, who would vote to go farther than a sense of Congress resolution, who might vote to end economic or military assistance to Korea, or to reduce it substantially. Thus this is a signal that the Korean Government must move to assist us in this investigation lest an even stronger action be forthcoming.

It is also a signal that the Congress takes this issue very seriously and wants to spread upon the table all of the facts.

Nor does the adoption of this resolution establish a precedent for waiving the provisions of the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations in other circumstances. First, there is no attempt to charge Kim Dong Jo with a crime. Secondly, it would be highly unlikely that this type of activity would be considered within the normal scope of an Ambassador's duties, at least I certainly hope this would not be the case. Thus a similar situation is not likely to arise.

By adopting this resolution, Mr. Speaker, we will take a modest step to call to the attention of an ally a serious situation which comity would mandate be remedied by the Government of the Republic of Korea.

I, therefore, urge the adoption of this resolution.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BURKE).

Mr. BURKE of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this resolution. I do so after having heard the arguments pro and con in the committee of which I am a member. Initially, I had opposed the Wright amendment and the other amendment that came before us, because of the State Department arguments. However, I do think, as the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. BUCHANAN) said, the time has come when the truth with regard to Korea and those involved in the Congress of the United States must be disclosed. Whether there has been any ill-conceived or illegal acts in which certain Members of Congress have participated with the Government of Korea, I do not know, and neither do we; but, by innuendo, we are told some did and we are therefore now all under a cloud.

I truthfully think Korea is one of our good friends. I truthfully think we owe Korea the responsibility to preserve her security in the Far East; nevertheless, I also think she owes the Congress of the United States and the people of this country the truth with regard to any illegal transactions, if any, that may have occurred insofar as any Member of the Congress is concerned.

For the reasons stated, Mr. Speaker, I urge passage of this resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to my friend, the gentleman from New York (Mr. CAPUTO).

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 additional minute to the gentleman from New York (Mr. CAPUTO).

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York (Mr. CAPUTO) is recognized for 1½ minutes.

Mr. CAPUTO. Mr. Speaker, my concern in this matter is somewhat different. I am not convinced that this resolution will be sufficient to get Ambassador Kim Dong Jo's testimony under circumstances that would be reliable. If that is true—and I hope it is wrong—something more will have to be done.

It seems to me that the dialogs the Speaker had with the present Ambassador of Korea, Kim, were extraordinarily successful. The Speaker did more individually than was accomplished by the combined efforts of the rest of us to get the important testimony of Tongsun Park.

In the event this resolution does not produce the testimony of Kim Dong Jo, I would like to encourage the Speaker to resume that effort that worked so well in the past. And if it is possible from this platform, I would like to encourage the President of the United States to renew his contacts with the President of Korea and encourage the Secretary of State to renew his contacts with the Foreign Minister of Korea, Park Tong Jin. I would like also to encourage the other body to do what it can to get this testimony in suitable circumstances, not by way of threats or demands or anything inconsistent with our relationship with the Republic of Korea, but instead in the vein of cooperation between allies.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois (Mr. FINDLEY) has 3 minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) has 9 minutes remaining.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ERTEL).

Mr. ERTEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this rather modest step in our endeavors to return Kim Dong Jo to this country for the purpose of obtaining his testimony before the House Ethics Committee.

If I had my preference, I would have preferred a stronger resolution. However, I think this will go a long way in convincing the Korean Government that we are serious about needing the testimony of former Ambassador Kim Dong

Jo. This investigation has continued too long. It should have been resolved many months ago, but still the House is moving in the right direction.

I question the statements of those who say we are setting a dangerous precedent. What we are doing is saying that we who give freely of our assistance to other nations will simply cut off some of the things we are giving away free unless we get some cooperation from our allies. I do not see that as a precedent for other nations. No other nation provides us aid that would be cut off if we do not cooperate with them by providing our diplomats to them for questioning.

I believe that this resolution is an appropriate way to protect our institutions while still emphasizing our need for cooperation between allies. We are the allies of the Republic of South Korea, and this is a means of strengthening that alliance by eventually putting this affair behind us.

We must clear up this problem facing our Congress. If the allegations are true that there was an attempt to subvert this Congress, then it was an attack upon our Government itself, the very fabric that ties this Nation together.

Mr. Speaker, we stand for a principle that we have a free elected Congress responsible to the people of the United States, not to any Korean or foreign government, and if we do not clear this up and restore the integrity of this Congress, we will have missed an opportunity to preserve our Nation.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The call was taken by electronic device, and the following Members failed to respond:

By unanimous consent, further proceedings under the call were dispensed with.

SENSE OF CONGRESS THAT KOREAN GOVERNMENT COOPERATE WITH COMMITTEE ON STANDARDS OF OFFICIAL CONDUCT

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON).

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to express my appreciation to my colleagues for coming over here and doing me the honor of hearing what I am going to say. I recognize what I am going to say will not be very popular. I have been here a while and I can sense the mood of the House. But I still think we are making a very serious mistake, and apparently the only reason we are doing it is that most of the Members of this body do not seem to appreciate that we have national security problems in Asia today and not just in NATO or in Africa.

What we are doing here is threatening an ally, and no matter how we try to dress it up, it does not change that fact. We have already damaged our relationships with Korea and with our other allies in the Far East by announcing our withdrawal of troops. This threat—this act of humiliating an ally—is going to do more damage.

We are suddenly concerned about our relations with Africa, great speeches are being made and we are talking about sending in military aid. NATO members are meeting in Washington today. We promise them more help too. But when it comes to a key ally in Asia, we have no hesitation at kicking them around. If we pass this resolution we increase the risk of war, in my judgment. We ought to vote no.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California (Mr. SISK).

Mr. SISK. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong opposition to this resolution.

I was prepared the other day, Mr. Speaker, to object to the request by the majority leader. I recognize the problem the leadership has, but I think it is tragic and I think it is most unfortunate that the leadership has brought us to this particular point.

I am impressed by the lack of enthusiasm of a number of the members of the committee dealing with this subject.

I am moved by the remarks about a cloud over this House to wonder if it is more of a figment of the imagination of a staff member, an employee who, for a number of months, has been using all kinds of angles to keep this sideshow on the road.

I hope when the chips are down that more than one-third of the House will vote against this resolution and at least give us the opportunity to discuss this with more time and to examine what we are doing. I am sorry that many Members were not here to hear the remarks of my colleague, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. GONZALEZ), not long ago because he gave a number of excellent and outstanding reasons why this resolution should be defeated. We have too few friends in this world already and I deeply regret that one of those friends is being used to salve the ego of an investigator who seems to have run out of steam.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BAUMAN).

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, regardless of the outcome of this vote today, I hope it will occur to somebody in this House to do the logical thing in regard to this investigation. That would be to call in the 20 or 10 or 15 or 5 Members of the House, depending upon the given day and the press conference being held, before the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct and place them under oath, where perjury attaches—which is a Federal crime—and present to them the evidence that has been gathered. Then ask for their sworn comments, and based upon their response, subpena their records and conduct a full investigation of each.

I do not know whether we need this former Korean Ambassador here in Washington or not, but we do need to get to the bottom of this problem. The House should know who these accused Members are in due course, of course with their rights protected.

It ought to be done well in advance of election day in November of 1978, so their constituents will have the information in hand before they vote on the conduct of the Members.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAUMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I think it is rather interesting to note that when somebody files an anonymous letter regarding any Members campaign financing the General Accounting Office conducts a full audit, and yet in this case no questions are being asked.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself the remainder of my time.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution is a legislated threat against a very important ally of the United States but, in addition, in a sense it is a foolish threat because if we should carry it out and cut off all nonmilitary assistance to Korea we would impair the limitation on Korean exports to the United States of textiles and we would cut off a cash market of enormous size, at least $1 billion a year of our farm products in Korea. It is like throwing marshmallows at a tank, to make this kind of legislated threat. Nevertheless, is an offense to a small and proud nation like Korea. It makes us look foolish. We should resist the temptation right now to panic, as I believe many of us may panic motivated by the public relations operations of the Special Counsel for the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct. We are jumping over ourselves trying to show that we are against bribery but, Mr. Speaker, we will pay a heavy price if we take this course.

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I strongly support House Resolution 1194. We should have passed the leadership's stronger resolution last week, but I am pleased that the International Relations Committee has brought its House Resolution 1194 out so promptly.

The resolution says that unless South Korea cooperates with efforts to get sworn testimony from Kim Dong Jo, the House will terminate nonmilitary aid to South Korea. The Special Counsel to the Standards of Official Conduct Committee says we must have Kim's testimony to complete our Koreagate investigation.

Personally, I am not satisfied with our committee's investigation. I believe that the committee should, as has been suggested today, call in the Members to whom the alleged payments have been made, and let them testify under penalty of perjury.

Nevertheless, we in the House should make every effort to encourage our committee. Passage of this resolution is absolutely necessary to prove that this House is serious about its investigation. A strong vote today will be a sign to South Korea, our own Standards of Official Conduct Committee, and the American people that we are serious.●

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of House Concurrent Resolution 1194. In October 1977, the House unanimously passed a resolution expressing the sense of the House of Representatives that the South Korean Government should cooperate fully with the House Standards Committee investigation of charges that Members of the House accepted money and other benefits from the Korean Government.

Unfortunately, the South Korean Government has dragged its heels—and in some cases turned its back—on requests by the committee to produce information and witnesses to help complete the investigation. Most recently, South Korea has refused to let its former ambassador to the United States, Kim Dong Jo, appear before the committee.

Today, we must vote again to reemphasize to the Korean Government how strongly the House feels about the allegations of impropriety, and the need to lay them to rest. House Concurrent Resolution 1194 simply expresses the sense of the House of Representatives that no nonmilitary appropriations for South Korea be approved until Ambassador Kim appears before the committee to testify.

Earlier this year, I joined with my colleagues STAN LUNDINE and ALLEN ERTEL to circulate a letter from interested Members to President Park of South Korea asking him to waive diplomatic immunity for the ambassador so that he could testify before the Congress. We thought then as we do now, that only through a full airing of the charges could those who accepted money and other favors be exposed, and those who did not receive any emoluments be cleared.

So long as the allegations of ethical misconduct remain unfocused upon those Members who actually received money and favors, then the integrity of the House of Representatives and all its Members is called into question. I suggest to my colleagues that a vote for House Concurrent Resolution 1194 is more than a vote for honest and ethical government; it is a vote to promote the prestige and dignity of the institution of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of our time to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. O'NEILL) the distinguished Speaker of the House of Representatives, to close the debate.

Mr. O'NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I hope that this resolution is adopted overwhelmingly. Fourteen months ago this House unanimously voted to adopt House Resolution 252, directing the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct to conduct a full and complete inquiry into the Korean matter. In addition, as Speaker of this body, I helped to convince the distinguished attorney, Leon Jaworski, to accept the role as Special Counsel to direct this legislation. Mr. Jaworski has worked diligently and painstakingly—without compensation, I might add—to discover the truth concerning alleged Korean activities directed at this House. He has come to us and has informed us that he cannot complete his work without the testimony of former Korean Ambassador Kim Dong Jo. This despite the fact that Mr. Jaworski is willing to meet this man in a neutral country, in separate rooms and with a limitation as to questions concerning the activities of his Government, and the cooperation of that Government has not been forthcoming.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Jaworski has conceded enough on the part of this House. We must make our intentions known in clear and precise language that we expect the Government of Korea to cooperate and to make its former ambassador available to Mr. Jaworski.

Mr. Speaker, 25 years ago 54,000 Americans gave their lives to guarantee the sovereignty to the Republic of Korea—yes, and some 110,000 more were wounded. Since 1952 we have sent more than $7 billion in American military aid and more than $4 billion in economic assistance to the Republic of Korea. We have and still do consider Korea our friend and our ally. If this relationship is to continue, then I say Korea must cooperate with this body.

This House is a separate and an equal branch of the Government of the United States. I have had the Korean Ambassador who is presently in Washington in my office and I have explained our tripartite system of government, equality in all three branches, the administrative, the legislative, and the judicial.

Yes, they talked to me about international conferences, but in this case these conferences do not apply. I have explained that, and he has come back to me. Mr. Jaworski says he needs this. I have explained, and I say again and again, this House is a separate and equal branch of the Government of the United States, and we will not tolerate evasive responses in the face of such a serious matter. We cannot accept an investigation that fails to restore the confidence of the American people in the integrity of their elected Representatives. Let there be no doubt about this resolution. I hope it represents the overwhelming will of the Members of this House. Let there be no doubt that we expect cooperation from the Republic of Korea in response to it, and let there be no doubt that consequences will be great if the Republic of Korea refuses to cooperate. The integrity of this institution must be above reproach. Our responsibility to the people of the United States cannot be exercised fully in an atmosphere of lingering doubt.

Again, I appeal to the Korean Ambassador and to all those in Korea who are in power—to the President himself—to make their former Ambassador available under the guidelines that Mr. Jaworski has proposed. I hope the resolution is adopted.

● Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, I oppose the resolution (H. Res. 1194) introduced by the distinguished majority leader and want to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. FINDLEY, and the gentleman from Texas, Mr. GONZALEZ.

I bow to no one, in or out of the leadership, in my desire to remove the so-called cloud of doubt and suspicion which is alleged to hover over the House of Representatives and which arises out of the so-called Korean incident. But I am not prepared to pay the price which is demanded by this resolution.

I conceive that by the passage of this resolution we are setting a precedent that will embarrass us, not once, but many times in the future, as other nations call upon us to perform as we today call upon Korea. It does not take much imagination to envision the Soviet Union requesting the testimony of the head of our CIA in the investigation of or at the trial of Yuri Orlov or some other Yuri Orlov of the future. Have we not done enough to our intelligence capability without adding this burden?

Furthermore, I have doubt as to the efficacy of the remedy to solve the problem posed. Any time a prosecutor has to prove his case with the testimony of the defendant, I think he is in trouble and not apt to succeed. I have not sat on this committee and am not intimately familiar with the problems, but there is usually more than one way to skin a cat. I hope that the committee will find a way which does not put the whole executive structure of this country in such peril.

In passing, I must say that I fully appreciate the effort the Speaker is making to fulfill his commitment to the committee's counsel at a time when the committee was in difficulty and needed new and distinguished staff. Likewise, I express my respect for the committee counsel's devotion to his duty and firm determination to accomplish his mission. It is our obligation, however, as Members of the House to weigh the competing values and that I have tried to do today, reaching the conclusion that I must vote "no" on this resolution.●

● Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I joined in voting to report House Resolution 1194 out of the International Relations Committee, because the text of the resolution had been substantially modified in an effort to meet the concerns of those of us who felt that its adoption would create a bad precedent. I also joined in additional views suggesting that, as modified, the resolution was acceptable.

Upon further reflection, however, I have concluded that adoption of the resolution by the House would be unwise. I shall, therefore, vote against it, especially in view of the fact that it comes to us under suspension of the rules with no possibility of amendment.

I take this position in spite of the fact that I deplore the human rights record of the Korean regime, as well as its failure to cooperate fully with the investigation of the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct.

My present view is that, even in its present watered-down form, the resolution threatens the withholding of aid if former Ambassador Kim Dong Jo does not submit to formal questioning under oath, affirmation, or the equivalent. It, therefore, contemplates a violation of the Vienna Convention providing immunity for ambassadors and former ambassadors, even though in and of itself it probably does not constitute such a violation. Thus, the resolution sets a precedent which may well rise to haunt us in the future if some foreign country insists that a U.S. ambassador or former ambassador give formal testimony about actions he may have taken while ambassador.

I also feel that the United States carries on programs such as Public Law 480 aid and the Peace Corps, because they are, broadly speaking, in our own national interest. We do not, or at least we should not, regard such programs as activities we undertake to please the host governments. Therefore, in my view it is a grave mistake for us to turn such activities on or off depending on whether or not we like or dislike the behavior of the host countries.

Finally, let me express the thought that adoption of this resolution will not accomplish its purpose. Even if the former ambassador does agree to testify, which is doubtful, I see no reason to suppose that his testimony will vary substantially from statements he has already made to the media. Committee counsel may well conclude that the witness is not telling the truth, but there will be no way for counsel to compel him to do so.

I have heard it said that at least then the House will be seen by the American people to have done everything possible to discover the truth, but I do not perceive this consideration as justifying what is, in its essential aspects, an unwise move.●

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) that the House suspend the rules and agree to the resolution, House Resolution 1194, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 3, rule XXVII, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the resolution, House Resolution 1194, just considered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

GLENN CUNNINGHAM LAKE AND STANDING BEAR LAKE

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 7041) to rename two lakes which have been completed as part of the Papillion Creek basin project as the Glenn Cunningham Lake and the Standing Bear Lake.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) the lake known as the Irvington Lake, which has been completed on site 11 (as described in House Document Numbered 349, Ninetieth Congress) of the Papillion Creek basin project authorized under the heading Missouri River basin in section 203 of the Flood Control Act of 1970 (82 Stat. 743), shall hereafter be known and designated as the "Glenn Cunningham Lake". Any reference in any law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to such lake shall be held to be a reference to the Glenn Cunningham Lake.

(b) The lake shown as the Military Lake, which has been completed on site 16 (as described in House Document Numbered 349, Ninetieth Congress) of such Papillion Creek basin project, shall hereafter be known and designated as the "Standing Bear Lake". Any reference in any law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States shall be held to be a reference to the Standing Bear Lake.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS) will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from California (Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS).

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. FINDLEY, and the gentleman from

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 7041, designates Irvington Lake and Military Lake, Nebr., as Glenn Cunningham Lake and Standing Bear Lake.

Both Irvington Lake and Military Lake are located within the Papillion Creek basin project in Douglas County, Nebr.

Mr. Glenn Cunningham has spent nearly all of his adult life in civic and governmental work. A graduate of the University of Omaha, he served as executive secretary of the Omaha Junior Chamber of Commerce from 1940 to 1941 and held numerous other civic posts. He was elected mayor of Omaha in 1948 and was reelected in 1951. The recipient of many awards and accolades, Mr. Cunningham distinguished himself as a Member of the U.S. House of Representatives during the 85th through 91st Congress. He was instrumental in the passage of the Papillion Creek project of which Irvington Lake is a part.

It is in recognition of his good efforts at bringing this project into being that it seems a just and fitting tribute to rename Irvington Lake in Douglas County, Nebr., as Glenn Cunningham Lake.

Standing Bear was chief of the Ponca Indian Tribe whose homeland was near the mouth of the Niobrara River in southern Dakota. The tribe was removed to an Indian reservation in Oklahoma in 1877. In an attempt to return to his homeland to bury his son, he was arrested in northeast Nebraska in March of 1879 to be returned to Oklahoma. En route to Oklahoma, the party was camped near Fort Omaha, Nebr. Much publicity had followed Standing Bear's arrest and a writ of habeas corpus was brought for his release in Lincoln, Nebr. United States Ex Rel. Standing Bear v. Crook, 25 F. Cas. 695 (No. 14,891) (C.C.D. Neb. 1879), stands a case of first impression and is a milestone in Indian rights. For the first time the court held that:

An Indian is a person within the meaning of the laws of the United States, and has therefore the right to sue out a writ of habeas corpus in Federal court or before a Federal judge, in all cases where he may be confined, or in custody under color of authority of the United States, or where he is restrained of liberty in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States.

Standing Bear was freed and allowed to return to northeast Nebraska.

The establishment of rights for native Americans was slow in developing in this Nation. The importance of this case and this great chief in history is apparent. It is a fitting and proper tribute to this native American that the presently designated Military Lake be renamed in his honor in the State where his case was decided.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the distinguished author of the bill, the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. CAVANAUGH).

Mr. CAVANAUGH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my appreciation to the chairman, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS), and to the gentleman from California (Mr. JOHNSON) for the diligent consideration they have given to this legislation and urge its adoption by the Members of the House.

This legislation would appropriately honor two distinguished Nebraskans, Glenn Cunnningham, former mayor of the city of Omaha, and who served 14 years as a Member of this body, as well as Chief Standing Bear, who occupies a particular and distinguished role in American history in that his case tried in the city of Omaha, Nebr., proved to be the first instance in which a native American Indian was declared a person under the Constitution of the United States.

The designation of these two lake sites is a particularly appropriate commemorative rendition of these two distinguished Americans.

Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of the resolution.

Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 7041 which honors two great Americans.

One is a former Member of this body who served with great distinction for 12 years. During this period he worked tirelessly for conservation and development of water resources in the State of Nebraska and especially in the Papillion Creek Basin. As a result of his efforts the residents of Omaha will not experience the raging devastation of floods as they had in the past when many lives were lost and an estimated $7,250,000 in damages occurred.

The second American we are honoring today as has already been explained by my colleague, the gentleman from Texas, is being recognized because of his efforts on behalf of Indian rights. Standing Bear was an early advocate of a cause that only recently is beginning to receive the recognition it deserves. I think it is fitting and just that we recognize him and the cause of Indian rights for which he fought so valiantly.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 7041 is a very important bill for it recognizes the contribution of two great Americans who have added much to our American way of life in two different but vitally important ways and I urge my colleagues to adopt this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Nebraska (Mr. THONE).

Mr. THONE. Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise today and express my support of H.R. 7041, a bill to rename a lake which has been completed as part of the Papillion Creek Basin project as "Glenn Cunningham Lake."

Glenn Cunningham is a good friend, an outstanding native son of Nebraska and a great American. He has served his State unceasingly through his involvement in the chamber of commerce, Omaha School Board, the Omaha City Council, as mayor of Omaha, and as a Member of this body. Elected to the 85th Congress in 1957, Glenn Cunningham represented the citizens of the Second District of Nebraska until 1971, never losing sight of the needs of his constituents or of his country.

It is altogether fitting and proper that the name of this fine Nebraskan be affixed to a lake where it will serve as a continual reminder of Glenn Cunningham's unselfish dedication to others and of his many accomplishments.

● Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of my distinguished colleague, the chairman of our Subcommittee on Water Resources.

H.R. 7041 honors two prominent Americans—former Congressman Glenn Cunningham and Chief Standing Bear by naming two lakes in the Papillion Creek Basin project in Nebraska after them. Glenn Cunningham served in the 85th through the 91st Congresses, and was instrumental in securing the authorization of the Papillion Creek Basin project. Chief Standing Bear was the subject of a landmark case in which the court held that an Indian is a person within the meaning of the laws of the United States. Honoring these two men in this fashion is both fitting and appropriate.●

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 7041.

The question was taken.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 3, rule XXVII, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

R. SHAEFER HEARD PARK

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 212) to provide that the park referred to as the East Lake Park located within the West Point Lake project on the Chattahoochee River, Ga., shall hereafter be known and designated as the "R. Shaefer Heard Park."

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That East Lake Park, located within the West Point Lake project on the Chattahoochee River, Georgia, shall hereafter be known and designed as the "R. Shaefer Heard Park". Any reference in any law, map, regulation, document, record, or other paper of the United States to such park shall be held to be a reference to the "R. Shaefer Heard Park".

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MINISH). Is a second demanded?

Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS) will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from California (Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS).

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 212 designates the park referred to as the East Lake Park, located within the West Point Lake project on the Chattahoochee River, Ga., as the R. Schaefer Heard Park.

Since the 1950's, Mr. R. Shaefer Heard has been a tireless advocate and proponent of the West Point Dam and Reservoir located on that Chattahoochee River, Ga. Mr. Heard was the first president of the Middle Chattahoochee River Development Association, and he continues to serve in that capacity. Throughout his tenure with the association, Mr. Heard has endeavored to mobilize public support for the West Point Dam project, as well as bring to Federal attention the necessity for such a project.

It is fitting and suitable that this park located within the West Point project be named in honor of Mr. Heard.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERTS. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. BRINKLEY), the author of this bill.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I just wish to express my sincere appreciation to the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS) and his Committee on Public Works and Transportation for doing what I think is a most appropriate thing.

Mr. R. Shaefer Heard is the patriarch of this development to which the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS) has referred. He has given much of his life to this work, and I think it is a proper thing that the committee is doing in presenting this bill to the House for our consideration. Mr. Heard is truly a legend within his own lifetime, and I urge unanimous passage of the bill.

Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 212 which honors a tireless advocate of flood control and water resource development in the State of Georgia, Mr. R. Shaefer Heard. I think it is fitting and proper that we honor those citizens which, without personal reward, have worked for the public good. In this specific case, it is my understanding that Mr. Heard has been an effective advocate in realizing flood control, power generation, and recreational development on the middle Chattahoochee River. This project was authorized as a result of a vigorous effort in 1962 and completed in 1975. I am pleased to support the designation of the East Lake Park as the R. Shaefer Heard Park and urge my colleagues to vote for its adoption.

● Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of my distinguished colleague, the chairman of our Subcommittee on Water Resources.

H.R. 212 honors Mr. R. Shaefer Heard by naming a park at the West Point Dam and Lake in Georgia after him. Mr. Heard has been a long and ardent supporter of this project and an instrumental figure in bringing it into being. Naming this park in his honor is a fitting tribute to his tireless efforts on behalf of the West Point project.●

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill H.R. 212.

The question was taken.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 3 rule XXVII, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to revise and extend their remarks on the last two bills concerned, H.R. 7041 and H.R. 212.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

Debate has been concluded on all motions to suspend the rules.

Pursuant to clause 3, rule XXVII, the Chair will now put the question on each motion on which further proceedings were postponed in the order in which that motion was entertained.

Votes will be taken in the following order:

H. Res. 1194, H.R. 7041, and H.R. 212, all on which the yeas and nays were ordered.

SENSE OF CONGRESS THAT KOREAN GOVERNMENT COOPERATE WITH COMMITTEE ON STANDARDS OF OFFICIAL CONDUCT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The unfinished business is the question of suspending the rules and agreeing to the resolution, House Resolution 1194, as amended.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) that the House suspend the rules and agree to the resolution, House Resolution 1194, as amended, on which the yeas and nays are ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 321, nays 46, not voting 67, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. FITHIAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to explain my actions today on the vote on the resolution relating to South Korea.

While the vote was taking place, I was in the Rayburn Office Building waiting for an elevator that did not work. Because I was stuck, I missed the vote by some 30 seconds.

Mr. Speaker, I want the record to show that had I been able to arrive in time to vote, I would have voted "yea" on the resolution.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 12598, FOREIGN RELATIONS AUTHORIZATION ACT, FISCAL YEAR 1979

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 1204 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 1204

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move, section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-344) to the contrary notwithstanding, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 12598) to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979 for the Department of State, the International Communication Agency, and the Board for International Broadcasting, to make changes in the laws relating to those agencies, to make changes in the foreign service personnel system, to establish policies and responsibilities with respect to science, technology, and American diplomacy, to establish a Commission on Proposals for a Center for Conflict Resolution, to establish an Institute for International Human Rights, and for other purposes, and all points of order against section 111 of said bill for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 5, rule XXI are hereby waived. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on International Relations, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule by titles instead of by sections. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida (Mr. PEPPER) is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 minutes to the able gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON), pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

I wish to ask a question of the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI).

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, does the question relate to the bill? I would remind the gentleman that we will first deliberate the rule.

Mr. Speaker, if the distinguished gentleman wishes me to yield, I will so yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Since the gentleman has yielded, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING).

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I understand we are considering the rule, but I wondered if the gentleman would entertain a question that deals with the legislation itself, or would that be considered inappropriate at this point?

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman would be kind enough to do so, I wish he would allow us to complete our statements on the rule first, and then if he wishes to ask a question, I will yield to him.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 1204 provides for the consideration of H.R. 12598 which authorizes appropriations for the Department of State, the International Communication Agency, and the Board for International Broadcasting for fiscal year 1979; to make changes in the Foreign Service personnel system; to establish policies and responsibilities with respect to science, technology, and American diplomacy; to establish a Commission on Proposals for Center for Conflict Resolution; to establish an Institute for International Human Rights; and for other purposes.

This is a routine open rule, with 1 hour of general debate, and providing that the bill be read for amendment by titles instead of by sections. The rule waives points of order against the bill for violation of section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act, which provides that it shall not be in order to consider any bill which authorizes the enactment of new budget authority for a fiscal year unless the bill has been reported on or before May 15 preceding the beginning of such fiscal year.

Since sections of H.R. 12598 would authorize additional funding for fiscal year 1978 and since the bill was not reported on or before May 15, 1977, the bill would be subject to a point of order under section 402(a) of the Budget Act. The Committee on the Budget, however, has concluded that these supplemental authorizations satisfy the emergency standards embodied in section 402 of the Budget Act, therefore, that committee had no objection to the granting of this waiver.

The rule also waives all points of order against section 111 of the bill for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 5, rule XXI, which prohibits appropriations in a legislative measure. Since section 111 of the bill provides for the transfer and the reuse of appropriated funds, the Committee on Rules granted a waiver of clause 5, rule XXI.

The bill, H.R. 12598, authorizes appropriations totaling $1,941,336,000 for fiscal year 1979 and a supplemental appropriation of $47,743,000 for fiscal year 1978. The prime purposes of the bill are to authorize appropriations and to further improve and strengthen the Foreign Service personnel system, and to give greater support for country's foreign policy. I am sure that the details concerning the bill and its purposes will be fully provided by the chairman and members of the Committee on International Relations during debate on the bill.

Mr. Speaker, I urge the adoption of House Resolution 1204 so that the House may consider the bill, H.R. 12598.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this is a 1-hour open rule which would make in order the consideration of H.R. 12598, the foreign relations authorization for fiscal year 1979. Following the hour of debate, which shall be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on International Relations, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule, by title instead of by section. This rule does waive section 402(a) of the Budget Act and clause 5 of House rule XXI. Section 402 (a) of the Budget Act prohibits the consideration of any bill which authorizes the enactment of new budget authority for a fiscal year unless that bill has been reported on or before May 15 preceding the beginning of that fiscal year. Sections 103 and 302 of H.R. 12598 are supplemental authorizations for international organizations and conferences, and the Board for International Broadcasting, respectively, for fiscal year 1978. Since this bill obviously was not reported on or before May 15, 1977, the bill would be subject to a point of order. The Rules Committee did receive a letter from Budget Committee Chairman GIAIMO, dated May 22, 1978, in which he states the following:

> . . . on the basis of documentation presented by the Committee on International Relations and our own inquiry, we have concluded that these supplemental authorizations satisfy the emergency standards embodied in section 402 of the Budget Act. Accordingly, the Budget Committee has no objection to granting a waiver of section 402(a) to permit consideration of this bill.

In view of the Budget Committee's acquiescence in this waiver, the Rules Committee has granted it.

The other waiver contained in this rule is of clause 5 rule XXI which prohibits appropriations in a legislative matter. This resolution waives points of order against section III of the bill for failure to comply with that rule. Section III permits the Secretary of State to transfer funds to another agency, such as the International Communications Agency, the Agency for International Development, and the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, which is performing administrative services in common with the State Department on a consolidated basis, for the benefit of both agencies. Such a transfer could not take place without the agreement of the head of the other agency and the approval of the Director of OMB.

In explaining this provision, the International Relations Committee report, at page 16, says the following:

> Impetus for this move toward consolidation comes from the President's Reorganization Project. The committee agrees with the President that more efficient management can result when agencies having similar administrative needs consolidate their resources. A successful consolidation program should result in cost savings, elimination of duplication of functions, as well as an increased ability to handle peak workloads. In consolidating administrative services the committee urges the Department of State and other agencies to exercise great care in respecting the autonomy of each agency as established by Congress or by any Presidential Reorganization Plan or directive.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 12598 authorizes $1.94 billion in fiscal year 1979 for the Department of State, the International Broadcasting Board, which makes grants to Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty, and fiscal 1978 supplemental authorizations for both State and the Board. The bill is about $63 million over the administration request, including $19 million over for administration of foreign affairs, and $35 million over for migration and refugee assistance. In addition, the committee has included some items not asked for by the administration, including $500,000 for creation of a Commission on Proposals for a Center on Conflict Resolution, and $1 million for creation of an Institute for International Human Rights.

Mr. Speaker, I know of no objection to this rule and urge its adoption.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING).

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin, if he could tell me what his committee plans to do with respect to the current rash of statements emanating from the White House, which have all of the aspects of an effort to "snow" the public and stampede the Congress into yielding its very hard-won controls over the administration's actions with respect to Africa.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, let me advise the gentleman from Ohio that all of the members of the International Relations Committee, and, I am sure many Members of the House, are concerned about the conflicting reports of the developments in Africa.

I will yield to the chairman of the Subcommittee on Africa the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DIGGS) in a moment. Before yielding to him for the purpose of answering the gentleman specifically, however, let me assure the gentleman that the chairman intends to hold hearings on the situation in Africa, with the Director of the Central Intelligence Agency and top-level representatives of the State Department. Now as far as the argument that there are restrictions on the President's flexibility to conduct foreign policy are concerned, let me assure the gentleman that the committee will study the problem thoroughly. This will be done by an ad hoc committee of the Committee on International Relations which has been in existence since last February. This ad hoc group is comprised of the subcommittee chairmen and the ranking minority members, and any member of the full committee who desires to participate in the discussions. We will review the so-called restrictions carefully. And I can assure the gentleman that the committee will not act hastily.

The gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DIGGS) I am sure can give the gentleman an adequate answer with respect to his specific question on Africa.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I thank the gentleman, and I feel somewhat reassured.

About 2 years ago, Mr. Brzezinski, who was then just a private citizen, came to a meeting here, with a number of Members of Congress and staffs of Members, and he was very critical of Mr. Kissinger and President Ford for viewing our relations with Africa in the context of the East-West conflict between Russia and the United States instead of in terms of the North-South conflict between the developing world and the developed world.

Now, all of a sudden, we hear the same kind of noises emanating from the White House of which Mr. Brzezinski himself was so critical 2 years ago. He is now putting the whole of the African contest in terms of the East-West conflict and saying that Russia's actions violate the spirit of détente and unwritten understandings and all that sort of thing. It does seem to me that he is now subject to the very same criticism that he was leveling at the previous administration.

Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DIGGS) would care to comment at this time on what seems to be a very serious and disturbing change in rhetoric emanating from the highest office in the land.

Mr. DIGGS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I thank the gentleman for raising the question and for getting reassurances from the chairman of the full committee about our concern and about the review that is contemplated with the relevant officials on this matter.

I share the concern of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING) about the position of the Chairman of the National Security Council. I am particularly concerned, because we have not had access to him as we have had to the Secretary of State or even to the intelligence community. The President of the United States himself is more directly responsible for tolerating whatever Mr. Brzezinski's views are, as stated publicly, if they represent the position of the administration. It is vital that some determination be made by the President as to the administration's position, because obviously there is a dichotomy between the Secretary of State plus the U.S U.N. Ambassador and the chairman of the National Security Council on our Africa policy that needs to be adjudicated.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI).

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I just take this time to address an inquiry to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING), I hope I have the attention of the gentleman from Ohio.

I listened with great interest as the gentleman indicated that the position espoused by Dr. Brzezinski 2 years ago seems to be at variance with his views today. I have great respect and appreciation for the difficult assignment Dr. Brzezinski faces, and I was wondering whether the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING) could document, through published statements, the position that Dr. Brzezinski presumably took 2 years ago, perhaps in the heat of the campaign.

Mr. SEIBERLING. If the gentleman will yield, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that I could document that position.

The meeting, which was under the sponsorship of Members of Congress, was a public meeting. I believe we had a record of it, and I even took notes on what he said, so I do not think there is any problem with respect to documentation. Furthermore, it was not in the heat of the campaign. It was before Mr. Carter was ever nominated for the Presidency. It was over a year ago, in the early spring of 1976; and Mr. Brzezinski was appearing as a foreign policy expert.

Frankly, I am a little shocked at his unseemly inconsistency.

Mr. DERWINSKI. I think it would help all of us if the gentleman could locate that statement and then insert it into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Then I think we would all be in a better position to analyze the present views of Dr. Brzezinski.

Mr. SEIBERLING. If the gentleman will yield further, I think that is a very good point. I will endeavor to dig it out, see what we can find, and I will be happy to put it in the RECORD.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his courtesy.

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MINISH). The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 363, nays 10, not voting 61, as follows:

MAKING IN ORDER ON TUESDAY NEXT OR ANY DAY THEREAFTER CONSIDERATION OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 944, MAKING URGENT GRAIN INSPECTION SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order on Tuesday next or any day thereafter to consider in the House as in Committee of the Whole, the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 944) making urgent grain inspection supplemental appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

FOREIGN RELATIONS AUTHORIZATION ACT, FISCAL YEAR 1979

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 12598) to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979 for the Department of State, the International Communication Agency, and the Board for International Broadcasting, to make changes in the laws relating to those agencies, to make changes in the Foreign Service personnel system, to establish policies and responsibilities with respect to science, technology, and American diplomacy, to establish a Commission on Proposals for a Center for Conflict Resolution, to establish an Institute for International Human Rights, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI).

The motion was agreed to.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill H.R. 12598, with Mr. LEVITAS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. BUCHANAN) will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI).

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 12598, the Foreign Relations Authorization Act for fiscal year 1979. I commend Chairman FASCELL and the subcommittee for thorough consideration given the provision in the legislation.

The bill provides authorization for appropriations for the Department of State, the International Communication Agency, the Board for International Broadcasting, and other purposes for fiscal year 1979, as well as supplemental appropriations for the Department of State and the Board for International Broadcasting for fiscal year 1978.

The bill authorizes a total of $1,941,336,000 in funding authority for fiscal year 1979 and $47,743,000 in supplemental authority for fiscal year 1978.

These figures are considered by the committee, after 17 days of hearings by the Subcommittee on International Operations, to be the lowest possible to allow the Department of State, the International Communication Agency, and the Board for International Broadcasting to discharge properly their important responsibilities.

The major provisions of H.R. 12598 are as follows:

Title I contains a total authorization for all activities for the Department of State of $1,374,129,000 for fiscal year 1979. This amount includes funding for:

All salaries and expenses of the Department;

The acquisition, operation, and maintenance of buildings abroad;

Contributions to international organizations; and Support of U.S. missions to those organizations for the U.S. sections of international commissions and for migration and refugee assistance activities.

This authorization is essential if the State Department is to carry out the foreign policy of the United States at home and around the world.

Title I, as approved by the committee, also includes funds requested by the executive branch for a new $20 million program for the resettlement of Soviet and Eastern European refugees in the United States. This request was the principal new program requested by the Executive within the scope of title I.

Section 103 in title I contains a supplemental authorization increase for fiscal year 1978 for the State Department for $37,275,000 to pay arrearages in U.S. dues to UNESCO.

Title I also changes the title of the Department's chief management officer to Under Secretary of State for Management and establishes an Assistant Secretary of State for International Narcotics Matters.

The bill also sets forth a comprehensive policy to encourage the use of solar energy, where feasible, in the foreign buildings program. This provision will result in long-term savings for the foreign building program as well as complement a provision in the Foreign Assistance Act which establishes a bilateral effort between the United States and less-developed countries to develop simple rural-oriented energy technologies.

Title II authorizes funds for all of the operations of the International Communication Agency which came into being April 1st of this year as a result of a Presidential reorganization plan. The ICA incorporates all programs formerly conducted by the U.S. Information Agency and the Bureau of Educational and Cultural Affairs of the Department of State. The amount recommended by the committee for the ICA is $417,327,000, or approximately $25 million more than the 1978 authorization. The increase is due to the transfer of the Cultural Affairs Bureau to the ICA and to the mandated salary increases.

While this is $4 million over the executive branch request, the increase includes $2,500,000 for the expansion of agency programs related to Third World mass media and $1,500,000 for the strengthening of Cultural and Educational exchange activities throughout the world. The increase, while modest, will result in programs which will demonstrate to the developing countries the concern of the United States for a free exchange of ideas and peoples consistent with the Helsinki accords.

Title III of the bill provides authorization for appropriations of $88,180,000 for the Board for International Broadcasting for fiscal year 1979. This is $3 million above the executive branch request.

This increase reflects the committee's judgment that it is necessary to provide a foreign currency contingency fund for the operations of Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty in the event the dollar continues to decline in relation to the mark beyond the point estimated at present by the Office of Management and Budget.

Section 302 of title III includes a supplemental authorization increase for the Board for International Broadcasting to $79,448,000 which is the amount requested by the executive branch. This is an increase of $10,468,000 over the amount previously authorized. It increases the foreign currency contingency limit by $3,500,000 to clarify our intent that these funds are to a large extent being made available to meet an unanticipated decline in the value of the dollar in relation to European currencies.

Title IV deals with personnel questions related to the Foreign Service. The title contains no authorization for funds, but makes numerous changes, many of a technical nature, in the Foreign Service Act. The major provision in the title would authorize retirement of Foreign Service personnel, on a one-time basis, based on their earnings during a high 1-year period instead of on the currently required 3-year bases. This provision would help the Department of State overcome a temporary situation where there is an unusually large number of senior level Foreign Service officers unwilling to retire. The result is that younger Foreign Service officers are leaving the service because of the lack of promotion opportunities. Inclusion of this provision in H.R. 12598 has the approval of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

Title V of the bill establishes policies and responsibilities with respect to science and technology and U.S. foreign policy. This title is an initiative of the committee which culminates an 8-year effort on the part of the Subcommittee on International Security and Scientific Affairs to insure that science and technology receive appropriate attention in the formulation and implementation of U.S. foreign policy.

Title VI of the bill establishes a Commission on Proposals for a Center for Conflict Resolution. The Commission, whose members would be appointed by the President, is authorized $500,000 to study and recommend to the President and the Congress within 1 year, the best ways in which conflict resolution skills can be brought to bear on conflicts between nations, within communities, and among individuals. Similar legislation passed the Senate unanimously last year.

This provision is the product of 2 days of hearings this year on the Senate proposal by the Subcommittee on International Operations and of prior hearings by the former Subcommittee on International Organizations and Movements on the applicability of the social sciences to foreign policy problems. Various alternatives for conducting the kind of studies envisioned in title VI were considered by the committee and, after long deliberation, and discussion it was concluded that the best possible vehicle was an independent Presidential commission.

Title VII of the bill establishes an Institute for International Human Rights. The Institute is an initiative of the committee. The concept has the support of the administration. The Institute, operating under a Presidentially appointed Board of Directors, would make funds available to assist organizations and individuals working for human rights and fundamental freedoms around the world.

To fund the Institute, H.R. 12598 authorizes $1 million for fiscal year 1979. The staff of the Institute is to be limited to not more than seven persons. The Institute has received expressions of support from numerous private organizations and individuals concerned with human rights in every region.

The final title, of the bill, title VIII, contains miscellaneous provisions. The four provisions would: A. change the date on which the Gorgas Memorial Institute's annual report is due in Congress; B. increase by $200,000 the authorization for the Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe to meet unexpected budget increases partially as a result of GAO's decision about foreign travel expenses; C. earmark for $100,000 provided in section 101 for a study of the feasibility of organizing additional parliamentary exchanges between Congress and the parliaments of other countries; and, D. authorize an appropriation of $60 million to reimburse the U.S. tin stockpile for a transfer of surplus U.S. tin to the International Tin Buffer Stock.

This authorization was requested by the executive branch in order to provide for the immediate reimbursement of the U.S. stockpile for any transfer to the international stockpile. Since the proceeds from the liquidation of the international stockpile will revert to the Treasury, this authorization will have no net drain on the budget.

The inclusion of the supplemental authorizations in H.R. 12598 have been approved by the Budget Committee and would not violate either the budget ceiling for the international relations function or the aggregate ceiling for the fiscal year 1978 budget.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Chairman, I thank our distinguished committee chairman for his remarks and associate myself with them. The legislation before us today is the result of 17 days of subcommittee hearings and countless hours of additional work on the part of the members and staff.

I would like to take just a moment to express my appreciation to our subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL). I have served on this subcommittee for many years, but cannot remember a time when we have so thoroughly scrutinized these authorization requests.

The people of the United States and our colleagues have been well served by the diligence and commitment of DANTE FASCELL. Under his leadership we have put together a good bill which holds the line on expenses and, at the same time, provides the basic funds needed to enhance our foreign policy objectives.

With regard to the Department of State, we are operating today at approximately the same personnel level at which we operated in 1960, yet American representation abroad has increased from 80 countries to over 130 during that same time period.

There is no question that resources at the Department of State are thinly spread and this has caused some erosion in the services provided.

We have attempted to remedy some of the problems confronting the Department in this legislation, particularly with regard to consular services and personnel problems. Substantial improvements have been made in the Department's ability to respond to requests for assistance from Americans who encounter difficulties while traveling abroad and the provisions of this bill will, in my judgment, help to meet additional concerns expressed by Members over the past year.

Many of our colleagues have also been concerned about the number of illegal aliens, now referred to as undocumented aliens, in the United States. We have provided additional funds in this bill to give the Department of State the needed resources to increase its screening of visa applications in an effort to weed out those individuals who might be attempting to enter this country illegally.

As the chairman noted, this bill also includes authorizations for the new International Communication Agency. Again, this authorization represents a decline since 1970 in the Agency's effective operating funds as well as a personnel reduction.

We are at a point in history where it is essential that the rest of the world understand our goals, our foreign policy and our people. This understanding, in my judgment, is one of our most powerful weapons in confronting the influence of the Soviet Union and other totalitarian governments.

While the funds authorized for the International Communication Agency are not as high as I personally would like to see them, they will help enable this agency to better meet the challenge of our times.

It is equally important for us to expand our efforts through our radio stations which serve those behind the Iron Curtain. As the Soviet Government silences Helsinki monitor after Helsinki monitor, it is imperative that the truth be available to the millions behind the Iron Curtain. This we have done through authorizations for the Board for International Broadcasting.

The gentleman from Wisconsin has outlined some of our other initiatives including the establishment of a human rights institute, the creation of a solar demonstration program suggested by the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. JEFFORDS) the establishment of a commission to determine the need for a center for conflict resolution and provisions to integrate science and technology into foreign policy decisions.

This is a good bill, Mr. Chairman, and I urge the support of our colleagues for it.

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 12598 which authorizes appropriations for fiscal year 1979 for the Department of State, the International Communication Agency, and the Board of International Broadcasting. This bill would also make certain changes in the laws relating to those agencies, and to the Foreign Service personnel system.

I would also like to commend the chairman of the International Operations Subcommittee, the distinguished gentleman from Florida, for his fairness and skill in guiding this legislation to the floor.

He has displayed outstanding comprehension of the delicate and difficult task that faces our Nation in the sensitive, critical area of Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty. We are constantly involved in efforts to bring freedom to all peoples of this world, and to provide true glimpses of life in our country. My good friend and colleague, the distinguished gentleman from Florida, has done an outstanding job on this measure and has clearly demonstrated why he is regarded with such respect in this Chamber.

Early in the deliberations on this proposed legislation, a serious proposal was put forth to allow Communist countries free air time in order to respond to broadcasts of RFE/RL. I am pleased that the bill before us today incorporates my amendment to prevent such broadcasts unless RFE/RL, Inc. is allowed comparable airtime on Communist airwaves.

Under the Rinaldo amendment, we are not only telling the world we are willing to face the charges of the Communist leadership, but we are willing to go one step further. Moreover, since these facilities represent the only link with the free world for millions of people, we are protecting the integrity of RFE/RL broadcasts.

The Rinaldo language in this bill will help to preserve the value of these broadcasts. We need Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty, and we need them to broadcast the truth, as they have for the past two decades.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. GLICKMAN).

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) for yielding.

On my way back from Wichita, on the airplane I was reading through this bill and discovered a very strange section in it. That is section 803, which reads as follows:

> Of the amount authorized to be appropriated by section 101(a)(2) of this Act, $100,000 shall be available only for disbursements for the expenses of a special study group, to be appointed by the chairman of the Committee on International Relations of the House of Representatives, to investigate the feasibility of organizing additional parliamentary exchanges or assemblies . . .

Mr. Chairman, I do not have any problems with the interparliamentary unions, and I think on occasion they serve useful purposes; but we all know that they are a code word to the American people. The code word is "junket."

We do involve ourselves in the interparliamentary unions; and basically, I want to know the answers to certain questions. If either the chairman of the committee or my friend, the gentleman from New York (Mr. WOLFF) would like to respond, I have four basic questions, which I will ask right now.

No. 1, what is the purpose of a section which authorizes $100,000 to study additional interparliamentary meetings?

No. 2, who will use the funds?

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield so that I can answer each question as he poses it.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Yes, I am happy to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WOLFF. To answer the gentleman's first question, Mr. Chairman, basically what we are trying to do, in effect, is we are trying to reform the interparliamentary groups.

One of the problems we do have is that each country that has relationships with the United States would like to have an interparliamentary group, that is, a bilateral group. Our objections to this are the expenses that are involved. Moreover, the effort is time consuming in its effects; and therefore, the purpose of this amendment was to set up a study to find out ways and means by which we can eliminate or combine some of the bilateral exchanges and put them into regional types of operations.

Mr. GLICKMAN. If that is the gentleman's intent, then it has totally escaped me from reading the bill and the committee language, because the bill provides for additional parliamentary exchanges and assemblies. The committee language provides for additional parliamentary exchanges. Nowhere in any part of the language does it provide that these will be restricted.

In just reading some material from the Washington Post of March 30, 1978, it indicates that the total appropriated figure for IPU's is $45,000 for the last fiscal year. It looks as though this will cost two times what we spent there.

Mr. WOLFF. Maybe the $45,000 we are spending on the IPU's is too much. Perhaps the IPU has outlived its existence? Perhaps it is no longer necessary? This particular amendment was offered, because there were individual Members who sought the idea of setting up regional parliamentary assemblies.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 additional minutes to the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. GLICKMAN).

Mr. WOLFF. As a result of events in Asia and the concept of the U.S. position in the Pacific, various people in Asia expressed concern that the United States was withdrawing from Asia. They wanted to see some evidence of U.S. participation as a Pacific nation. Most all of our memberships in parliamentary groups and the like are with Europe. Unfortunately, we do not have a regional parliamentary group in Asia. There is talk of setting up a bilateral with Japan. I think the idea of setting up regional parliamentary assemblies is one which will save this country countless money, many times that of the cost of this study.

If the gentleman will look at the resource book, it shows that today we are spending on inter-American organizations, for example, some $64 million. We are spending on regional operations, which includes the North Atlantic Treaty assembly and North Atlantic assembly and such, $36 million. Our idea is to reduce the expenditures and make them more meaningful.

Mr. GLICKMAN. I would say two things to the gentleman: If the idea was to reduce the number, then that should have appeared in the committee report or in the bill itself. It does not.

The second point is, I still cannot figure out why we need an additional $100,000 for a special study. I would assume that at various points in time the committee staff itself would be able to determine that issue, as well as oversight, as well as the gentleman's own subcommittee. It is just incomprehensible to me, in light of the fact that the American people have this negative feeling about junkets—sometimes they are wrong, sometimes these trips are justified—to put something like this in a bill which is just a by word for inefficient and excessive government spending.

Mr. WOLFF. I would ask the gentleman on that score—the gentleman is voting on a bill that has to do with international relations—has the gentleman been out of the country recently?

Mr. GLICKMAN. No. Thankfully, I have been inside. I would tell the gentleman at the appropriate time that I would like to go on a trip sometime.

Mr. WOLFF. One of the important elements for the gentleman to consider is the fact that the Congress today has taken a much greater role in our foreign affairs. We do not take for granted everything that the State Department tells us. Therefore, it is important that we find out for ourselves some of these things. The important element involved here is attempting to eliminate those excesses that have existed.

Mr. GLICKMAN. I appreciate the gentleman's words. I know his intent is good.

I will offer an amendment at the appropriate time to strike section 803 as well as to reduce the authorization by $100,000, not that I do not believe the parliamentary unions are good and the assemblies—I do—but I think that this study is an unnecessary expenditure of money.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GLICKMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK).

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I certainly understand some of the gentleman's wonderment. He is one of the newer Members. He has not traveled as much as some others and that is to his credit. But, as the gentleman will learn over a period of time, and I hope it will not escape him, we save money not by reducing expenditures but by adding money. When you believe that, you will have been here too long.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI).

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, basically I support this legislation, and there are a number of specific amendments on which I worked and on which I wish to comment.

The first is related to Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty. I want to emphasize my support for continued broadcasts by Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty, whose activities should not only be continued but expanded.

The failure of the Belgrade Conference and the suppression of human rights and denial of political rights, which is standard procedure behind the Iron Curtain, requires that we augment the services which Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty provide.

John Gronouski came up with a very controversial suggestion that the Communists be given time on these facilities. My reaction was that this had merit only if the various Communist governments would grant us equal time on their facilities. This would be an interesting test of fairness.

I commend my colleague from New York, LESTER WOLFE, for the amendment which we worked on relative to United Nations' sanctioning of PLO propaganda activity at the world body. Our amendment instructs the U.S. Ambassador to the U.N. to work to terminate any such activity.

Overall, Mr. Chairman, the State Department authorization is a result of a very thorough, practical subcommittee and full committee review, and I commend it to the Members.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the conversation concerning parliamentary meetings I would like to discuss the value of parliamentary exchanges. Most of our Members, and that includes my dear friend, the gentleman from Ohio, are too modest and they refuse to recognize that they are principal participants in the most important legislative body in the world. So if, for whatever reason, a regularly scheduled or a one-shot affair, a parliamentary meeting is held in which the United States should participate and does not participate such a meeting of parliamentarians suffers if the United States does not have a delegation to represent our country.

Our legislators ought to appreciate more and more that legislative bodies, where they continue to exist, are ever more important entities. We give a special example for those countries that have abandoned the parliamentary or legislative branch of Government. That is why I think it is important that we fly the flag of the Congress around the world, that is why it is important that we dramatize the fact that the legislative branch of Government is a vital key in serving the public. Those countries that have gone the way of benevolent dictatorships, whether under an "ism" or the charismatic rule of one man, have frustrated the essential role of Government that is served by a freely elected legislative branch.

I honestly think criticism of the parliamentary meetings and criticism of the parliamentary exchanges is pennywise and pound foolish. There is an educational value to our Members who participate. There is a tremendous value to those members of parliaments of other countries who have a chance to meet with our Members and to learn about our political system and to understand the value of our two-party system and to further understand our Congress and the give and take and tolerance we have in our system which they often lack.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DERWINSKI. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Chairman, in view of the gentleman's placing such importance on legislative input into international affairs, I ask him if our Congress or any Member of our Congress was a party to the decision to send 10,000 tons of rice to Laos?

Mr. DERWINSKI. I think the gentleman is confusing a parliamentary meeting with a specific policy matter. They are two different subjects.

The purpose of the parliamentary exchanges is not that we develop ways to pass judgment on the minute decisions in the executive branch but rather that we understand the principles and vitality of parliamentary government.

Mr. YOUNG of Florida. I understand what the gentleman is saying. However, my question was did he or any Member of the Congress have any part in the decision to send 10,000 tons of rice under the Public Law 480 program to Laos, who has refused to make any accounting of those Americans listed as missing in action in Laos.

Mr. DERWINSKI. My answer is "no." I was not consulted. I am one Member and there are 433 other Members the gentleman could check with. But that has nothing to do with the point I was making.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished gentleman from Vermont (Mr. JEFFORDS).

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to commend the committee for their emphasis on the ultilization of solar energy and renewable sources of energy and their technology in this bill, and especially for embodying the provisions of H.R. 10699, a bill introduced by a number of Members, some 60, of the solar coalition. I believe this section 114, will help utilize our own embassies and other buildings in foreign countries as demonstration projects to illustrate how such alternate uses of energy will benefit not only our own country but other countries. Also, and importantly, this section will help develop our own markets to bring our costs down.

The provision would require the placement on our diplomatic and consular buildings abroad projects which utilize alternative energy systems. Such systems would be of a variety of alternative energy technologies, all of which are being developed by the Department of Energy, including heating and cooling, wind, photovoltaics, solar thermal, and biomass.

It has a number of purposes. First and foremost, it is designed to help move us to a position of leadership in implanting these technologies, at a much faster rate than is currently the case, across the globe. I need not belabor the reason: Fossil fuels are not only finite but increasingly expensive; nuclear power is outside the financial reach of most developing nations and present proliferation problems. It is altogether proper and, I think, necessary for us to demonstrate our technological capacities to accelerate the solar transition across the world.

Mr. Chairman, last summer the Office of Technology Assessment released a major study entitled "Application of Solar Technology to Today's Energy Needs." The study, in discussing the international scene, concluded:

> Development of a foreign market for solar energy devices could provide an excellent opportunity for U.S. exports and the expanded sales resulting from this would probably lead to lowered costs and improved quality of domestic solar equipment. The international utilization and impact of solar energy may depend critically on U.S. initiatives over the next few years. In most areas, U.S. research is the most advanced in the world, so many nations will look to the U.S. for guidance in this field. A U.S. commitment to solar power would encourage foreign commercialization of the technology, if only by giving it presitge.

It is an unfortunate fact that much of the developing world has considered the acquisition of conventional and nuclear energy systems as status symbols; and that so-called alternative systems have been looked upon by many as poor man's energy. We must break this psychology as quickly as possible. The bill calls for projects which will give "visible incentives" to these nations "to develop and use local solar energy." Thus the projects selected should be "adaptable to the local resources, climatic conditions, and economic circumstances of the host country in order that such countries will more likely implement similar projects."

I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that this is not a foreign aid program, not a giveaway program, not an exercise in frivolity. It could well be one of the most effective capital investment programs we can make in this budget cycle. It will pay for itself many times over in terms of saving fuel costs for our foreign operations, as well as helping stimulate U.S. industry by driving per unit costs down as overseas markets develop. It would stimulate exports, helping alleviate our balance-of-payments problems. And it would help enhance the security of our missions by making them more energy self-sufficient.

Information, technical, and engineering assistance to the Department of State under this provision would be provided by the Department of Energy. Although the Department of State has had some experience in evaluating and installing these systems, the vast fund of expertise and engineering skill of the Department of Energy should be at State's disposal for purposes of this program.

In fact this is not a new concept to the Department of State. Several years ago, the Department placed solar heated hot water installations on two U.S. mission residences in Tel Aviv, Israel. The savings in electrical consumption was dramatic and, according to the Department:

It is estimated that the average savings per annum on electricity for hot water per house will be approximately $300 to $400.

Furthermore:

If similar systems were installed at 26 other residences, substantial additional savings of approximately $7,800 to $10,400 per year in utility costs could be achieved.

This savings in electricity costs, as already demonstrated in Israel, can be achieved in many parts of the world with a variety of systems. At my request, the Office of Foreign Buildings in the Department of State has compiled a list of "possible solar installations" to serve as an illustration of what could be done. The list includes 11 major installations in various countries, including Niger, Pakistan, Iran, Senegal, Egypt, New Zealand, Bangladesh, Malawi, Philippines, and Kenya; the technologies range from photovoltaics, to solar windpower to solar thermal absorption. The Department has also compiled a list of 130 installations in our many posts on all continents where domestic hot water might be implaced.

The total estimated costs of these projects, after engineering studies to determine feasibility, is roughly $5. The Department has informed us, however, that in fiscal year 1979 it could reasonably expect to expend roughly $4 million on this program and so it is my understanding that the committee has taken the advice of the Department on the money question and thus authorized $4 million for this program in the bill before us.

It was my intent in offering this measure that it dovetail with section 119 of the Foreign Assistance Act, as passed for fiscal year 1978, which calls for the early development of bilateral programs with Third World countries for the development of rural-oriented alternative energy technologies. Early placement of these technologies on our diplomatic structures abroad would help provide impetus to the bilateral programs provided for in section 119. It would expect that the projects would move quickly from the feasibility to the hardware stages and that the Department move expeditiously. The language has been drafted to give the Department maximum discretion in choosing projects and locales, and the menu is a large one.

The potential for American leadership in this field is large and still unrealized. Take, for example, photovoltaic technologies. The present cost of these systems is uneconomically high, because the industry has been in the handicraft stage. But, with congressionally mandated funding, as already agreed upon by the Energy Act conferees, over the next 3 years, the industry will be able to automate and costs will drop dramatically. Based on these new costs projections very recent studies by the NASA–LEWIS Research Center and Lincoln Laboratory at MIT are optimistic over the future of photovoltaic technologies in the less-developed world. A March 1977 study for the Department of Energy by Lincoln Laboratories concluded that—

Photovoltaic power possesses certain attractive features that suggest an important role in meeting the energy needs of less-developed countries.

And in a June 1977 NASA–LEWIS study entitled "The Market for Solar Photovoltaic Power in Developing Countries: 1977–2000," it was concluded:

It is clear . . . that the adoption of renewable resource (e.g. solar) decentralized energy technology (e.g., photovoltaic, wind) should provide significant benefits for economic development and the quality of life in LDCs. Major benefits to the U.S. would be (1) enhancement of national security by lessening pressure created by declining economic positions of large masses of the world population; (2) creation of new foreign markets, and (3) to provide markets to support the major portion of the growth of fledgling U.S. solar energy industry.

I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that the United States is not in the lead in the international marketing of these technologies. Far from it, there are a number of countries—including Japan, France, Germany, and Israel—which are currently pursuing more aggressive strategies in marketing their alternative technologies. We are behind, and I am hopeful that this measure will serve as one small step to help move us in the right direction.

Lastly, I would like to say that we have had a very satisfactory experience in working closely with the Department, and particularly the Office of Foreign Buildings, in constructing this provision. I think it shows that the two branches can work well together in developing creative legislation, and I look forward to continuing the mutual exchange of ideas on this program which will make the program work around the world.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to compliment the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. JEFFORDS) upon his leadership in this matter. He has made a very valuable contribution to this piece of legislation, one that I believe to be of substantial importance.

Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Chairman, I particularly want to speak in behalf of section 115 of H.R. 12598, the fiscal year 1979 Foreign Relations Authorization Act. This section expresses the sense of the Congress that the United States should continue to work to terminate certain units within the United Nations General Assembly designed to propagandize against the State of Israel and in favor of the PLO.

The provision is similar to a bill that I introduced earlier this year with approximately 30 cosponsors which would have cut U.S. contributions to the U.N. in an amount proportional to the funds spent to support the Palestinian propaganda units. I would have preferred that the tougher language of my bill be included in H.R. 12598, but I am pleased that the House will have an opportunity to express its displeasure with these U.N. activities.

The alleged purpose of the unit is to observe the International Day of Solidarity with the Palestinian People, but the activities of the group would include dissemination of messages of hatred against the State of Israel and its inhabitants. This unit is, in effect, an extension of the U.N. Committee on the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People, which is composed of 23 states—19 having no diplomatic relations with Israel. Clearly, the new unit will only further erode the respect for the impartiality of the United Nations.

The continued existence of the unit can only complicate and possibly jeopardize the sensitive peace negotiations in the Middle East, and reduce the role the United Nations might legitimately play in helping to assure a just and lasting peace.

I urge my colleagues to join with me in supporting section 115 of the bill, and demonstrating our commitment to real peace in the Middle East as well as to an impartial and fair United Nations. The interests of the people of the Middle East and the interests of the United Nations as an institution will not be served if the U.N. is used as a propaganda mouthpiece for the Palestine Liberation Organization.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I have no further requests for time.

The CHAIRMAN. All time having expired, pursuant to the rule, the Clerk will now read the bill by titles.

The Clerk read as follows:

H.R. 12598

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

SHORT TITLE

SECTION 1. This Act may be cited as the "Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Year 1979".

TITLE I—DEPARTMENT OF STATE

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR FISCAL YEAR 1979

SEC. 101. (a) There are authorized to be appropriated for the Department of State for fiscal year 1979, to carry out the authorities, functions, duties, and responsibilities in the conduct of the foreign affairs of the United States, including trade negotiations, and other purposes authorized by law, the following amounts:

(1) For "Administration of Foreign Affairs", $849,139,000.

(2) For "International Organizations and Conferences", $412,881,000.

(3) For "International Commissions", $20,773,000.

(4) For "Migration and Refugee Assistance", $91,336,000.

(5) For increases in salary, pay, retirement, and other employee benefits authorized by law, and for other nondiscretionary costs, such amounts as may be necessary.

(b) Amounts appropriated under this section are authorized to remain available until expended.

TRANSFER AUTHORITY

SEC. 102. Funds authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1979 by paragraphs (1) through (4) of section 101(a) may be appropriated for fiscal year 1979 for a purpose for which appropriations are authorized by any other of those paragraphs, except that the total amount appropriated for a purpose described in any of those paragraphs may not exceed by more than 10 per centum the amount specifically authorized for that purpose by section 101(a).

SUPPLEMENTAL AUTHORIZATION FOR FISCAL YEAR 1978 FOR INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS AND CONFERENCES

SEC. 103. Section 101(a)(2) of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Year 1978, is amended by striking out "$389,412,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$426,687,000".

UNDOCUMENTED ALIEN PROGRAM

SEC. 104. In addition to amounts otherwise available for such purpose, $1,250,000 of the amount authorized to be appropriated by section 101(a)(1) of this Act shall be available only for the expenses of the Department of State in strengthening visa processing in connection with the President's program on undocumented aliens.

UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE ON SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY FOR DEVELOPMENT

SEC. 105. In addition to amounts otherwise available for such purpose, $945,000 of the amount authorized to be appropriated by section 101(a)(1) of this Act shall be available only for expenses incurred by the Department of State in conjunction with the United Nations Conference on Science and Technology for Development, including expenses for preparatory conferences and seminars held in the United States.

ASSISTANCE FOR REFUGEES SETTLING IN ISRAEL

SEC. 106. Of the amount authorized to be appropriated by section 101(a)(4) of this Act, $25,000,000 shall be available only for assistance for the resettlement in Israel of refugees from the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics and from Communist countries in Eastern Europe.

ASSISTANCE FOR REFUGEES IN AFRICA

SEC. 107. In addition to amounts otherwise available for such purpose, $10,000,000 of the amount authorized to be appropriated by section 101(a)(4) of this Act shall be available only for assistance for refugees in Africa.

INTERNATIONAL COMMISSIONS—AMERICAN SECTIONS

SEC. 108. (a) Section 19 of the Act entitled "An Act to provide certain basic authority for the Department of State", approved August 1, 1956 (22 U.S.C. 2689), is amended by striking out "not to exceed $1,500 of the".

(b) The amendment made by this section shall take effect on October 1, 1978.

AID TO DESTITUTE AMERICANS ABROAD

SEC. 109. (a) Section 3(j) of the Act entitled "An Act to provide certain basic authority for the Department of State", approved August 1, 1956 (22 U.S.C. 2670(j)), is amended by inserting "or destitute United States citizens abroad" immediately after "incarcerated abroad".

(b) The amendment made by this section shall take effect on October 1, 1978.

WORKING CAPITAL FUND

SEC. 110. (a) Section 13 of the Act entitled "An Act to provide certain basic authority for the Department of State", approved August 1, 1956 (22 U.S.C. 2684), is amended—

(1) by striking out "supply" in clause (2) in the first sentence;

(2) by striking out ", and" at the end of clause (2) in the first sentence and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon;

(3) by inserting immediately before the period at the end of the first sentence "; and (4) medical and health care services";

(4) by striking out the third sentence; and

(5) by inserting "(a)" immediately after "SEC. 13." and by adding the following new subsection at the end of the section:

"(b) The current value of supplies returned to the working capital fund by a post, activity, or agency may be charged to the fund. The proceeds thereof shall, if otherwise authorized, be credited to current applicable appropriations and shall remain available for expenditures for the same purposes for which those appropriations are available. Credits may not be made to appropriations under this subsection as the result of capitalization of inventories.".

(b) The amendments made by this section shall take effect on October 1, 1978.

CONSOLIDATION OF ADMINISTRATIVE SERVICES

SEC. 111. (a) The Act entitled "An Act to provide certain basic authority for the Department of State", approved August 1, 1956, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEC. 23. Whenever the Secretary of State determines that administrative services performed in common by the Department of State and any other Federal agency performing any foreign affairs functions (including, but not limited to, the International Communication Agency, the Agency for International Development, and the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency) may be performed more advantageously and more economically on a consolidated basis, the Secretary may, by agreement with the head of the other Federal agency concerned and with the approval of the Director of the Office of Management and Budget, provide for the transfer of so much of the functions, personnel, property, records, and funds of the Department of State or the other Federal agency concerned as may be necessary to enable the performance of those administrative services on a consolidated basis for the benefit of both the Department of State and the other Federal agency concerned. Agreements for consolidation of administrative services under this section shall provide for reimbursement or advances of funds from the agency receiving the service to the agency performing the service in amounts which will approximate the expense of providing administrative services for the serviced agency.".

(b) The amendment made by this section shall take effect on October 1, 1978.

POST EMPLOYEE SERVICES

SEC. 112. (a) Part C of title IX of the Foreign Service Act of 1946 (22 U.S.C. 1139) is amended—

(1) by striking out "COMMISSARY SERVICE" in the heading for that part and inserting in lieu thereof "POST EMPLOYEE SERVICES"; and

(2) by amending subsections (b) and (c) of section 921 to read as follows:

"(b) The Secretary, under such regulations as he may prescribe, may authorize and assist in the establishment maintenance, and operation by officers and employees of the Service of non-Government-operated services and facilities at posts abroad, including the furnishing of space, utilities, and properties owned or leased by the United States for use by its diplomatic and consular missions. The provisions of the Foreign Service Buildings Act, 1926 (22 U.S.C. 292–300), and section 13 of the Act entitled 'An Act to provide certain basic authority for the Department of State', approved August 1, 1956 (22 U.S.C. 2684), may be utilized by the Secretary in providing such assistance. Services and facilities established under this subsection shall be made available, insofar as practicable, to officers and employees of other Government agencies and their dependents who are stationed abroad. Such services and facilities shall not be established in localities where another United States agency operates similar services or facilities unless the Secretary determines that such additional services or facilities are necessary.

"(c) Charges at any post abroad for a service or facility authorized or assisted under this section shall be at the same rate for all civilian personnel of the Government serviced thereby, and all charges for supplies furnished to such a service and facilities abroad by any Government agency shall be at the same rate as that charged by the furnishing agency to its comparable civilian services and facilities.".

(b) The amendments made by this section shall take effect on October 1, 1978.

FURNISHING MEDICAL SERVICES ABROAD

SEC. 113. (a) Part E of title IX of the Foreign Service Act of 1946 is amended—

(1) in section 942 (22 U.S.C. 1157) by striking out "(a)" and by striking out subsection (b); and

(2) by adding at the end of that part the following new section:

"FURNISHING MEDICAL SERVICES ABROAD

"SEC. 945. The Secretary may establish medical treatment and health care facilities and provide for the services of physicians, nurses, or other medical or health care personnel at a post at which, in the opinion of the Secretary, sufficient personnel are employed to warrant such facilities or services.".

(b) The amendments made by this section shall take effect on October 1, 1978.

FOREIGN MISSION SOLAR ENERGY DEMONSTRATION

SEC. 114. (a) It is the purpose of this section to demonstrate solar energy and other renewable energy technologies in foreign countries by using such energy in buildings acquired under subsection (a) of the first section of the Foreign Service Buildings Act, 1923 (22 U.S.C. 292(a)), in order that—

(1) host nations may be given visible incentives to develop and use local solar energy or other renewable energy resources to reduce dependence upon petroleum and petroleum products;

(2) markets may be developed for American solar energy systems and components in order to stimulate investment in such systems and components and to reduce the costs of such systems and components to reasonable levels;

(3) in furtherance of the purpose of section 119 of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2151q), cooperation may be developed between the United States and other countries in an effort to develop solar energy or other renewable energy systems within a short period of time; and

(4) equipment which is vital to the operation of sensitive systems within United States missions abroad may be made more self-sufficient and reliable and will not be dependent upon interruptible local energy supplies.

(b)(1) The Secretary of State shall implement projects for the application of solar energy or other forms of renewable energy in buildings acquired under subsection (a) of the first section of the Foreign Service Buildings Act, 1926.

(2) The Secretary of State shall select projects under paragraph (1) in consultation with the Secretary of Energy. Such projects shall apply available solar energy and other renewable energy technologies, including those for—

(A) the heating and cooling of buildings;

(B) solar thermal electric systems;

(C) solar photovoltaic conversion systems;

(D) wind energy systems; and

(E) systems for developing fuels from biomass.

The Secretary of Energy shall inform the Secretary of State of all such technologies which are feasible for such projects, taking into account the resources and environmental conditions of the host countries concerned. Upon the request of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of Energy shall provide to the Secretary of State any technical information or other technical assistance which the Secretary of State considers necessary with respect to any such project. Any project selected under this section should be similar to projects which have been demonstrated by the Department of Energy (or its predecessor agencies) to be reliable, maintainable, and technically feasible.

(3) Any project selected under this section shall be adaptable to the local resources, climatic conditions, and economic circumstances of the host country in order that such country will more likely implement similar projects.

(4) The Secretary of State shall take the steps necessary to insure that any project selected under this section is demonstrated to, and available for inspection by, officials and other citizens of the host country.

(5) In selecting projects under this sections, the Secretary of State shall give priority to projects to be implemented in less developed countries.

(c) Whenever any building is constructed under the authority contained in the first section of the Foreign Service Buildings Act, 1926, the Secretary of State shall take the steps necessary to insure that the planning for such construction takes into account those renewable energy systems which are available in the country in which the building is to be constructed.

(d) In addition to amounts otherwise available for such purposes, $4,000,000 of the amount authorized to be appropriated by section 101(a)(1) of this Act shall be available only to carry out the purposes of this section.

PALESTINIAN RIGHTS UNITS

SEC. 115. (a) The Congress, noting United Nations General Assembly Resolution 3376 (XXX) which established the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People and noting United Nations General Assembly Resolutions 32/40/A and 32/40/B which continued the mandate of that Committee and requested the Secretary General of the United Nations to establish within the Secretariat of the United Nations a Special Unit on Palestinian Rights, declares that—

(1) the continuation of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People and the creation of the Special Unit on Palestinian Rights are wasteful expeditures of limited United Natons resources at a time when the United Nations is experiencing severe financial difficulties and when the United Nations is under close scrutiny from contributing States;

(2) the work of the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People does not contribute to the process of peacemaking presently underway in the Middle East; and

(3) the United States Ambassador to the United Nations should be instructed to continue to oppose extensions of the mandate of that Committee as well as extensions of the Special Unit on Palestinian Rights.

(b) It is the sense of the Congress that the President should direct the United States Ambassador to the United Nations to use all means at his disposal to obtain action by the General Assembly to terminate the Committee on the Exercise of the Inalienable Rights of the Palestinian People and the Special Unit on Palestinian Rights.

UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR MANAGEMENT

SEC. 116. (a)(1) The first section of the Act entitled "An Act to strengthen and improve the organization and administration of the Department of State, and for other purposes", approved May 26, 1949 (22 U.S.C. 2652), is amended by striking out "a Deputy Under Secretary of State" and inserting in lieu thereof "an Under Secretary of State for Management".

(2) The individual holding the office of Deputy Under Secretary of State on the effective date of this section shall assume the duties of Under Secretary of State for Management and shall not be required to be reappointed by reason of the enactment of this section.

(b)(1) Paragraph (9) of section 5314 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by inserting "and Under Secretary of State for Management" immediately after "Programs".

(2) Paragraph (10) of section 5315 of such title is repealed.

(c) The amendments made by this section shall take effect on October 1, 1978.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INTERNATIONAL NARCOTICS MATTERS

SEC. 117. (a) There is established in the Department of State, in addition to the positions provided under the first section of the Act of May 26, 1949 (22 U.S.C. 2652), an Assistant Secretary of State for International Narcotics Matters, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Assistant Secretary shall be responsible for the overall coordination of the role of the Department of State in the international aspects of narcotics problems.

(b)(1) Section 5315 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(122) Assistant Secretary for International Narcotics Matters, Department of State.".

(2) The amendment made by paragraph (1) of this subsection shall take effect on October 1, 1978.

Mr. ZABLOCKI (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that title I be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. JEFFORDS

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JEFFORDS: Page 15, insert the following new section after line 18:

WORLD ALTERNATE ENERGY CONFERENCE

SEC. 118. It is the sense of the Congress that the United States should encourage the United Nations to hold a World Alternate Energy Conference in 1981 to consider ways to meet the world's energy needs through the development and use of alternate energy sources. A main purpose of the Conference should be to consider the establishment, under the auspices of the United Nations, of an international alternate energy organization which would encourage the worldwide use of alternate energy sources by assisting in the dissemination of information and by other appropriate means.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I propose an amendment to H.R. 12598 which would encourage the Department of State to take a leadership role in the United Nations to promote a major international conference in 1981 on alternate energy technologies and their expanded use.

The idea for the development of such a conference has been suggested by a number of authorities, including the President in a recent speech in honor of "Sun Day," the nationwide celebration of solar technologies. In addition, such a conference has been discussed within the United Nations organization for several years, and will, I am told, be a topic for consideration during the meetings of the Governing Council of the U.N. Economic and Social Council this upcoming July.

The amendment is based on a resolution which I introduced last December, introduced simultaneously in the Senate by Senator HUMPHREY, and which has been one of the measures sponsored in general by the solar coalition.

International—U.N.-sponsored—conferences have recently been held, or are planned, on a number of global issues: Environment (1972), food (1974), population (1974), water (1977), decertification (1977), and science and technology (1979). In most cases, they were conceived and initiated just before or at the time that widespread public attention—and that of policymakers—was being brought to bear on their respective subjects. By the time of the conference themselves, the particular subject had usually become front-page material.

The chief purpose of any world conference is usually education that results from news media coverage on the important people that gather and the issues they debate. Thus the Stockholm Conference on the Environment and the Rome World Food Conference were intensive learning periods for people throughout the world with respect to those topics. Similarly the recent world water conference has stimulated a great flow of information on water. Equally important with public education is the value of conference in educating government leaders who are forced by the conference to devote attention to a topic that otherwise might be neglected.

Another purpose is to develop a consensus on as many issues as possible. This is done during the preparation period leading up to the conference. During that period, governments and nongovernmental organizations are forced to develop and adopt positions on the issues at stake.

Some of the questions which might usefully be discussed at an alternative energy conference in 1981 would be: First, what kind of continuing organizational arrangements at an international level should be established to promote information exchange and for other purposes? This should be a main purpose of the conference in that all too often followup is lacking after all the rhetoric has died down; second, what technologies are most promising for rural use and for urban and industrial use? and third, how can R. &. D. efforts around the world be stimulated, coordinated, and economized?

With a couple of years of good preparatory work—that is, workshops, colloquiums, staff papers, and so forth—a conference on alternate, or solar, energy could achieve several benefits. To begin with, it could do much to improve the image of renewable energy technologies which are generally dismissed in the Third World as second best, or poor man's energy. If Secretary Schlesinger were to lead the U.S. delegation, if President Carter were to send a strong message of support, if the U.S. Government were to put a lot of muscle in preparing for such a conference, and if the strong European interest in these topics is brought to the support of the conference, it could reverse this misconception. Certainly with such an effort it should be possible to persuade the Third World that: First, eventually all of us will have to turn to renewable energy; second, that we of the North, being hooked on capital intensive depletable technology, will have a long and painful withdrawal; but, third, the South, not yet being hooked, might just have an opportunity to put into place new kinds of energy systems without having to go through a period of major capital dependence on depletable systems.

Given proper advance preparation, the conference could formalize certain agreements on which experts had worked out a consensus. For example, it might agree to establish an international institute for renewable energy. Alternatively—or additionally—it might designate or establish a lead agency to pull together into a loose network the solar energy work now going on in some 200 programs around the world. The lead agency might insure that information developed anywhere in the network—for example, in the new U.S. Solar Energy Research Institute—is quickly made known to the entire network, exchanges personnel and essential materials, and provides seed money to start up research on promising but neglected topics.

OPEC might also play a useful role in the proposed conference. It is conceivable, for example, that some OPEC countries—for example, Saudi Arabia—might help finance a solar network. The United States and the Saudis have already begun major cooperation in the solar field, and there is no reason that this cannot be continued and even expanded upon.

I know that there are a lot of other things that my colleagues would recommend be done in regard to such a conference, and I hope that they will be supportive of this amendment.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFORDS. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. JEFFORDS) for yielding to me, and I wish to express my appreciation, on the part of the committee for the contribution the gentleman has made on this subject. The gentleman has made his amendment available to us and we have very carefully reviewed it, and we are willing to accept it.

Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Chairman, I would just conclude by saying that this is another one of the bills that was introduced by the solar coalition and cosponsored by some 60 Members, and I believe it is also contained in the bill in the other body.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFORDS. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I listened to the Clerk read the gentleman's amendment, and would add that this bill is replete with institutions, conferences and boards that do not now exist and the gentleman is adding another one. Did the gentleman mention who will pay the cost of this and how much?

Mr. JEFFORDS. I think the gentleman did not hear the first part of the amendment. This has to do with the establishment within the United Nations of such body, and it would be similar to many others which have been devised over the years. It would not require funding by this body, nor is there any intention, except for the direct method of financing the United Nations, that there would be any financial burden placed upon the United States.

Mr. BAUMAN. This simply calls for the holding of such conference?

Mr. JEFFORDS. Yes, it does.

Mr. BAUMAN. I think the gentleman is under the misimpression that the United States does not pay the largest part of the United Nations operations. Undoubtedly, his taxpayers and mine will have to pay for this conference, whatever its merits and principles.

Mr. JEFFORDS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFORDS. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

This side is pleased to accept the amendment.

Mr. JEFFORDS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. JEFFORDS).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENTS OFFERED BY MR. GLICKMAN

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendments offered by Mr. GLICKMAN: Section 101(a)(2) is amended by striking the figure, "$412,881,000," and inserting in its place the figure, "412,781,000," and Section 803 is stricken from the bill.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered en bloc.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, I spoke to this issue briefly before, and I appreciate the opportunity to offer the amendments and also appreciate the cooperation from the chairman of the committee.

This amendment again relates to the creation of a special study and the funding of $100,000 to decide whether we want to set up additional parliamentary exchanges or assemblies. As I pointed out in my colloquy with the gentleman from New York, I am extremely concerned not so much with the Interparliamentary Unions but the fact that we are kind of setting a precedent here, that we are setting up a special study commission, another one of these commissions, to determine if additional parliamentary exchanges are needed.

In order to get some background information, let me tell the Members that the United States participates in four key interparliamentary sessions: one with Mexico, one with Canada, one with NATO members, and one worldwide, and on a less formal basis with Great Britain—and increasingly with European parliaments. The cost depends largely on location of the sessions and the numbers of members participating. The intent is to be kind of a U.N. for legislators. During the original formation of these things, I believe partly led by former Senator Fulbright, it was felt that these sessions were useful but that they should not be permitted to proliferate, and that was a key word. When we look back at the legislative history: In determining that these sessions should not be permitted to proliferate, Members of Congress were concerned that Members could end up spending over half their time on these trips.

What I am really concerned about here is the fact that we are setting up a section of this bill which has as its inherent purpose a study funded separately from the committee's own funds, which will endeavor to determine whether additional parliamentary conferences should be utilized or not. Maybe they should, but we do not need 100 grand out of this bill to do it. The committee has got the authority internally; they are smart enough internally; the staff is capable enough internally to decide whether we want to have the additional conferences or not.

I believe we ought to follow in the footsteps of Senator Fulbright, who freely said that while these things are good, they should not proliferate. We are worried about the nonproliferation of nuclear weapons. I think we should also worry about the nonproliferation of these junkets. I do not consider every one of these meetings to be a junket. I think there is a valuable purpose to be served between the Members of Congress and the members of parliaments all throughout the world. However, I think it is just absolutely inane and absurd to include a section in this bill which calls for an additional $100,000 to study whether we should create any additional conferences. I think the committee is perfectly capable of doing that internally, and, accordingly, Mr. Chairman, my amendment will decrease the budget of this bill by $100,000, will strike the section of the bill which will call for the creation of this special study, and will provide that we shall continue to do our appropriate role of oversight in determining where we should have these interparliamentary conferences. I think if the members of the public—the people in our districts—could see this amendment, while they need to be educated at times about the good purposes of these Interparliamentary Unions, they do not need to be educated about this one. This is a total waste of money, and I urge the adoption of my amendments.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, first, let me say in answer to the gentleman who offered the amendment that when the gentleman indicated that this was a total waste of money, we sometimes operate in this body on the basis of foreign intelligence and other times on total ignorance of foreign intelligence.

The gentleman said that he looked at this while on the airplane on a trip he was taking from his home State here. When the gentleman saw this portion of the bill, the gentleman made a determination to cut this amount from the bill.

Now, that is not really the way that we should be legislating here. Actually, in the weeks that we spent on drawing up this bill, we examined every one of these points very carefully. We held hearings on all the aspects of this bill. Now, one aspect of it, the gentleman singles out is the study to cut expenditures for parliamentary exchanges. We are spending millions in this bill on these international assemblies.

Now, when we come down to the idea of being penny-wise and pound-foolish, this is a typical example of how we try to show and wave in the air the savings of $100,000, in order to spend millions on these various conferences around the world.

I am sure that the gentleman's constituents would want the gentleman to see to it that the money we spend in this Congress is spent in a fashion consistent with the well-being of not only the House, but of the entire Nation and the Nation's taxpayers.

Therefore, I say that the idea of trying to single out the matter of a study, which is to try to reform, which is to try to condense the number of these assemblies that we have or parliamentary exchanges we have, is just not logical. But perhaps he seeks to add rather than reduce the funds.

The gentleman quotes Senator Fulbright. We have had a great many changes that have occurred since Senator Fulbright's time in the Congress. Congress has taken a much greater role in the determination of foreign policy.

The gentleman just cannot sit on an airplane and cavalierly make determinations on foreign policy. I think what we want to try to do here is to attempt to get an outside source to come in and make a study of existing assemblies, see what is necessary, change them if necessary, and cut back wherever is necessary.

Mr. NEDZI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLFF. I am delighted to yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. NEDZI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman help me understand what this particularly authorizes the gentleman's subcommittee or the full Committee on Foreign Relations to do which they properly cannot do?

Mr. WOLFF. It is not only the question of spending $100,000. The idea behind this is to see that we get an outside study made of these existing organizations.

Mr. NEDZI. There are none at the present time?

Mr. WOLFF. Well, there are private turfs within the Congress, that have existed for a long time in individual parliamentary exchanges. Perhaps doing a study in house we would not get as unbiased a view as if we had someone from the outside come in and make a study.

Mr. NEDZI. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, there is nothing prohibiting us from coming in with an outside source at the present time. As somebody indicated, it is a question of spending $100,000 through the backdoor and not going through the Committee on House Administration that is really what it amounts to.

Mr. WOLFF. Not really, because, after all, we did not go through the back door; we went through the front door by putting this recommendation in the bill as a State Department-congressional operation.

Mr. NEDZI. Front door or back door, the fact of the matter is that the Committee on House Administration does not have jurisdiction over this particular amount of money if it is handled in this particular fashion, is that not correct?

Certainly there is no legislative prohibition as far as the jurisdiction of the committee is concerned to get into this kind of problem. I regard it as a responsibility of the committee, and if an appeal is made to the chairman of the committee on House Administration, I am sure it would be considered very objectively.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. WOLFF) has expired.

(On request of Mr. GLICKMAN, and by unanimous consent, Mr. WOLFF was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. NEDZI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WOLFF. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. NEDZI. Mr. Chairman, I would still like to hear from the gentleman as to what this would authorize the committee to do that it is not presently authorized to do.

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Chairman, it is similar to what we have now in the funding of the various parliamentary assemblies that is under the jurisdiction of our committee. These assemblies are not funded through the Committee on House Administration.

Mr. NEDZI. This is not a parliamentary assembly, however.

Mr. WOLFF. The objectives here is to study the parliamentary assemblies in the same fashion as we fund the parliamentary assemblies.

Mr. NEDZI. Mr. Speaker, I think we have exhausted our discussion.

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLFF. I am delighted to yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Chairman, may I say to the gentleman that in the past I have opposed and voted against funds for the interparliamentary organizations and similar organizations.

It was my privilege as a member of the Select Committee on Narcotics Abuse and Control to make a tour of a number of Asian countries. I attended the meetings that the chairman of the Select Committee, the gentleman from New York (Mr. WOLFF), chaired, and we talked about the need for some sort of a legislation forum where the representative of the Asian countries could meet and discuss their mutual problems.

I want to say to the Members that every one of the nations we visited were interested in that proposal. I think what the gentleman from New York (Mr. WOLFF) has in mind is to further explore that possibility; is that not correct?

Mr. WOLFF. Yes, the gentleman is correct.

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Chairman, if that is the purpose we should not be thinking in terms of $100,000; it should be closer to $250,000 or $300,000. This is an area in which some of the peoples of the world have been worried because of the pullouts that have taken place on our part. They wonder whether we are turning our backs.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, if my colleague, the gentleman from New York (Mr. WOLFF), will yield, may I respond to my colleague, the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SKUBITZ), by saying that the real issue is what the gentleman from New York says is the question of turf.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. WOLFF) has again expired.

(On request of Mr. GLICKMAN, and by unanimous consent, Mr. WOLFF was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will continue to yield and if I may proceed, obviously since it is a question of turf, it is a question of jurisdiction, and this is the easiest way to handle the issue.

Mr. Chairman, if I may respond further, let me say that I am not opposed to the Interparliamentary Unions or conferences I just think—and in this I agree with my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK)—that this is an absolutely ridiculous way to go. The staff is already there, and the committees are there. We are going to have 2 months at the end of this year when we are out running for reelection and we have nothing to do but try to determine these basic issues.

Mr. Chairman, there is no reason to furnish this $100,000.

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, the possibility has been there for years, and no one has looked into it. It is always argued that the objective is OK but there is another way to do it. Nothing will be done unless we find someone who has the courage and the desire and the determination to get at this problem and try to get a closer working relationship between this country and the Asian countries.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Chairman, let me say to the gentleman that the gentleman from Ohio and I have stated to our colleagues before that we hear that logic on every issue that comes before the Congress.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to underline some of the remarks made by our colleague, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI). I think we must understand the importance to our country of these exchanges.

I know that the U.S. House of Representatives has been a favorite whipping boy of ourselves and of the press throughout American history. That certainly is true today.

I know much is made of congressional travel, but as one Member who does not personally belong to any of these parliamentary groups, I want to underline my own sense of their importance to our country and to other countries which, as the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) emphasized, are those that still have parliaments. We need this communication. It is of value.

It has always been a strange thing to me that bureaucrats of the executive branch of our Government crisscross the oceans and the earth, traveling many thousands of miles week after week, month after month, and year after year, to perform their sometimes great and sometimes very small business in various places at vast expense to the taxpayers, and yet this coequal branch of the Government whose entire budget amounts to but a drop in the bucket, compared to that of the average agency of the executive branch of Government, is somehow hesitant to do the essential travel to fulfill our responsibilities, and are often attacked for so doing.

We are hesitant to go and see for ourselves what the conditions are, to go and meet for ourselves the people who are the decisionmakers, and to play a more decisive role by being there on the ground and on the spot and by maximizing communication with other leadership peoples so that we might rightly manage our far-flung enterprises over which we control the purse strings and for which we have responsibility to the American people.

Why should not the people's branch communicate broadly with people's representatives from other countries? Why should not the people's branch, which controls the purse strings and which has the legislative responsibility in this Government, do the necessary travel to properly fulfill that responsibility?

The United States did not seek world leadership; we grew into it. Because our way of freedom works, we became strong and great. And we were dragged kicking and screaming, as it were, into a position of leadership in the world. But we are in that position, and the world looks to us for leadership. We must give it. If we are to give the leadership that history requires of us, we need communication with other countries which have parliamentary bodies. We need the communication and we need to be on the spot to give the leadership.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the defeat of this amendment.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, if we may descend, for a moment, from the lofty heights of international expression to a more mundane level—and that is the best interest of the taxpayers of Kansas and Maryland and Alabama—could anyone on the Committee on International Relations tell me what the committee's travel budget is this year, in total, authorized by the House Administration, as the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. NEDZI) referred to? How much money does the committee have available for committee travel?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAUMAN. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I think the committee will probably use about $200,000 for travel in 1978.

Mr. BAUMAN. In addition to that, are there not statutory amounts authorized for the Interparliamentary Union, the Mexican and the Canadian groups?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. If the gentleman will yield further, that is not within our committee. They are separately funded.

Mr. BAUMAN. I understand that, but are there not also additional statutory amounts available that the Congress authorizes for those various groups?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Not for the Committee on International Relations. I sign the vouchers, I might say to the gentleman, and the only vouchers I am authorized to sign are for trips that are authorized for members of our committee.

Mr. BAUMAN. The gentleman indeed recalls having a colloquy with the gentleman from Wisconsin at some time in the last 6 to 12 months regarding increases in the Interparliamentary Union funding. At the time, it became a matter of discussion as to whether this money is at the discretion of the Speaker under general travel funds or whether it is authorized separately.

The point the gentleman wishes to make is that, in addition to the travel money the gentleman's committee has available, $200,000, there are other funds for the interparliamentary groups. Now we are seeking $100,000 in addition, to study, as the gentleman said, further meetings on an interparliamentary basis.

I think it is perfectly reasonable for the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. GLICKMAN) and the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. NEDZI) to question whether or not this is the appropriate forum for a quantum jump in spending for what undoubtedly the study will conclude—or it would not be made—that still more international travel is necessary.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. If the gentleman will yield further, I must advise the gentleman that an answer to his question would probably be more directly and more emphatically given by the gentleman from New York, who is the sponsor of this particular section.

Mr. BAUMAN. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman if he can shed any light, because the report devotes all of five lines to this entire section.

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAUMAN. Yes, I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Could the gentleman tell me the amount that is available to interparliamentary groups under current law?

Mr. WOLFF. Unfortunately, there is a misinterpretation of this amendment. It has nothing to do with the interparliamentary unions.

Mr. BAUMAN. My question is, How much money is now available by action of the House or of the Congress for the various interparliamentary groups or the subgroups that meet in Canada, in Mexico, and so on?

Mr. WOLFF. There is $195,000 forwarded through section 101(a)(1) for parliamentary exchange groups. It is established by law.

Mr. BAUMAN. It was stated that the chairman has $200,000 at this disposal. We are now getting close to $400,000.

That, of course, does not in any way affect any of the other committees of this body which have international travel; does it?

Mr. WOLFF. Would it not be the purpose of the gentleman to do exactly what we have done in order to try to reduce it, if at all possible?

Mr. BAUMAN. The gentleman from Maryland is the first to join with the gentleman from New York in economizing. However, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. NEDZI) has made the point that he serves on a not parsimonious committee, and everybody's budget is funded in accordance with what they need and can justify. However, the committee comes in here with another $100,000, which is to be taken out of the pockets of the taxpayers of the United States.

With respect to what the gentleman from Alabama has said, we are not in any way denigrating ourselves by trying to keep a handle on this travel money, I say to the gentleman from Alabama.

I am sure that my colleague, the gentleman from New York, did not go home this weekend. Where did the gentleman go? I know what the folks are saying in my district about congressional travel.

That is a rhetorical question, of course.

Mr. WOLFF. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BAUMAN. The gentleman was not out of the country, I hope.

Mr. WOLFF. Not at all. The gentleman was parading with the VFW.

If the gentleman will yield further, may I say to the gentleman that unfortunately, because of the fact that many people have not been conversant with the real intent of this legislation, they take it to be a means of proliferating—let me put it that way—these commissions and these exchanges.

Exactly the opposite is the purpose of this organization. There have been any number of individual countries which have asked our country for a bilateral exchange. These things can proliferate at a very high rate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BAUMAN) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BAUMAN was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would say to the gentleman from New York (Mr. WOLFF) that I heard his argument earlier when he said that we are going to spend this $100,000 and thereby spend less.

I am aware of the principle which the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK) enunciated when he said that he has learned in 18 years in Congress that things do not work in private life the same way they work here.

I doubt seriously that we will save any money here by spending more.

I think the most laudable part about section 803 is that it gives the discretion to the chairman of the Committee on International Relations, and I know the chairman would handle these funds very wisely and with a great deal of restraint.

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BAUMAN. If the gentleman from New York wants to add to the compliment, I will yield to him.

Mr. WOLFF. I will add a compliment to the same effect; but I also say to the gentleman, does he oppose foreign travel in general?

Mr. BAUMAN. The gentleman from Maryland does not oppose all foreign travel; but he thinks it could be cut in half, and nobody except Members of Congress would miss it. As a matter of fact, it would save the taxpayers not only money, but many foreign entanglements as well.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to support this farsighted, but apparently unappreciated section of the bill.

I would like to point out to my dear friend, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BAUMAN), that he would be a most welcome addition to any Congressional parliamentary group. I think he would be especially effective when we met with the Russians. He would give them a shock treatment from which they would never recover. I would think we would all benefit from his service.

However, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York (Mr. WOLFF) does make a very vital point. We are constantly being pressured—not just we, the Congress, but our Executive Branch, including the State Department—by requests from foreign countries to have parliamentary exchanges.

There are two reasons for this: One is that they want the prestige of meeting with a committee of the U.S. Congress or with a group of Congressmen. The other is that many legislative bodies, especially in Eastern Europe, parts of Latin America, and of Africa, are really not that busy. They therefore are interested in parliamentary trips. We have to regulate it, and that is the purpose here. One of the practical ways in which to regulate it is to see that the overall jurisdiction of the flow of traffic is maintained by the chairman of the House Committee on International Relations.

Mr. Chairman, we can point to the success stories of the United States-Canadian and United States-Mexican parliamentary meetings, which have gone on year after year in effective educational fashions for both countries. Yet, we cannot control this subject unless it is regulated as dozens of other countries request meetings with us.

Therefore, as we saw this in committee, this would be a means of maintaining proper jurisdiction while permitting a few brief exchanges that will be beneficial to the parliamentarians of other lands and to our members.

Mr. Chairman, let me give just one example. The President of Romania was here some years ago on his first visit. He has since been here a number of times. His first request of the State Department was that they approve an annual exchange of parliamentarians between Romania and the United States.

We do not have that much in common with Romanian parliamentarians to meet with them year after year, and a visit once every 5 years for the purpose of discussions would probably suffice.

That is the kind of traffic patrolling, the kind of overall discretion and discipline, that is envisioned in this section. So, I would hope that our colleagues would not be deluded by the figure of $100,000, which is really a practical vehicle for setting up meetings with parliamentarians who desire them, and whose countries are pressing for them. That would be under the control of the chairman, and it would not interfere with our normal work. In the long run it would be an effective way for Congress to play a role in guiding these international exchanges.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words .

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of this amendment. I probably do it in a little different perspective than my close friend and colleague, the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BAUMAN). I have taken a number of trips. I would not qualify along with Mr. DERWINSKI, the Marco Polo of our side. I imagine that I have averaged out about one foreign trip every 3 years. I think they have been good trips, certainly not junkets.

What a lot of Members worry about is what I would call, "The great Karnak" syndrome. We all have seen Karnak the magician. He always says: "Here is the answer; what is the question?" Many congressional trips are about like the Karnak parody. You want to make the trip so you find the reason. So, we want to know what the question is and how to make this trip necessary. It is basically what we are talking about.

I do not think we are pointing a finger at the Committee on International Relations. I serve on the Committee on Education and Labor and on a number of committees, and I think it is something widespread throughout this entire body. Again, I do not think we are being quite honest with the taxpayers when we talk about committee travel in terms of this $200,000 figure or $100,000 figure. There are dozens of ways of travel.

I have already been offered this year an opportunity to go overseas and to have the expense charged off to two executive departments, not to Congress. We also have counterpart funds. I have been around here for a few years, and I know of no one who has not been able to take a trip they really wanted to take if it were necessary.

There are so many areas where we have money coming out of our ears that is used for travel. I do not think it is asking too much to cut in one small area. If I could be convinced that it was going to cut anything that is absolutely necessary, I would not support this amendment, but I know down deep in my heart, as I am sure almost everyone here knows, that we really do not need that extra $100,000.

I say that as a person who probably will be taking a trip this year, a necessary trip, one which I hope will not be labeled a junket. I believe in travel. I believe we ought to find out everything we can. I have crossed that bridge. The press accuses us of taking junkets. We should not allow ourselves to be browbeaten out of taking a trip in the fear that some journalist is going to accuse us of taking a junket.

So, I talk from a different perspective. I believe in taking necessary trips. I think there has been a great amount of good done, but by the same token, we could hold the line at least by $100,000. I urge every Member to support this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments offered by the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. GLICKMAN).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GLICKMAN) there were—ayes 16, noes 12.

So the amendments were agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. EILBERG

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EILBERG: Page 15, insert after line 18 the following new section:

TRAVEL DOCUMENTATION OF ALIENS AND CITIZENS

SEC. 118. (a) Subsection (a) of section 215 of the Immigration and Nationality Act (8 U.S.C. 1185) is amended by striking out "When the United States" and all that follows through "be unlawful" and inserting in lieu thereof "Unless otherwise ordered by the President, it shall be unlawful".

(b) Subsection (b) of such section is amended to read as follows:

"(b) Except as otherwise provided by the President and subject to such limitations and exceptions as the President may authorize and prescribe, it shall be unlawful for any citizen of the United States to depart from or enter, or attempt to depart from or enter, the United States unless he bears a valid passport.".

(c) Subsection (f) of such section is amended by striking out "proclamation," both places it appears.

(d) Such section is further amended by striking out subsection (c) and redesignating subsections (d), (e), (f), and (g) as subsections (c), (d), (e), and (f), respectively.

(e) The heading of such section is amended to read as follows:

"TRAVEL DOCUMENTATION OF ALIENS AND CITIZENS".

(f) The item relating to section 215 in the Table of Contents of the Immigration and Nationality Act is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 215. Travel documentation of aliens and citizens.".

Mr. EILBERG (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Chairman, I have proposed this amendment which would amend section 215 of the Immigration and Nationality Act to insure that persons will be required to bear a valid travel document, primarily passports, when they either enter into or depart from the United States.

This amendment is necessary at this time because section 215 of the Immigration and Nationality Act now states that whenever the United States is at war or during the existence of any national emergency proclaimed by the President, it is unlawful for citizens to depart from or enter or attempt to depart from or to enter the United States, without proper documentation. Pursuant to the National Emergencies Act, Public Law 94–412, Presidential Proclamation 3004 of January 17, 1953, terminates as of September 14, 1978, and the documentation requirement will lapse.

Although the continuation of the passport requirement for citizens may appear to impede travel, I believe the impediment will occur if the passport requirement is allowed to lapse. Passports permit travel with a minimum of inconvenience because most countries in the world now require travelers to be documented with passports which show both citizenship and identity. Abandoning the passport requirement for U.S. citizens and nationals may result in many cases where travelers arrive at their countries of destination only to discover that they are not allowed entry because they lack the proper documentation.

Alternatively, as the travel industry becomes more aware of the requirements of receiving countries travelers may find themselves unable to board their flights because of improper documentation. Ensuing difficulties would arise with the requirement of attempting to find appropriate documentation on emergency bases. The Department of State has recently completed research into this issue and inquired of our embassies and consulates abroad how the host countries would react to American citizens seeking entry without passports. While they have not yet received answers from all countries they have received answers from 102 countries of the world; 91 of those countries simply would not admit U.S. citizens not in possession of U.S. passports. The 11 countries thus far who would admit them are countries located in the Caribbean and North American areas of the world.

Undocumented U.S. travelers may well encounter delays when they seek assistance from our embassies and consulates abroad. The Department of State cannot provide services to persons who are not our nationals and must exercise care in determining those requests for aid which come from persons who are unable to establish their U.S. nationality.

In cases of disaster, such as the aircraft accident at Tenerife, passport applications provide information on persons to be notified in cases of emergencies. Additionally, thousands of persons lose their passports each year and seek replacements. In cases where there is insufficient evidence to issue replacement passports, overseas posts cable the Department and verify issuance of previous passports. In cases of lost citizens, passport applications can provide information on the probable overseas whereabouts of these citizens.

Similar delays will occur when travelers, citizens and aliens alike, depart from or attempt to enter the United States but have no documents in their possession to substantiate their claims. The delays will result from the needs of our Government to assure itself of the veracity of the travelers' claims to their respective citizenships and identities.

The Department of State has for some years been issuing passports to very large numbers of American citizen travelers. The Department has prided itself in that it has been able to respond to this demand in a facilitative way. Last calendar year over 3 million such citizens were issued passports with a minimum of delay. The Department is even now preparing itself for the increased volume of passport issuance it anticipates in the future. The Department will be opening three new agencies during this calendar year to facilitate travelers.

Thus, we see that the elimination of the passport requirement has the capability of thrusting large numbers of citizens who are traveling abroad into unnecessary difficulties. The difficulties would be enlarged with travelers being refused entry in the country of destination.

Over the last 20 years the passport has become a recognized document to facilitate entry and exit from countries. The International Civil Aviation Organization to which the United States has representatives, has been engaged for some years in attempting to find ways to standardize the size of the passport and the layout of the identity information. These attempts are aimed at meeting the requirements of not only this country but also other countries in ways which do not adversely affect the travel of persons throughout the world, but ease further the burden of exiting and entering other countries.

In my amendment, I am deleting the provisions in the administration's bill for an administrative penalty against persons who violate any provisions of section 215. The thrust of my amendment is to facilitate travel, not to obstruct it and cover it with penal overtones.

Lastly, INS has expressed concern that its travel control over aliens departing the United States also lapses on September 14 if section 215 is not amended. Section 215(a) presently states it is unlawful for any aliens to depart from or enter or attempt to enter the United States except under such reasonable rules, regulations, and orders the President may prescribe if the United States is at war, or a national emergency exists as proclaimed by the President, or there exists a state of war between or among two or more states. The proposed amendment to section 215(a) will continue to allow the President to prescribe rules, regulations, and orders dealing with the entry and departure of aliens.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EILBERG. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI).

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment which is being offered by our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. EILBERG). It is similar to an Executive request which has been co-referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and the Committee on International Relations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(On request of Mr. ZABLOCKI, and by unanimous consent, Mr. EILBERG was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield still further, as I was saying, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. EILBERG) is similar to an Executive request which has been co-referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and the Committee on International Relations, and it would prevent a serious problem from occurring after September 14 when the President's emergency authority to issue passports expires. I certainly agree that further impediments to travel would result if the passport requirement is allowed to lapse. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I commend my colleague from Pennsylvania for offering this amendment and urge its approval.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EILBERG. I yield to the gentleman from New York (Mr. FISH).

Mr. FISH. Mr. Chairman, I would like to record my support to the amendment which my colleague from Pennsylvania has introduced. This country should not, in modern times, be without a statutory base for a U.S. passport. This amendment is thus a "tidying up" of earlier emergency proclamations which have been permitted to last too long and are now about to lapse.

During the years of the current emergency proclamation, we have seen the passport grow from a document and a concept viewed by many as a hindrance of international exchange and travel to a document of today where it has become an important ingredient to facilitate our citizens in their pursuit of international travel. Nearly all of the countries in today's world require foreign visitors to their shores be in possession of passports proclaiming the identity and nationality of individual travelers. In this era of travel in numbers never before visualized, the simple act of separating passengers at a port of entry becomes a complex and difficult task. And this sorting by nationality is a never ceasing problem for the international traveler.

The country being visited establishes different queues for nationals than for visitors. Good identification is also necessary to confirm a registration at a hotel; a traveler needing help or assistance from his government can produce his passport as the best evidence that he is a national of the country and entitled to help. Many countries have a visa requirement for foreign travelers. All of these problems, and there are many others, are solved most easily and efficiently by the one simple document: the passport.

It, therefore, seems to me that this amendment provides the means for continuing to facilitate U.S. citizen travellers with the service they have come to expect over recent years and are entitled to expect in the future.

Mr. Chairman, the Department of State, which issues passports, is equipped to continue this service in its 11 passport agencies around the country. The number will grow to 14 during this year. The Department has also organized clerks of Federal and State courts and postal clerks throughout the country to provide neighborhood points to accept passport applications. They process these passport applications with dispatch and reliability.

Were this amendment not passed, what then? The Department of State would continue to issue passports only to those who sought them, while the citizen who did not seek the passport could be inhibited in his travel at the airline counter, or worse, in the country of destination. The broad confusion for the citizen, the travel industry, and the Government should be too much to accept.

This amendment makes it possible to continue to process, in an orderly fashion, passports for all of our citizens who need or desire to travel. By so doing, we insure maximum ease in meeting the various formalities of the countries they choose to visit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. EILBERG) has expired.

(On request of Mr. BUCHANAN, and by unanimous consent, Mr. EILBERG was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EILBERG. I will be happy to yield to the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. BUCHANAN).

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I, too, concur with my distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI) and with the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. EILBERG) in the merit of his amendment.

Mr. Chairman, so far as this side is concerned, we fully support the amendment.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EILBERG. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK).

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I also commend the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. EILBERG) on offering his amendment. I am very pleased that my colleague on the Committee on the Judiciary has brought this matter forward. We would admit that this is coming forward at a late hour and that it probably should have been voted on its own but we sometimes find that when some circumstances happen because of the time lapse that it is necessary to take the best vehicle we can and use it. I think that is exactly what my colleague the gentleman from Pennsylvania has done. I think that the best interests of our country will be well served by the approval of this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. EILBERG).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BAUMAN

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BAUMAN: On page 4, strike out line 22 and all that follows through line 4 on page 5.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment simply strikes the language dealing with the so-called whiskey fund for the International Joint Commission. As we know, a great many departments, agencies, committees, and commissions have an entertainment fund. At some past point the Congress of the United States felt that the International Joint Commission between the United States and Canada should operate, for its entertainment purposes, on a budget of $1,500 a year.

Now, this is not meant in any way as an indictment of the current members and the Chairman of that Commission. As I recall, there is only one Chairman and two other commissioners. If you divide the $1,500 up three ways that comes out to $500 worth of entertaining a year each. I should think that they could get along with that amount.

I do not know how many times they have to go back and forth to Ottawa for their Canadian meetings but I am quite sure that their travel expense is exclusive of this amount. I do not believe the Commission ought to spend an unlimited amount of entertainment funds, and, even though the committee report says that the committee expects funds for representation purposes to be used with discretion and anticipates that controls on these costs will be retained is the annual appropriation for the Commission, I do think it would be the better part of valor for us to retain the present limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BAUMAN).

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments to title I? If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE II—INTERNATIONAL COMMUNICATION AGENCY

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR FISCAL YEAR 1979

SEC. 201. (a) There is authorized to be appropriated for the International Communication Agency for fiscal year 1979, to carry out international communication, educational, cultural, and exchange programs under the United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948, the Mutual Educational and Cultural Exchange Act of 1961, and Reorganization Plan Numbered 2 of 1977, and other purposes authorized by law, $417,327,000, and such additional amounts as may be necessary for increases in salary, pay, retirement, and other employee benefits authorized by law, and for other nondiscretionary costs.

(b) Amounts appropriated under this section are authorized to remain available until expended.

FUNCTIONS RELATING TO THE NATIONAL GALLERY OF ART

SEC. 202. The Secretary of State may delegate to the Director of the International Communication Agency, with the consent of the Director, the functions vested in the Secretary by section 2(a) of the joint resolution entitled "Joint Resolution providing for the construction and maintenance of a National Gallery of Art", approved March 24, 1937 (20 U.S.C. 72(a)).

FUNCTIONS RELATING TO THE WOODROW WILSON INTERNATIONAL CENTER FOR SCHOLARS

SEC. 203. (a) Subsection (b) of section 3 of the Woodrow Wilson Memorial Act of 1968 (20 U.S.C. 80f(b)) is amended—

(1) in the text preceding paragraph (1) by striking out "fifteen" and inserting in lieu thereof "sixteen";

(2) by redesignating paragraphs (2) through (8) as paragraphs (3) through (9), respectively; and

(3) by striking out paragraph (1) and inserting in lieu thereof the following new paragraphs:

"(1) the Secretary of State;

"(2) the Director of the International Communication Agency;".

(b)(1) Subsection (c) of that section (20 U.S.C. 80f(c)) is amended by striking out "(7)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(8)".

(2) Subsection (d) of that section (20 U.S.C. 80f(d)) is amended by striking out "(8)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(9)".

TECHNICAL AND CLARIFYING AMENDMENTS ON PERSONNEL AND OTHER MATTERS

SEC. 204. (a) Section 104(e)(1) of the Mutual Educational and Cultural Exchange Act of 1961 (22 U.S.C. 2454(e)(1)) is amended by striking out "President" and inserting in lieu thereof "Director of the International Communication Agency".

(b)(1) The Act entitled "An Act to promote the foreign policy of the United States by strengthening and improving the Foreign Service personnel system of the United States Information Agency through establishment of a Foreign Service Information Officer Corps", approved August 20, 1968, is amended in the first section, section 2, and section 12 (2 U.S.C. 1221, 1222, and 1232) by striking out "United States Information" and inserting in lieu thereof "International Communication".

(2) Section 4 of that Act (2 U.S.C. 1224) is amended to read as follows:

"AUTHORITY OF THE DIRECTOR

"SEC. 4. Foreign Service information officers, Foreign Service Reserve officers, Foreign Service staff officers and employees, and alien clerks and employees of the Agency shall be under the direction and authority of the Director. Authority available to the Secretary of State with respect to Foreign Service officers, Foreign Service Reserve officers, Foreign Service staff officers and employees, or alien clerks and employees of the Department of State shall be available on the same basis to the Director with respect to Foreign Service information officers, Foreign Service Reserve officers, Foreign Service staff officers and employees, and alien clerks and employees of the Agency, except as provided in section 11 of this Act.".

(3) Section 10 of that Act (22 U.S.C. 1230) is amended to read as follows:

"OTHER APPLICABLE PROVISIONS OF LAW

"SEC. 10. All other provisions of the Foreign Service Act of 1946 or of any other law, which apply to Foreign Service officers, Foreign Service Reserve officers, Foreign Service staff officers and employees, or alien clerks and employees of the Department of State and which are not referred to in sections 6 through 9 of this Act, shall be applicable to Foreign Service information officers, Foreign Service Reserve officers, Foreign Service staff officers and employees, or alien clerks and employees, as the case may be, of the Agency.".

(4) Section 11 of that Act (22 U.S.C. 1231) is amended to read as follows:

"COMMISSIONING AND ASSIGNMENT AS DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR OFFICERS

"SEC. 11. (a) The Secretary of State may, upon request of the Director, recommend to the President that Foreign Service information officers or Foreign Service Reserve officers of the Agency be commissioned as diplomatic or consular officers, or both, in accordance with section 512 or 524 of the Foreign Service Act of 1946.

"(b) The Secretary of State may, upon request of the Director, assign Foreign Service information officers or Foreign Service Reserve officers of the Agency, commissioned as diplomatic or consular officers, to serve under such commissions in accordance with sections 512 and 514 or section 524 of the Foreign Service Act of 1946.".

(5) The title of the Act of August 20, 1968, is amended to read as follows: "An Act to promote the foreign policy of the United States by strengthening and improving the Foreign Service personnel system of the International Communication Agency through establishment of a Foreign Service Information Officer Corps."

(6) Paragraph (3) of section 522 of the Foreign Service Act of 1946 (22 U.S.C. 922(3)) is amended by striking out "United States Information" and inserting in lieu thereof "International Communication".

(7) Section 803(a)(4) of that Act (22 U.S.C. 1063(a)(4)) is amended by striking "United States Information" and inserting in lieu thereof "International Communication".

(c) Paragraph (10) of section 6 of the Japan-United States Friendship Act (22 U.S.C. 2905(10)) is amended by inserting "from the Director of the International Communication Agency, on a reimbursable basis," immediately after "obtain".

(a) Title VIII of the United States Information and Educational Exchange Act of 1948 (22 U.S.C. 1471–1475a) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SEAL OF THE AGENCY

"SEC. 807. The seal of the International Communication Agency shall be the arms and crest of the United States, encircled by the words 'International Communication Agency'. Judicial notice shall be taken of the seal.".

Mr. ZABLOCKI (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that title II be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there amendments to title II? If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In order to facilitate their transition from the Foreign Service, the Secretary may provide professional career counseling, advice, and placement assistance, by contract or otherwise (subject to the availability of appropriations), to officers and employees of the Service, other than those separated for cause.".

ORIENTATION AND LANGUAGE TRAINING FOR FAMILY MEMBERS

SEC. 406. (a)(1) Title VII of the Foreign Service Act of 1946 (22 U.S.C. 1041–1047) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"ORIENTATION AND LANGUAGE TRAINING FOR FAMILY MEMBERS

"SEC. 708. To facilitate orientation and language training provided to members of families of officers and employees of the Government under the second sentence of section 701, the Secretary may make grants to family members attending language and orientation programs of study of the Institute. No grant may exceed the amount actually expended for necessary costs incurred in conjunction with such attendance, and in no event may any grant exceed $300 per month per individual. No individual may receive such a grant for more than six months in connection with any one assignment.".

(2) The amendment made by paragraph (1) of this subsection shall take effect on October 1, 1978.

(b) Not later than January 1, 1980, the Secretary of State shall report to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate on the grant program authorized by the amendment made by this section. The Secretary shall include in this report a recommendation with regard to whether that program should remain in effect, be modified, or terminated.

SPECIAL COMPUTATION OF ANNUITIES

SEC. 406. Notwithstanding the first sentence of section 821(a) of the Foreign Service Act of 1946 (22 U.S.C. 1076(a)), the annuity for any participant in the Foreign Service Retirement and Disability System whose salary was or is limited by the provisions of section 5308 of title 5, United States Code, and who retires during the period beginning October 1, 1978, and ending December 31, 1979, shall be equal to 2 per centum of his or her basic salary for the highest year of service for which contributions have been made to the Foreign Service Retirement and Disability Fund multiplied by the number of years, not exceeding thirty-five, of service credit obtained in accordance with the provisions of sections 851 and 853 of the Foreign Service Act of 1946 (22 U.S.C. 1091 and 1093).

SPECIAL ALLOWANCES

SEC. 408. (a) Part A of title IX of the Foreign Service Act of 1946 (22 U.S.C. 1131) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"SPECIAL ALLOWANCES

"SEC. 902. If he finds it to be in the best interests of the Service, the Secretary may, under such conditions as he may determine, pay special allowances, in addition to compensation otherwise authorized, to Foreign Service officers who are required because of the nature of their assignments to perform additional work on a regular basis in substantial excess of normal requirements.".

(b) The amendment made by this section shall take effect on October 1, 1978.

PER DIEM AND SUBSISTENCE ALLOWANCES

SEC. 409. (a) Section 911 of the Foreign Service Act of 1946 (22 U.S.C. 1136) is amended—

(b) The amendments made by this section shall take effect on October 1, 1978.

RESPONSIBILITIES OF A CHIEF OF MISSION

SEC. 410. Section 16 of the Act entitled "An Act to provide certain basic authority for the Department of State", approved August 1, 1956 (22 U.S.C. 2680a), is amended—

(1) in paragraph (1) by striking out "Ambassador to" and inserting in lieu thereof "chief of mission (as defined in section 121(9) of the Foreign Service Act of 1946) in";

(2) in paragraph (2) by striking out "Ambassador" and inserting in lieu thereof "chief of mission"; and

(3) in paragraph (3)—

(A) by striking out "Ambassador to" and inserting in lieu thereof "chief of mission in"; and

(B) by striking out "the Ambassador" and inserting in lieu thereof "the chief of mission".

DETAILED STATE DEPARTMENT PERSONNEL

SEC. 411. Section 11(a) of the Department of State Appropriations Authorization Act of 1973 (22 U.S.C. 2685 (a)) is amended—

(1) by striking out "ninety days" and inserting in lieu thereof "one year"; and

(2) by adding at the end thereof the following new sentence: "Officers and employees of the Department of State who are detailed, assigned, or otherwise made available to another Executive agency for a period of not to exceed one year shall not be counted toward any personnel ceiling for the Department of State established by the Director of the Office of Management and Budget.".

COMPENSATORY TIME OFF AT POSTS IN FOREIGN AREAS

SEC. 412. (a) Subchapter III of chapter 59 of title 5, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 5926. Compensatory time off at certain posts in foreign areas

"(a) Under regulations prescribed pursuant to this subchapter, and notwithstanding subchapter V of chapter 55 of this title or any other law, the head of a Government agency may, on request of an employee serving in a foreign area—

"(1) at an isolated post performing functions required to be maintained on a substantially continuous basis, grant the employee compensatory time off for an equal amount of time spent in regularly scheduled overtime work; or

"(2) at a post in a locality that customarily observes irregular hours of work, or where other special conditions are present, in order to cope with those special circumstances, grant the employee compensatory time off for an equal amount of time spent in regularly scheduled overtime work for use during the pay period in which it is earned.

Credit for compensatory time off earned under paragraph (2) shall not form the basis for any additional compensation.

"(b) Compensatory time earned under this section shall be for use only while the employee is assigned to the post where it is earned. Any such compensatory time not used at the time the employee is reassigned to another post shall be forfeited.".

(b) The section analysis for such chapter is amended by inserting the following new item immediately after the item relating to section 5925:

"5926. Compensatory time off at certain posts in foreign areas.".

PREMIUM PAY

SEC. 413. Section 412 of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, Fiscal Year 1978, is repealed.

Mr. ZABLOCKI (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that title IV be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there amendments to title IV?

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

I do so, Mr. Chairman, to address a question to the members of the committee or the chairman. On page 30, section 411, it appears to me that we are creating a loophole which would abrogate the personnel ceilings imposed upon the Department of State by allowing not counting employees who are detailed to other departments. I wonder if someone could explain to me the necessity for this provision and why we should not retain as part of the overall personnel ceilings those who may be detailed to the White House or to some other agency. It seems to me that that would be the practical way to do it and at the same time keep the number of employees from increasing. This could be used obviously as a device to increase greatly not only employees of the Department of State but of other agencies as well.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAUMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

As I indicated in my earlier remarks, while our representation has expanded from a representation in 80 to 130 countries, the Department of State really has not expanded with it. The idea of this is to expand the function of detailing Department of State personnel in order that this program may be expanded. Let me point up some values of this. The Department of State is, if anything, short on people, but it has some very talented people who, because of certain problems within the personnel system have difficulty with promotion because of other people logjammed into this system who are senior personnel. This is one of the kinds of opportunities that we give for experience that is of value to Department of State personnel who are bright, and it also permits them to serve our country in different ways. It has proven an effective program where it has been used, and it seems hardly fair for Department of State personnel in service to other entities to be counted against the Department of State's own ceiling when State is so limited as to personnel already. Quite frankly, they are thinly spread.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, could the gentleman give us any idea at the present time or during the last fiscal year how many State Department personnel have been detailed to other agencies? Are we talking about many thousands of employees?

Mr. BUCHANAN. No. The number has been quite small. We are hoping to expand that number because it is of value. These people are representing our country in foreign countries and the more they know firsthand about the operation of our Government, the better it is in terms of representation and they have proven their value in a variety of areas. Although this program has been quite small and it could be profitably expanded, we are talking about a limited number of people.

Mr. BAUMAN. Several hundred at the most?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Less than several hundred.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for this explanation. I hope the committee next year, presuming the Members are reelected and the gentleman from Maryland is reelected, gives us some idea whether this provision has, indeed, worked.

Mr. BUCHANAN. We will be glad to report back to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments to title IV? If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE V—SCIENCE, TECHNOLOGY, AND AMERICAN DIPLOMACY

FINDINGS

SEC. 501. The Congress finds that—

(1) the consequences of modern scientific and technological advances are of such major significance in United States foreign policy that understanding and appropriate knowledge of modern science and technology by United States officers and employees are essential in the conduct of modern diplomacy;

(2) many problems and opportunities for development in modern diplomacy lie in scientific and technological fields;

(3) the United States Government should seek out and consult with both public and private industrial, academic, and research institutions concerned with modern technology in the formulation, implementation, and evaluation of the technological aspects of United States foreign policy; and

(4) the effective use of science and technology in international relations for the mutual benefit of all nations requires the development and use of the skills and methods of long-range planning.

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 502. In order to maximize the benefits and to minimize the adverse consequences of science and technology in the conduct of foreign policy, the Congress declares the following to be the policy of the United States:

(1) Technological opportunities, impacts, changes, and threats should be anticipated and assessed, and appropriate measures should be implemented to influence such technological developments in ways beneficial to the United States and other nations of the world.

(2) The mutually beneficial applications of technology in bilateral and multilateral agreements and activities involving the United States and foreign countries or international organizations should be recognized and supported as an important element of United States foreign policy.

(3) The United States Government should implement appropriate measures to insure that individuals are trained in the use of science and technology as an instrument in international relations and that officers and employees of the United States Government engaged in formal and informal exchanges of scientific and technical information, personnel, and hardware are knowledgeable in international affairs.

(4) In recognition of the environmental and technological factors that change relations among the countries of the world, and in further recognition of the growing interdependence between domestic and foreign policies and programs of the United States, United States foreign policy should be continually reviewed by the executive and legislative branches of the Federal Government to insure appropriate and timely application of science and technology to the conduct of United States foreign policy.

RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE PRESIDENT

SEC. 503. (a) The President, through the Secretary of State and in consultation with the Director of the Office of Science and Technology Policy and other officials whom the President considers appropriate, shall—

(1) notwithstanding any other provision of law, insure that the Secretary of State is fully informed and consulted before any agency of the United States takes any initiative involving science or technology with respect to any foreign government or international organization;

(2) identify and evaluate elements of domestic science and technology programs and activities of the United States with significant international implications;

(3) identify and evaluate international scientific or technological developments with significant implications for domestic programs and activities of the United States Government; and

(4) assess and initiate appropriate international scientific and technological activities which are based upon domestic scientific and technological activities of the United States Government and which are beneficial to the United States and foreign countries.

(b) The President, through the Secretary of State, shall study and not later than January 31, 1980, and not later than January 31 of each year thereafter, shall submit to the Congress an annual report containing recommendations with respect to—

(1) personnel requirements, and standards and training for service of Federal officers and employees, with respect to assignments in any agency which involve foreign relations and science or technology; and

(2) the continuation of existing bilateral and multilateral activities and agreements involving science and technology, including (A) an analysis of the foreign policy implications and the scientific and technological benefits of such activities or agreements for the United States and other parties, (B) the adequacy of the funding for and administration of such activities and agreements, and (C) plans for future evaluation of such activities and agreements on a routine basis.

(c) Except as otherwise provided by law, nothing in this section shall be construed as requiring the public disclosure of sensitive information relating to intelligence sources or methods or to persons engaged in monitoring scientific or technological developments for intelligence purposes.

RESPONSIBILITIES OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

SEC. 504. (a) In order to implement the policy set forth in section 502 of this title, the Secretary of State (hereafter in this title referred to as the "Secretary") shall have primary responsibility for coordination and oversight with respect to all science or science and technology agreements and activities between the United States and foreign countries, international organizations, or commissions of which the United States and one or more foreign countries are members.

(b) The Secretary shall, to such extent or in such amounts as are provided in appropriations Acts, enter into long-term contracts, including contracts for the services of consultants, and shall make grants and take other appropriate measures in order to obtain studies, analyses, and recommendations from knowledgeable persons and organizations with respect to the application of science or technology to problems of foreign policy.

(c) The Secretary shall, to such extent or in such amounts as are provided in appropriation Acts, enter into short-term and long-term contracts, including contracts for the services of consultants, and shall make grants and take other appropriate measures in order to obtain assistance from knowledgeable persons and organizations in training Federal officers and employees at all levels of the Foreign Service and Civil Service—

(1) in the application of science and technology to problems of United States foreign policy and international relations generally; and

(2) in the skills of long-range planning and analysis with respect to the scientific and technological aspects of United States foreign policy.

(d) In obtaining assistance pursuant to subsection (c) in training personnel who are officers or employees of the Department of State, the Secretary may provide for detached service for graduate study at accredited colleges and universities.

(e) Not later than January 20, 1979, the Secretary shall furnish to the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on International Relations of the House of Representatives, and to the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, a report on the implementation of the responsibilities of the Secretary under this title. Such report shall include the following information: an assessment of the personnel required in order to carry out such responsibilities; existing and planned programs for research and analysis to support long-range planning for the application of science and technology to foreign policy; existing and planned programs for training officers and employees of the United States Government; and existing and planned programs to enter into long-term contracts with academic and other organizations for assistance in training and in obtaining studies, analyses, and recommendations with respect to the application of science or technology to problems of foreign policy.

EARMARKING OF FUNDS

SEC. 505. In addition to amounts otherwise available for such purposes, $4,071,000 of the amount authorized to be appropriated by section 101(a)(1) of this Act shall be available only to carry out the purposes of this title.

Mr. ZABLOCKI (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that title V be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there amendments to title V? If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE VI—COMMISSION ON PROPOSALS FOR A CENTER FOR CONFLICT RESOLUTION

FINDINGS

SEC. 601. The Congress finds that—

(1) many conflicts are largely the result of misunderstanding, suspicion, and inadequate communication among the parties to the conflict;

(2) many potentially destructive conflicts at the local, national, and international level have been resolved through the use of impartial mediation by third parties;

(3) the field of conflict resolution has become a respected and significant discipline with the social sciences in recent years; and

(4) the techniques of conflict resolution are teachable and usable.

ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION

SEC. 602. There is established a commission to be known as the Commission on Proposals for a Center for Conflict Resolution (hereafter in this title referred to as the "Commission").

DUTIES OF COMMISSION

SEC. 603. (a) The Commission shall undertake a study to consider—

(1) whether to establish a Center for Conflict Resolution;

(2) alternative proposals, which may or may not include the establishment of such a Center, to assist the Federal Government in accomplishing the goal of promoting peaceful resolution of disputes;

(3) the size, cost, and location of such a Center;

(4) the effects which the establishment of such a Center would have on existing institutions;

(5) the relationship which would exist between such a Center and existing Federal agencies;

(6) the feasibility of making grants and providing other forms of assistance to existing institutions in lieu of, or in addition to, establishing such a Center; and

(7) the application of the behaviorial sciences to the peaceful resolution of disputes.

(b) In conducting the study required by subsection (a), the Commission shall—

(1) review the theory and techniques of peaceful resolution of conflict in and among nations; and

(2) study existing institutions which assist in resolving conflict.

MEMBERSHIP

SEC. 604. (a) The Commission shall be composed of nine members appointed by the President.

(b) Members shall be appointed for the life of the Commission.

(c) In appointing the members of the Commission, the President shall give priority to individuals with a demonstrated concern for the peaceful resolution of disputes.

(d)(1) Except as provided in paragraph (2), members of the Commission shall each receive compensation at a rate not to exceed the daily equivalent of the annual rate of basic pay in effect for grade GS–18 of the General Schedule (5 U.S.C. 5332) for each day during which they are engaged in the actual performance of the duties of the Commission.

(2) Members of the Commission who are full-time officers or employees of the Federal Government (including Members of Congress) shall receive no additional pay on account of their service on the Commission.

(3) While away from their homes or regular places of business in the performance of services for the Commission members of the Commission shall be allowed travel expenses, including a per diem in lieu of subsistence, in the same manner as persons employed intermittently in the Government service are allowed expenses under section 5703 of title 5, United States Code.

(e) The Commission shall elect a Chairman and a Vice Chairman from among its members.

(f) Five members of the Commission shall constitute a quorum.

(g) The Commission shall meet at the call of the Chairman or a majority of its members.

DIRECTOR AND STAFF; EXPERTS AND CONSULTANTS

SEC. 605. (a) Subject to such rules as may be adopted by the Commission, the Chairman may, without regard to the provisions of title 5, United States Code, which govern appointments in the competitive service and without regard to the provisions of chapter 51 and subchapter III of chapter 53 of such title, relating to classifications and General Schedule pay rates—

(1) appoint a Director who shall be paid at a rate not to exceed the rate of basic pay in effect for grade GS–18 of the General Schedule (5 U.S.C. 5332);

(2) appoint and fix the compensation of such staff personnel as the Chairman considers necessary; and

(3) procure temporary and intermittent services of experts and consultants to the same extent as is authorized by section 3109 (b) of title 5, United States Code.

(b) Upon request of the Commission, the head of any Federal agency is authorized to detail, on a reimbursable basis, any of the personnel of such agency to the Commission to assist it in carrying out its duties under this title.

POWERS OF COMMISSION

SEC. 606. (a) The Commission may for the purpose of carrying out this title hold such hearings, sit and act at such times and places, take such testimony, and receive such evidence as the Commission considers advisable. The Commission may administer oaths and affirmations to witnesses appearing before the Commission.

(b) When so authorized by the Commission, any member or agent of the Commission may take any action which the Commission is authorized to take by this section.

(c) The Commission may secure directly from any Federal agency information necessary to enable it to carry out this title.

REPORTS

SEC. 607. The Commission shall transmit to the President and to the Congress such interim reports as it considers appropriate and shall transmit a final report to the President and to the Congress not later than one year after the date on which appropriations first become available to carry out this title. The final report shall contain a detailed statement of the findings and conclusions of the Commission, together with its recommendations for such legislation as it considers appropriate.

TERMINATION

SEC. 608. The Commission shall cease to exist sixty days after transmitting its final report pursuant to section 607.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 609. There is authorized to be appropriated $500,000 for fiscal year 1979 to carry out this title. Amounts appropriated under this section are authorized to remain available until expended.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 610. This title shall take effect on October 1, 1978.

Mr. ZABLOCKI (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that title VI be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. ASHBROOK

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ASHBROOK: On page 39, beginning on line 15, strike out all of title VI, and redesignate the succeeding titles accordingly.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, this is a nice, clean amendment. It is very easy to understand. I do not think in any way it is going to hurt this bill. What my amendment will do is simply strike out the entire title. We are not going to clean it up. We are not going to change it. We are not going to put any modifications on it that might make its administration difficult.

Let us take an honest look at what this particular title says. In the first place, we are going to set up a commission doing essentially things that should be going on in the State Department right now. Why in the world we need a "Commission on Proposals for a Center for Conflict Resolution" and the very first thing they are charged with doing is to come back and decide whether or not to establish a Center for Conflict Resolution. I would not want to put any odds on that. I would be willing to bet about 10 to 1 that they would come back and say, yes, we do need a Center for Conflict Resolution.

Conflict resolution, is that not a nice catchy title?

Mr. Chairman, I would call attention to the fact that as recently as 1 or 2 weeks ago this House in its wisdom voted down a brand new proposal at the Office of HEW which would supposedly resolve domestic conflict, domestic violence. Are we ever going to stop, or are we just going to add one commission after another, one commission on top of another?

Basically, the State Department is working in this area right now if it is doing its job.

Supposedly, that is a part of our foreign policy, to try to resolve conflicts. Why in the world do we need the establishment of a commission with a director and with nine members appointed by the President to make a report and to come back with proposals?

Just think of the size and the cost of locating such a center. Just think of it. We are going to have a center for conflict resolutions sooner or later if the recommendations of this commission are carried out.

Somewhere, sometime, someplace, we have to say, "Enough." To my way of thinking, section 6 is one of those places where the Congress can say, "Enough."

Mr. Chairman, I urge the Members to support this amendment. As I say, it is a nice, clean amendment. It just completely strikes section 6 from the bill.

Mrs. MEYNER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, title VI is important for us to understand. It establishes a 1-year, nine-member commission to get an independent examination of what the Federal Government should do, and should not do, to assist with the peaceful resolution of conflicts. It is very similar to legislation adopted by the Senate last June as S. 469.

The development of teachable and usable methods of resolving conflicts has been a quiet but exciting development in recent years. It is currently being applied with great success to community conflicts, international, disputes, labor-management negotiations, environmental disputes, terrorists incidents, and consumer complaints.

The Hanafi incidents in Washington last year were resolved under the guidance of conflict resolution experts. Trained private mediators are assisting, anonymously, right now, in the Mideast peace process.

A lot of conflict resolution is being done by the private sector, through organizations like the American Arbitration Association and the International Peace Academy. This study will help us to ascertain where the Federal Government should stay out.

But the Government is already involved in conflict resolution through the Community Relations Service, the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, and other agencies. The President and the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court have called for more mediation and arbitration as alternatives to litigation. Legislation is pending before the Senate to use dispute resolution centers for consumer complaints. Before this gets much further, let us get an independent study of the whole issue. Let us see where the Federal Government can help—with training of mediators, public education, research coordination—and where the Federal Government should stay away.

Mr. Chairman, we pay an exorbitant price in money and human suffering when conflicts result needlessly in violence and destruction. We cynically assume that we must pay these costs. We do not. Many conflicts can be avoided. The payoffs from this study could be enormous. I think we should find out.

Mr. Chairman, this language simply establishes a nine-member, 1-year commission that self-destructs, and its purpose is to see if we should have a center for conflict resolution at all. I think it is well worth trying.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. MEYNER. I am delighted to yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that the chairman of this subcommittee, in a previous subcommittee responsibility, held some 20 hearings on the applicability of the behavioral sciences to foreign policy. There may be some hope in this area.

This is a modification of earlier proposals. It is a compromise proposal in which we are going to take a look to see whether this could be of value.

Mr. Chairman, I would hope that the language would be retained in the bill.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. MEYNER. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentlewoman from New Jersey (Mrs. MEYNER) twice referred to the fact that the commission ends in 1 year. However, in section 608 the termination date is given as 60 days after the final report has been issued. That does not add up to 1 year.

Mrs. MEYNER. It would effectively end 1 year after the President appoints the nine-member commission and it is funded. An additional 60 days are provided to wind down the Commission's operations, but since their final report would have been transmitted, the Commission would be doing no substantive work during that 60-day period.

Mr. BAUMAN. Where in the act does it say that?

Mrs. MEYNER. The language is in sections 607 and 608.

Mr. BAUMAN. The only point I am making to the gentlewoman is that if the Congress wished to continue appropriating money, the Commission would go on forever.

Mrs. MEYNER. Section 607 makes certain that that would not happen by providing that the final report is to be transmitted not later than 1 year after appropriations first become available. This precludes a second appropriation. I as a Member also vow that if the Commission concludes that we do not need a center like this, I would make certain that it self-destructs.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentlewoman will yield further, why, then, must we have in section 605 a waiver of the civil service laws and requirements for competitive examinations, and so on, as it applies to the staff of the Commission? Why should not they be subject to the same civil service requirements as every other agency?

Mrs. MEYNER. Mr. Chairman, this is a temporary commission with only 1 year's duration and the members would have a right to call on their own staff.

I should also point out to the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BAUMAN) and the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK) that this is the standard approach taken for this kind of a commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ASHBROOK) there were—ayes 13, noes 13.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote, and pending that, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Chair announces that pursuant to clause 2, rule XXIII, he will vacate proceedings under the call when a quorum of the committee appears.

Members will record their presence by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum of the Committee of the Whole has not appeared.

The Chair announces that a regular quorum will now commence.

Members who have not already responded under the noticed quorum call will have a minimum of 15 minutes to record their presence. The call will be taken by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device, and the following Members failed to respond:

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. SHARP) having assumed the chair, Mr. LEVITAS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill, H.R. 12598, and finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the Members to record their presence by electronic device, whereupon 342 Members recorded their presence, a quorum, and he submitted herewith the names of the absentees to be spread upon the Journal.

The Committee resumed its sitting.

RECORDED VOTE

The CHAIRMAN. The pending business is the demand by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK) for a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 237, noes 135, not voting 62, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE VII—INSTITUTE FOR INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS

SHORT TITLE

SEC. 701. This title may be cited as the "Institute for International Human Rights Act".

STATEMENT OF PURPOSE

SEC. 702. It is the purpose of this title to establish, as a manifestation of the commitment of the United States to human rights and fundamental freedoms, an independent institute which will openly carry out programs to promote universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

ESTABLISHMENT OF INSTITUTE

SEC. 703. There is created as an independent agency of the United States a body corporate to be known as the Institute for International Human Rights (hereafter in this title referred to as the "Institute").

FUNCTIONS OF THE INSTITUTE

SEC. 704. (a) In order to promote universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms, the Institute is authorized to—

(1) provide assistance, primarily to nongovernmental organizations and individuals, for programs that promote respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms;

(2) sponsor, conduct, and provide assistance for conferences, seminars, and other meetings on human rights and fundamental freedoms;

(3) provide assistance for the publication and dissemination of books and other written materials, and for the display or other presentations of artistic works, which have been suppressed;

(4) provide assistance for research, fellowships, internships, and studies on human rights and fundamental freedoms;

(5) provide assistance to nongovernmental organizations which support victims (and the families of victims) of persecution;

(6) provide assistance for nongovernmental organizations that furnish assistance for the legal defense of human rights and fundamental freedoms; and

(7) carry out other programs which the Institute determines will promote universal respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

(b)(1) The Institute may only carry out or provide assistance for programs and activities relating to human rights and fundamental freedoms in foreign countries, including, where appropriate, regional or worldwide programs designed to promote international respect for and observance of human rights and fundamental freedoms.

(2) The Institute may only carry out or provide assistance for programs and activities which are consistent with the United Nations Charter and other international obligations of the United States.

(3) Financial and other assistance authorized by this title shall be provided openly.

(c) Financial assistance under this title may be provided in the form of grants or loans on such terms and conditions as the Institute may determine.

PUBLIC INFORMATION

SEC. 705. In addition to complying with the requirements of section 552 (relating to public information) and section 552b (relating to open meetings) of title 5 of the United States Code, the Institute shall, on an annual basis, make available to the public and to interested persons a statement with regard to each decision of the Institute during the preceding year to provide financial or other assistance under this title.

MANAGEMENT OF THE INSTITUTE

SEC. 706. (a) The management of the Institute shall be vested in a board of directors (hereafter in this title referred to as the "Board") which shall direct the exercise of all the powers of the Institute.

(b)(1) The Board shall be composed of seven members (hereafter in this title referred to as "directors") appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, from among individuals who have a demonstrated concern for human rights and fundamental freedoms. No officer or employee of the Federal Government may be appointed as a director.

(2) One director shall be designated by the President to serve as Chairman of the Board and one director shall be designated by the President to serve as Vice Chairman of the Board.

(3) Directors shall be appointed for terms of six years, except that of the directors first appointed two shall be appointed for a term of two years and two shall be appointed for a term of four years, as designated by the President at the time of their appointment. A director appointed to fill a vacancy occurring prior to the expiration of the term for which his or her predecessor was appointed shall be appointed only for the remainder of such term. Upon the expiration of his or her term of office, a director shall continue to serve until a successor is appointed and has qualified. Directors shall be eligible for reappointment.

(c) Directors shall receive not to exceed the daily equivalent of the annual rate of basic pay in effect for level IV of the Executive Schedule (5 U.S.C. 5315) for each day, including traveltime, during which they are engaged in the actual performance of their duties as directors and shall be reimbursed for actual and necessary expenses (including transportation expenses) incurred while engaged in the actual performance of those duties.

(d) The Board may prescribe, amend, and repeal bylaws, rules, and regulations governing the manner in which the activities of the Institute may be carried out and in which the powers granted to it by this title may be exercised and enjoyed.

(e) A majority of the directors shall constitute a quorum for purposes of conducting business.

(f) The Board may appoint such committees as it finds to be in the best interests of the Institute, each such committee to consist of at least two directors. Such committees, together with officers and agents duly authorized by the Board, may, to the extent provided by the Board, exercise the powers of the Board in the management of the Institute.

(g) The chief executive officer of the Institute shall be an Executive Director who shall be appointed by the Board on such terms as the Board may determine. The Executive Director shall receive compensation at a rate not to exceed the rate provided for level IV of the Executive Schedule (5 U.S.C. 5315).

POWERS OF THE INSTITUTE

SEC. 707. The Institute—

(1) shall have perpetual succession unless dissolved by an Act of Congress;

(2) may adopt, alter, and use a corporate seal which shall be judicially noticed:

(3) may, subject to the availability of appropriations therefor, make and perform contracts and other agreements;

(4) shall prescribe the manner in which its obligations shall be incurred and its expenses allowed and paid;

(5) may employ and fix the compensation of not to exceed seven individuals at any one time;

(6) may procure the services of experts or consultants or organizations thereof in accordance with section 3109 of title 5, United States Code;

(7) may accept money, property, and services of any kind by gift, devise, bequest, grant, or otherwise;

(8) may sue and be sued, complain, and defend, in its corporate name in any court of competent jurisdiction; and

(9) shall have such other powers as may be necessary and incident to carrying out this title.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

SEC. 708. (a) The Institute shall be a nonprofit corporation and shall have no capital stock. Except as provided in sections 706(c), 706(g), and 707(5), no part of the income or assets of the Institute shall inure to the benefit of its directors, officers, and employees, and such income and assets shall be used solely for the carrying out of this title. No director, officer, or employee of the Institute shall in any manner directly or indirectly participate in the deliberation upon or the determination of any question affecting his or her personal interests or the interests of any corporation, partnership, or organization in which he or she is directly or indirectly interested.

(b) The Institute shall be subject to the provisions of the Government Corporation Control Act (31 U.S.C. 841 et seq.) relating to wholly owned Government corporations.

(c) Upon termination of the corporate life of the Institute, all of its assets shall be liquidated and, unless otherwise provided by Congress, shall be transferred to the United States Treasury as the property of the United States.

ANNUAL REPORT

SEC. 709. The Institute shall submit to the Congress each year a report on its activities in carrying out this title during the preceding year.

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS

SEC. 710. There is authorized to be appropriated to the Institute to carry out this title $1,000,000 for the fiscal year 1979. Amounts appropriated under this section are authorized to remain available until expended.

EFFECTIVE DATE

SEC. 711. This title shall take effect on October 1, 1978.

Mr. ZABLOCKI (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that title VII be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. BAUMAN

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BAUMAN: On page 44, beginning on line 22, strike out all of title VII, and redesignate the succeeding title accordingly.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, it is now, of course, the recognized Washington tradition to apply a label to a favorite program, which will, when repeated, make it appear to be a most acceptable type of proposition.

I direct the committee's attention to title VII—Institute for International Human Rights.

I also would direct the attention of the members of the Commitee to page 44 of the report and page 44 of the bill so that they may, for themselves, satisfy their understanding of precisely what this title does. Frankly, I think this proposition should have come before us in a separate bill which could have been debated on its own merits rather than in the State Department authorization bill.

Mr. Chairman, no one is going to say that human rights ought not to be promoted by the Government of the United States, and no one is going to object if it is done in the proper manner, with the U.S. taxpayers' money being used for the promotion of those rights. However, this particular title creates not an agency of the U.S. Government to promote human rights, but a nearly totally independent institute, the Board of Directors of which will be appointed by the President, with the approval of the Senate, and the funding of which will come from the Treasury of the United States at a rate of $1 million for the first year. It will be totally independent in defining what rights are human rights; and it is authorized, as I read it, to intervene in the internal affairs of any foreign country, left, right, or center, if the Members will notice the report's phrase on page 45, to promote what the Institute's Board of Directors considers to be human rights.

Mr. Chairman, I can understand why this proposition, in the abstract, sounds good; but the question then arises, how will this Institute operate, and will it, indeed, be consistent with U.S. foreign policy?

The authors of the bill say it need not be consistent with U.S. foreign policy, and therein they find a virtue.

Mr. Chairman, I must confess my concern that an awful lot of mischief can come out of the creation of a taxpayer-financed independent institute housed in the United States, going into other countries, giving grants to individuals, paying for publications, and doing a lot of other things described in the preamble of this title. Indeed, it sounds much like the activities of the CIA which my liberal friends are so loud in condemning.

Good or ill may come from this Institute, but our Government will have no control over it, no responsibility except to pay the annual bill. I believe this will be a mistake. I think that we can promote human rights through the State Department; even perhaps today through the United Nations in this late hour of that international institution. But, to create this independent group to me appears to be an invitation for trouble.

I would seriously urge that it be removed from this bill.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BAUMAN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleague for his very appropriate statement. I think he should be congratulated for making this observation and offering this amendment.

I think we know, after a number of years here, that if we put certain titles on either legislation or programs or amendments, that it usually guarantees their passage. Human rights, obviously, would be one of those. Reform would be another. How many times do we hear the word "reform"?

I think the gentleman from Maryland correctly points out that this provision is fraught with many problems. I think it is fair to say, in old insurance parlance, it is an accident on its way to happen.

Mr. BAUMAN. I point out to the gentleman from Ohio and the Committee in one aspect, section 707, this independent taxpayer-financed Institute is given the right to sue and be sued in any court of competent jurisdiction. Elsewhere, supposedly the Institute's activities are limited to foreign countries, but there is no such limitation in this section. Does that mean that if the Institute concludes that human rights are being violated in New York City or Puerto Rico or some other place, that the Institute could then intervene, taxpayer-financed, in courts of competent jurisdiction in those places to vindicate what the Institute feels to be human rights violations? That may be a problem.

If we could adopt a definition and guarantee that this Institute would perform the role which its authors, I am sure, envision, I think we could properly support it. But, the opportunity for misdirection is rampant, and I urge that the title be deleted.

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the origin of this proposal for an Institute on Human Rights goes back to a proposal made by our colleague from Florida, DANTE FASCELL, and was the object of hearings by two subcommittees with a large number of witnesses looking at the question of whether this kind of an Institute would make sense. Among the witnesses who testified in support of the Institute were Dr. Ernest LeFever, director of the Ethics and Public Policy Center at Georgetown; the Honorable Lawrence Silberman, American Enterprise Institute; George Lindsay, Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights under Law, and many other distinguished leaders in the field of international human rights.

One of the things that this Institute is to create a mechanism to give support for human rights activities which the Government itself finds difficult to give direct support to. For example, we have recently seen in the Soviet Union a continued crackdown on dissidents. We have seen the use of mental hospitals in the Soviet Union to try to suppress dissenting views. We have seen the practice of exiling dissidents from the Soviet Union. We find a lot of abuses of human rights, but very little leverage by the United States to do much about them.

One of the things that this institute could do would be to provide funds for the publication of works that were suppressed in countries that violate human rights. The Institute could also give support to organizations which in turn give support to some of the exiles from these totalitarian societies.

This frees the Executive from some of its problems in dealing with the problems of human rights by giving the problems to an institute with a degree of independence from the Executive.

The amount of money is very small. The appointments to the Board are made by the President and they have to be confirmed by the Senate. There is control through the appointments process and the requirement that the appointees be approved by the U.S. Senate.

We think this is worth trying and will add a new element to improving human rights in the world. It is a very modest start, but it had the approval of the witnesses who appeared before our subcommittee.

I just want to say, Mr. Chairman, I think this adds a useful modest degree of flexibility in the effort by this administration and by Members of Congress to deal more effectively with human rights violations around the world. This Institute is not going to be a cure-all. It is too small, too modest. But it does permit activities to go forward which the executive branch itself would find awkward and difficult to address.

So I hope this amendment will not prevail and the Institute could stay in the bill and perhaps become law and then we can see how it works.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FRASER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, as a practical matter, I think we could all agree with the theory, but to get specific on it for a moment, say we have physicist x who is a dissident in the Soviet Union. How would the Institute as a practical matter help this dissident either in the Soviet Union, or to leave the Soviet Union, or what would the gentleman envision the Institute could do to help such a person who was active in the civil rights struggle throughout the world? This is a known person, there is no question as to his authenticity and we could all agree on him. How would the gentleman envision the Institute could help a person like that under this legislation?

Mr. FRASER. One of the specific ways is found on page 45 of the bill, where someone for instance has tried to publish in the Soviet Union.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I will stipulate that is one of the things we would like to help with, that we would like to help publish papers. But what else?

Mr. FRASER. They could provide assistance for publication and dissemination of published materials or the display of artistic works which have been suppressed. That would be one concrete way. A second way would be where the families are involved, on page 45, where it provides they could help the victims and families of persons who are persecuted. This Institute could help the split families of persons who have escaped outside the Soviet Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

(On request of Mr. ASHBROOK, and by unanimous consent, Mr. FRASER was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, it would be my recollection in most cases that publications are already produced in this country and letters to the editor are run in papers. I have read just a few weeks ago a letter to the editor of the New York Times by a prominent dissident. This is already done as a practical matter, is it not, I would ask my colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota?

Mr. FRASER. It is done in part but only in circumstances where the publishing enterprise finds it to be profitable, because there are very few volunteers in this business of publishing, and this would add another avenue. It would be only a very modest one but it would be a resource which would provide a means of publishing something which was commercially not feasible to publish.

Mr. ASHBROOK. If my colleague will yield further, I would like to ask one additional question. In the hearings there were persons and a number of foreign groups who came forward to testify in favor of this. I have heard from some who would favor it. But it would be my experience that most of them would tend to receive some financial assistance through this act.

There are many groups that are already helping civil rights and human rights advocates throughout the world and would we not in many ways just be paying some of the bills that they are already paying? Is that what we envision here?

Mr. FRASER. That is a matter of judgment. My hope is, because of the limited resources that they would be very sparing in the direct operating support that could be given to an organization, otherwise the money would be used up very quickly. So they would have to use it for seed money and for special projects, because there is such a small amount of money that is involved.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the position taken by the gentleman from Minnesota (Mr. FRASER) and we are not necessarily in agreement that often on foreign affairs issues so this is a special day. First, I would like to point out the procedure that we followed in the committee.

The new independent agency that is anticipated here was subjected to extensive hearings. There were 15 witnesses pro and con. As result of this study, the subcommittee and full committee deliberations the original figure that was requested which was for $5 million, was reduced to $1 million.

I would also like to point out to the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BAUMAN), who indicated that this agency should have come to the floor in a separate bill, that we do have in this measure before us Radio Free Europe and Radio Liberty, which are also separate entities and are treated in the same fashion. What we propose is an independent agency operating under the laws of the United States, they would have public meetings, make annual reports, be subject to annual appropriations and, as indicated, the Board would be appointed by the President. Its members would serve for 6 years and they would be constituted in an independent fashion as to be able to deal with nongovernmental entities in other countries. In other words, if the President of the United States speaks on human rights, there is always a question of whether international politics is involved. If the State Department does it, the judgment is that the heavy hand of our Government is involved. Here we set up a legitimate independent agency to deal with the very important and delicate issue that is now in the center of the world's stage.

I think in that sense it is a very practical approach. It would be under control in terms of its budgetary review. So I would hope in this situation that it is a practical agency to support.

Mr. SISK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DERWINSKI. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. SISK. Mr. Chairman, I thank my colleague for yielding.

I am not particularly knowledgeable on this bill. I am concerned, though, about this question that has been raised here. As I understand from the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI), the request apparently by the witnesses that were supporting this Institute was for $5 million, and the point that I think is important is that you saw fit in the committee to cut it to $1 million.

Mr. DERWINSKI. That is correct.

Mr. SISK. Keeping that in mind, does that indicate to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) what is going to happen next year and the year after to this Institute? And here, again, I do not mean to make fun of it. I am concerned about the fact that we seem to be ever involved in creating new agencies or institutes to do something that I thought the United Nations or some other organization was supposed to be doing a long time ago, but I am concerned when the gentleman says that apparently the people that dreamed up this idea—and we are all for human rights, Lord knows—but when we start out with a group to dabble in every other country's business, I am concerned; and I do want to raise this question of my friend the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI), because I know that he is, frankly and frequently a conservative himself at times, does the gentleman mean that this Institute will end the next year or is it something that is going to go on indefinitely and run into higher and higher figures? I think that is what we are heading for; is it not?

Mr. DERWINSKI. The gentleman's questions have helped set the stage for support of this agency. The very facts that the gentleman has brought up are facts we have considered. We have established monetary control by trimming the original request. This will be an independent agency of our Government. We do not want to turn loose a group of citizens in a nongovernment entity where they would be completely outside of any jurisdiction, whether it be of the Department of State, the executive branch, or the Congress.

Mr. SISK. If my colleague would yield further, is not part of the function and concern of the United Nations and these various bureaus human rights? Are there not groups for that? Are we going to propose to do this on a unilateral basis, not bilateral or multilateral?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(At the request of Mr. BUCHANAN, and by unanimous consent, Mr. DERWINSKI was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. DERWINSKI. Let me just say that as a defender of the United Nations, I do not want to misstate the case, but we have to appreciate the fact that the United Nations has become overpoliticized. In its debate, especially in the General Assembly, we get an awful lot of empty rhetoric. What we envision here is a limited, independent agency being able to operate without the onus of politics that comes with official statements from the White House or the Department of State.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DERWINSKI. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I would point up that Deputy Secretary Warren Christopher of the Department of State said the following about this proposal:

If carefully structured, the Institute envisioned by your bill could make a valuable contribution to efforts in behalf of human rights. Perhaps its most important role would be to offer needed assistance to the non-governmental organizations (or NGOs). The valuable work of NGOs in promoting human rights long predated this Administration, and we have learned from them and been helped by them. We believe that our own efforts to promote human rights have, in turn, given their work new impetus by helping focus international attention on the causes they long have supported.

Beyond its salutary effect on private human rights organizations, creation of the Institute through Congressional initiative would be viewed as a reaffirmance of our national commitment to the promotion of human rights. The bipartisan nature of this commitment, and the breadth of its support, are prerequisities to the success of our efforts in behalf of human rights.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I feel a convert coming on, so I will first yield to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK).

Mr. ASHBROOK. I thank the gentleman for that, because I was not exactly going to convert at this point. My colleague has been relentless in the pursuit of compromise with the State Department and I have not yet started down that road with him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(At the request of Mr. ASHBROOK, and by unanimous consent, Mr. DERWINSKI was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. ASHBROOK. If the gentleman would yield further, I would thank my colleague for yielding.

There seem to be two main legislative thrusts that we have developed over the years, and we have seen them both. One is, "We will clean it up in conference." The other is, "Get the bill passed, and we will get you the money later."

This is May 31, 1978. I wonder if my astute colleague, the gentleman from Illinois, would care to project for the record—it will be printed—when this Institute will pass the plateau of $10 million, $50 million, $100 million in the future.

Mr. DERWINSKI. First, I will guarantee to the gentleman that in the next fiscal year it will not go beyond this present $1 million we envision. I want to point out to the gentleman that we have already struck a tremendous blow by cutting the original figure from $5 to $1 million. I, frankly, thought that the work in the subcommittee was such that the gentleman would applaud it. I now think it would have been wiser to have brought the bill to the floor with the $5 million, and then cut it to $1 million on the floor, and thus salvage the Institute. But this is a legitimate, independent entity to properly address the issue of human rights without the label of politics or without the big power involvement that is automatically attributed to the speeches of the President of the United States.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I thank my colleague for not answering my question.

Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DERWINSKI. May I next yield to the gentleman from the President's home State of Georgia.

Mr. McDONALD. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

In defining the term "human rights" for this Institute, would that include the right of an individual to gain and maintain private property?

Mr. DERWINSKI. I would assume so, yes.

Mr. McDONALD. Do we have a guarantee other than an assumption, or do we just have to go on the assumption as that being the case?

Mr. DERWINSKI. The United Nations Charter spells out the right of personal property, the right to own personal property. Obviously, this is not inconsistent with the provisions of the U.N. Charter.

Does the gentleman wish to withdraw the amendment?

Mr. BAUMAN. No. The gentleman wishes to stand by it without withdrawing it.

There is a problem with the gentleman's argument. The gentleman says we are going to create an independent institute that will not be suspect in its fight for human rights; but the gentleman just got through saying that Congress will control its money, the President will appoint its board and it will promote American policy. Yet, on the other hand, if it is not independent, we do not need it since the State Department can do the job.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI) has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. SEIBERLING, and by unanimous consent, Mr. DERWINSKI was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DERWINSKI. Just give me 15 seconds to answer my friend, the gentleman from Maryland. This is really becoming an interesting alliance here.

Mr. Chairman, let me point out that this idea of an independent agency is the very thing that worked successfully for Radio Free Europe. The gentleman and I support that concept. We do want restraint by the Congress. The last thing we want to do is turn this thing loose without authorization and control of the agency.

Mr. Chairman, now I yield the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING).

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, earlier today the gentleman asked me if I could document the remarks I had quoted from memory, made by Dr. Brzezinski a couple years ago. I now have a summary of his remarks which I put into the RECORD on Monday, June 21, 1976. The summary was approved by him before I put it in the RECORD. The remarks were made at a meeting on May 19, 1976. I quote from them as follows:

Angola. Many of our Angolan errors stemmed from the fact that our policymakers saw it as an East-West conflict, while it was also a North-South conflict.

He went on at some length and ended up talking about East-West and North-South relations in general:

In the short run, there is not the slightest doubt that if we move towards a confrontation, we will prevail. But, in the longer run, we will have lost what we are all about. We began as an experiment in freedom, and in certain kinds of values.

I hope he remembers his words of advice and wisdom of 2 years ago and tries to perhaps move in that direction again, rather than that indicated by some of the remarks he has made more recently.

Mr. Chairman, the full text of the summary of Dr. Brzezinski's remarks of May 19, 1976, are as follows:

REFLECTIONS ON PREMISES AND PRIORITIES IN AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY

In looking at its international position, the United States confronts the spectre of global isolation, a situation without precedent in our history. For much of our history, the United States, our values, our outlook, and our very existence have been a liberating factor in the world. This has imbued our foreign policy with a compelling force. This has changed dramatically. Now, much of the world sees us as opposing change, obstructing change. Worse, many Americans see the world as being fundamentally hostile to our values.

This is troubling, because a world of emancipated nation-states should not be something threatening to American values. There has, however, been for the public the intellectual attraction of yielding to a simplifying principle such as the Cold War. This principle was often true, but it did not help us to recognize the Sino-Soviet split or the development of polycentrism among Communist states. The new image the public holds is that of a "Hostile World," a coalition of Afro-Asian states allied against us. This image means divorce from gobal change, it means isolation, and it is wrong.

This philosophical divorce is threatening to us, because in our self-imposed isolation. we may create the very condition that we fear, and thus reduce our capacity to deal with international problems, while at the same time creating an intersection of East-West issues with North-South issue, which is now occurring frequently.

If we don't develop a more differentiated response capability to this intersection, our policies will inevitably fail. Two examples:

The Middle East. It began as a regional conflict between the Arabs and the Israelis, and first escalated into an East-West conflict, and subsequently into a North-South confrontation as well, as the anti-Zionism resolution at the United Nations clearly demonstrated.

Angola. Many of our Angolan errors stemmed from the fact that our policymakers saw it as an East-West conflict, while it was also a North-South conflict. Secretary Kissinger's Lusaka speech was a courageous one, but it should have been made over a year ago.

This intersection of North-South and East-West issue is a serious problem, and in some areas, such as Central America, unless we are both smart and wise, they will in the future present an even more serious problem to us.

This is why we cannot afford a hostile world, which is much of our own making. The Third and Fourth Worlds are differentiated: radicals and moderates, rich and poor. What all of this calls for is a truly massive architectural effort in the field of our foreign relations, on the scale of the one we undertook at the conclusion of World War II. We need a wider international system, responsive to the fact of 4 billion people in the world, and more than 100 independent nation-states. What we did after 1945 was to promote peace, free trade, and an Atlantic-centered alliance. What we need now is more than peace, more than free trade, and more than an Atlantic Community. We have to establish some sort of global equity. There is no conflict between liberty and equity.

In this large scale architectural effort, there are three areas of priority:

1. Trilateral Co-operation. We should pull much closer to Japan and Western Europe. These are also the countries that have systems which reflect universal democratic values. Economic and political stability require this strengthening of ties.

2. Reform of the North-South Relationship. We must fulfill the promises of the Seventh Special Session of the United Nations General Assembly. This calls for massive efforts by the Congress and the Secretary of State to recognize the needs of Third World states, and to assume responsibility for helping to meet those needs.

3. Stabilize the East-West Relationship. Negative public reaction to détente is due to the loss of illusions foisted on the people by the American government. The Russians never deceived us about détente. They always said that there would be mixed cooperation and conflict. We were the ones who were talking about a "generation of peace." The United States and the Soviet Union are separated by differing historical forces, and the conflict will be with us for a long time. That is why it is not a good idea to base our whole foreign policy on détente.

If we succeed in these three areas, then we can expect to have a far more responsive foreign policy. The public is susceptible to simple and direct formulas, but it is the task of leadership to make them understand the nuances. And the public wants interdependence to be articulated to them.

In the past year, there has been a sense of growing public confidence in America; the isolationist point-of-view has not prevailed. There is likely to be public support for U.S. engagement with the rest of the world.

We need to adjust to an interdependent world; the U.S. needs to co-operate rather than confront the rest of the world, particularly in the economic sphere.

If we do not, it may have implications for our society. It would be difficult to sustain the moral fabric of American society if we get engaged in a conflict with states we see as hostile, but which are also poor, suffering, envious, and have established a moral claim of some legitimacy.

In the short run, there is not the slightest doubt that if we move towards a confrontation, we will prevail. But, in the longer run, we will have lost what we are all about. We began as an experiment in freedom, and in certain kinds of values.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Ohio. Hearing the views of administration stalwarts is always inspiring.

I would like to point out that the inspiration behind this bill was our colleague, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. FASCELL), a responsible Member.

Mr. Chairman, I urge rejection of the amendment.

Mr. HARKIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

I rise in support of this Institute and in opposition to this amendment.

I can think of nothing we could do which would be more helpful toward the strengthening of human rights throughout the world than the establishment of this independent Institute to help us through the thicket of human rights as they pertain to different social and economic conditions throughout the world in different countries.

Mr. Chairman, I have had a stream of different people from the democracies in Europe through my office last fall and this year talking with me about the human rights amendments that have been passed here in the Congress and signed into law. One of the concerns that they have is about the problem of the human rights movement being tainted with politics. I believe the gentleman from Illinois has stated the situation quite clearly, that this Institute will go a long way toward removing this from the area of politics and the gearing it toward the legitimate human rights concerns that all of us have.

I think that the members of the parliaments of the democracies in Europe will be very supportive of this Institute, and I can see the Institute also going a long way toward getting them involved with us in promoting human rights throughout the world, especially in the area of helping the NGO's, the nongovernmental organizations. This is the one place where I think we can make a great impact throughout the world, because it is divorced from politics and it is divorced from the special considerations that every country has when it deals with another country.

So, Mr. Chairman, I would hope the House will defeat this amendment and go ahead and fund this Institute.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Until this very moment, Mr. Chairman, I had been a convert. What we find now is something I had not quite expected.

Are we going to undertake the championing of social and economic rights that are so advertised by the Communist nations as being human rights, or are we going to stick to what we have generally conceded to be human and civil rights in the political field? I speak of those rights which a government can guarantee or withhold. Indeed no government can guarantee a good harvest or adequate food or any other thing of that kind which is necessary for human existence but which it is impossible to guarantee.

I notice on page 45 of the report—and this was not stressed until this moment—that it does refer in the first paragraph to "universal respect for * * * human rights and fundamental freedoms," but in the second paragraph of that page it goes into both civil and political rights and economic and social rights.

I would like to know what the committee intends in this regard, because President Carter, in what I think was one of the finest speeches of his administration, in India, made a very clear differentiation between human needs and human rights. Human needs are adequate food, education, medical care, housing, and a job. These are human needs.

Human rights are things that can be given or withheld by a liberal or a totalitarian government. That is what I hope is the intention of this institute to address itself to, because otherwise we are going to get caught up with the new international economic order and deal with any one of a number of very difficult and controversial matters.

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. FENWICK. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. FRASER. Mr. Chairman, let me make the observation that with respect to economic and social rights, our principal agency is the Agency for International Development. That is the agency that is trying to help the poor of the world get more education and better health, and so on.

The emphasis here is clearly on what one would call civil and political rights. I think that is underscored by our reference to fundamental freedoms. We have an agency that is already at work in the field of social and economic problems.

Mrs. FENWICK. Mr. Chairman, this has been most helpful, and I think the gentleman has still gained his convert.

In other words, the goal of this institute is to concern itself with those human rights which can be given or withheld by liberal or totalitarian governments?

Mr. FRASER. The gentlewoman is correct, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. FENWICK. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, may I point out that we cannot be more precise, because the specific problems differ from country to country. The specific right that is denied in an African country may differ from the type of right that is denied in, for instance, a Latin American country.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BAUMAN).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BAUMAN) there were—ayes 49, noes 50.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 202, noes 164, not voting 68, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE VIII—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

GORGAS MEMORIAL INSTITUTE

SEC. 801. (a) Section 3 of the Act entitled "An Act to authorize a permanent annual appropriation for the maintenance and operation of the Gorgas Memorial Laboratory", approved May 7, 1928 (22 U.S.C. 278a), is amended in the first sentence—

(1) by striking out "annually, on the first Monday in December," and inserting in lieu thereof ", on April 1 of each year,"; and

(2) by striking out "up to the first of November next preceding" and inserting in lieu thereof "during the fiscal year ending the preceding September 30".

(b) Title I of the Departments of State, Justice, and Commerce Appropriation Act, 1945, is amended in the first paragraph under the heading "INTERNATIONAL OBLIGATIONS" by striking out ": Provided," and all that follows through "each such session" (22 U.S.C. 278b).

COMMISSION ON SECURITY AND COOPERATION IN EUROPE

SEC. 802. (a) Section 7(a) of the Act entitled "An Act to establish a Commission on Security and Cooperation in Europe", approved June 3, 1976 (22 U.S.C. 3007(a)), is amended by striking out "$350,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$550,000".

(b) The amendment made by this section shall take effect on October 1, 1978.

ADDITIONAL PARLIAMENTARY EXCHANGES AND ASSEMBLIES

SEC. 803. Of the amount authorized to be appropriated by section 101(a)(2) of this Act, $100,000 shall be available only for disbursements for the expenses of a special study group, to be appointed by the chairman of the Committee on International Relations of the House of Representatives, to investigate the feasibility of organizing additional parliamentary exchanges or assemblies to provide a regular forum for the periodic discussion of common problems and interests by representatives from the Congress and from the legislative assemblies of other countries. Disbursements of funds under this section shall be on vouchers approved by the chairman of the Committee on International Relations or his designee.

INTERNATIONAL TIN AGREEMENT

SEC. 804. Effective October 1, 1978, there is authorized to be appropriated to the President $60,000,000 for the purpose of acquiring tin metal to contribute to the buffer stock of the International Tin Council established under the Fifth International Tin Agreement.

Mr. ZABLOCKI (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that title VIII be considered as read, printed in the RECORD and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. ANDERSON OF ILLINOIS

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois: On page 53, after line 2, insert the following new section 803 and redesignate succeeding sections accordingly:

"JAPAN-UNITED STATES FRIENDSHIP COMMISSION"

SEC. 803. Section 6 of the Act entitled the "Japan-United States Friendship Act" (22 U.S.C. 2905) is amended—

(1) in paragraph (9) by striking out "and" at the end thereof;

(2) in paragraph (10) by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof "; and "; and

(3) by inserting after paragraph (10) the following:

"(11) transmit its official mail as penalty mail, in the same manner and upon the same condition as an officer of the United States other than a Member of Congress is permitted to transmit official mail as penalty mail under section 3202 of title 39 of the United States Code."

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BAUMAN) reserves a point of order.

The gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON) is recognized for 5 minutes in support of his amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, my amendment would insert a new section 803 in the bill which would extend penalty mail privileges to the Japan-United States Friendship Commission established by the Japan-United States Friendship Act enacted by the 94th Congress.

That law was enacted to provide for the use of an amount equal to a part of the total sum payable by Japan to the United States in connection with the reversion of Okinawa to Japanese administration and the remaining funds set aside in 1962 for educational and cultural exchange with Japan to aid education and culture at the highest level in order to enhance reciprocal people-to-people understand and to support the close friendship and mutuality of interests between the two countries.

The act further established in the Treasury of the United States a Japan-United States Friendship Trust Fund to be used for the promotion of scholarly, cultural, and artistic activities between the United States and Japan. The act also established the Japan-United States Friendship Commission to develop and carry out programs at public or private institutions for the promotion of scholarly, cultural, and artistic activities in Japan and the United States and to make grants to carry out such programs. The Commission is composed of the members of the U.S. Panel of the Joint Committee on United States-Japan Cultural and Educational Cooperation, two Members of the U.S. House of Representatives, two Members of the Senate, the chairman of the National Endownment for the Arts, and the chairamn of the National Endowment for the Humanities.

There was a minor oversight in drafting that law, yet one which has posed considerable administrative problems for the Commission. The Commission was not granted the so-called penalty mail privilege which is given to Government agencies, and most other mixed commissions of this nature. As a result of this oversight, the Commission is unable to buy postage on credit and must advance personal funds for which the staff is subsequently reimbursed. The Postal Service has refused the Commission's request that it be permitted to buy a postage meter and use metered postage under regulations of the Postal Service for Government agencies. These regulations permit the billing of Government agencies on a monthly or quarterly basis for postage actually used. The Postal Service has ruled that since the Commission is not a Government agency, it must pay in advance for postage. And yet, under Government procurement rules, which are applicable to the Commission, it cannot pay in advance by Treasury check, and hence the staff must use personal funds to buy postage, for which it is later reimbursed.

On December 6, 1977, I introduced H.R. 10211 which would extend penalty mail privileges to the Commission. That bill was referred to the Committee on International Relations which is still awaiting agency comments from the Department of the Treasury. The committee has received comments from the Postal Service. In a letter dated May 15, 1978, Postal Service Assistant General Counsel W. Allen Sanders wrote Chairman ZABLOCKI stating in part:

The Postal Service has no opposition to the bill. . . . if it is the intent of Congress that the Commission be eligible for penalty mail privileges, the Postal Service has no opposition to the amendment of the Japan-United States Friendship Act to permit the Commission to use penalty mail in the same manner and under the same conditions as officers of the United States Government.

The committee has also received a letter from Douglas Bennet, Jr., Assistant Secretary of State for Congressional Relations, expressing State Department support for my amendment, and I quote:

The Department of State views the Japan-United States Friendship Commission as an agency of the United States Government and strongly supports legislation that would authorize the Commission to transmit its official mail as penalty mail.

Mr. Chairman, I would also point out that my penalty mail amendment was added to the State Department authorization in the other body as section 206 of S. 3076.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I want to underscore that adoption of this amendment will not cost a single cent since this does not exempt the Commission from paying for postage—it simply makes it possible to pay for it on a reimbursable basis as other Government agencies now do.

I would therefore urge adoption of this noncontroversial, no-cost amendment which is supported by the administration.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. I yield to the distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI).

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON) has provided the committee with copies of his amendment. We are familiar with some of the problems that the Japan-United States Friendship Commission is experiencing and recognize that this amendment is necessary. As the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON) has stated, Mr. Chairman, the State Department does not have any objection.

I would advise the gentleman that we on this side of the aisle are very pleased to accept the amendment.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. I thank the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. BUCHANAN).

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, I too would accept the gentleman's amendment. It is my understanding that it is in the bill in the other body.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the adoption of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BAUMAN) insist upon his point of order?

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, it appears to me that the amendment is not germane, but, in deference to my senior colleague on this side, one of the leaders on the Committee on Rules, I will not press the point of order and I withdraw my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BAUMAN) withdraws his point of order.

Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANDERSON).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. ASHBROOK

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ASHBROOK: On page 53, immediately after line 23, add the following new section:

"SEC. 805. (a) None of the funds authorized to be appropriated in this Act shall be used for the purpose of reparations, aid, or any other form of payment to the Socialist Republic of Vietnam.

(b) The President shall continue to take all possible steps to obtain a final accounting of all Americans missing in action in Vietnam.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, the amendment I am offering prohibits the use of funds for reparations, aid or any other form of payment to Communist Vietnam. It is basically the same amendment that the House overwhelmingly adopted last year during consideration of the Foreign Relations Authorization Act for fiscal year 1978. It is precisely the same as section 505 of the conference report adopted last year.

Why is this amendment necessary? Last October the director of Vietnam's Central Bank was still saying that the United States owes Vietnam $4.75 billion—and that he believes the United States will eventually repay it. The Communists evidently believe it will be done by laundering U.S. tax dollars through the U.N. and various international agencies to Vietnam. I did not include the "direct or indirect" language used in my amendment of earlier this month. I do not think this authorization bill is the place for that.

We have already seen the beginning of this type of activity. The U.N. General Assembly recently passed a resolution authorizing the Secretary General to rehabilitate Vietnam both socially and economically. Our representative to the U.N.—Andy Young—sat on his hands and failed to vote against it or even ask for a recorded vote.

The World Bank—to which the United States is a major contributor—apparently will follow the same route. Bank President Robert McNamara indicated that aid would go to Vietnam.

It is time to call a halt to this nonsense. U.S. tax dollars should not go to Communist Vietnam. I urge the adoption of my amendment. The State Department must know we want no form of reparations to that country.

Last year on July 26, 1977, in the conference report on similar legislation, H.R. 6689, section 505 entitled "Reparations for Vietnam," the exact language, word for word, that we adopted in the conference report is the language contained in my amendment. I think it is very evident today that we want to keep this provision in the law.

I do not think there should be any letting down of our interest or guard as far as the possible reparations for the Socialist Republic of Vietnam is concerned, and I would urge my colleagues to support this amendment.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

As he has stated, Mr. Chairman, his amendment is identical to the language now in the law and the language that was returned to the House of Representatives in the last session of Congress in the committee report. I certainly join the gentleman in his intentions of the amendment and am very pleased to accept the amendment on the part of this side of the aisle.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ASHBROOK. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I, too, would join the Chairman in commending and accepting the gentleman's amendment. I think we need to keep it in the law. I do not think this administration has any present plans in that direction, but it is just as well to keep the language in the law, and I accept the amendment.

Mr. ASHBROOK. I thank my colleague.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK).

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. HANSEN

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HANSEN: Page 53, after line 23, add the following new section: "SEC. 805. None of the funds herein authorized to be appropriated shall be used directly or indirectly to effect implementation of the Panama Canal Treaties of 1978 without a specific Act of Congress authorizing such implementation."

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Chairman, to reiterate, the amendment is very simple. It says that none of the funds herein authorized to be appropriated shall be used directly or indirectly to effect implementation of the Panama Canal treaties of 1978 without a specific act of Congress authorizing such implementation.

One might ask why in this type of legislation we put this reiteration of something that has been done on some occasions before, and I would say that probably it is important for us to reiterate not only that which we have done in the budget resolution, not only that which we have done in the military authorizations bill, but to do this also in the foreign relations authorizations bill because of the fact that the Department of State is under this particular jurisdiction.

Mr. Chairman, I would say this, that the Department of State does not have a very good track record as far as its bypassing of the Senate and the House of Representatives. They bypassed the Senate when the appointment of Sol Linowitz was anounced as one of the treaty negotiators, and there was no chance for advice and consent. There again was a bypass of the House when the recommendations were made for the passing of the treaties without coming to the House of Representatives, as is usually the case in regard to the Panama treaties of the past, and also when other types of treaties have been considered through the years. Also there seems to be a possible effort to bypass the House and Senate action as enumerated in the Brooke amendment in the treaties of 1978, which says that there will be no implementation of the treaties prior to the 31st of March of next year unless an act of Congress predates that particular period of time.

There seems to be some question now as to whether this might take place earlier considering the announced June protocol exchange in Panama between the President and Torrijos. Considering the track record of the dictator of Panama when he says that the DeConcini amendment is something that does not mean much to him because he could destroy the canal several hours before we could come back, I think it is important for us to reiterate here now, particularly with regard to the activities of the State Department, that none of these funds shall be used by the people in the State Department to implement the Panama Canal treaties without a specific act of Congress authorizing such implementation.

Mr. Chairman, I might say again that today's amendment is similar to House Concurrent Resolution 347, which has 240 cosponsors and which states very much the same as this amendment entails.

Mr. Chairman, I ask support for this amendment.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, before utilizing my time, I wonder if we could limit the time on this amendment?

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on this amendment and all amendments thereto end at 25 minutes to 7 o'clock p.m.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Members standing at the time the unanimous consent request was made will be recognized for 1½ minutes each.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I was almost ready and willing to share my time with whoever stood up, if there were more than three.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. As the gentleman knows, the executive branch is in the process of preparing proposed implementing language for the Panama Canal treaties. In fact, draft copies of the language developed to date have been widely circulated.

The gentleman from Idaho, the sponsor of the pending amendment, has himself introduced one of the draft versions already circulated in the House. When this legislation is officially submitted to the Congress, it will be referred to four committees for consideration: the Committee on International Relations, Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries, the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, and the Committee on the Judiciary, and perhaps to other committees sequentially.

Congressional action pertaining to the treaties should be taken in connection with such implementing legislation rather than through the sporadic process of amendments such as the one pending to this authorization bill. In this way, the proper committees can consider the subject in an orderly and comprehensive way.

As the gentleman knows, as a result of the Brooke reservation, the basic treaty cannot become effective before October 1, 1979 unless implementing legislation is passed prior to that date. Therefore, there is no need for precipitous action in this fashion by the Congress.

Congressional action pertaining to the Panama Canal treaties should be taken in connection with the legislation implementing the treaty rather than through the sporadic process of floor amendments to authorization bills. In this way, the proper committees can consider the subject in an orderly and comprehensive way.

As a result of the Brooke reservation, the treaty cannot become effective prior to October 1, 1979, unless implementing legislation is passed prior to that date. In view of this timetable, there is no need for precipitous action by Congress.

After exhaustive debate, the Senate has approved the Panama Canal treaties.

This is not the proper vehicle for an amendment of this kind.

There are no funds in this bill to implement the Panama Canal Treaty.

Furthermore, the executive branch agrees that the canal treaty cannot be implemented until both Houses of the Congress have acted. In fact implementing legislation is now being prepared and will be submitted to the Congress, probably within the next 2 months.

The Senate has acted and approved the treaties. We should not now take action that will only irritate the Government and people of Panama because it will be interpreted as a gratuitous slap in the face.

We should accept the fact that the treaties have been approved and get on with the job ahead—that is making the treaty work to the advantage of the American people.

As Senator DOLE has said:

For my part, I look to the future in a spirit of cooperation. The treatymaking process prescribed by our Founding Fathers has been followed, and I abide by the outcome. We trust that the treaty provisions will be honored fully by both governments throughout the years to come, and that genuine friendship between the American people and the Panamanian people will continue, as firmly as ever.

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. BUCHANAN).

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, is it not the case that under the Brooke reservation the treaty cannot become effective prior to October 1979, unless implementing legislation is passed before that date, so it must come before us?

Mr. ZABLOCKI. That is true.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. DERWINSKI).

Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Chairman, at the risk of losing my impeccable conservative creditials, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

This is a State Department authorization bill. As such, it is limited to the functioning of the Department of State, and the issue of implementing the canal treaty really is not involved here. I believe my good friend, the gentleman from Idaho (Mr. HANSEN), is engaged in something of an overkill, as the chairman of the committee indicated, in offering this same amendment to so many issues.

I supported the gentleman's early position and I might well support it when we come to the gut appropriation bill, but I do not think we should tie the hands of our diplomats and say that no funds directly or indirectly may be used, because if the Members interpret that as I do, it means our Ambassador in London who may be discussing commerce with the British Government could not discuss the Panama Canal or its future.

So, Mr. Chairman, I really think the position of the gentleman from Idaho (Mr. HANSEN) would be best served—and I say this as a friend and normal supporter of his—by withdrawing his amendment and letting this State Department authorization bill move through without this kind of unnecessary restriction.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Idaho (Mr. HANSEN).

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Chairman, I will just say that I think the State Department is precisely made up of a group of people that we have to control, considering the track record of the State Department that I enumerated earlier.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI).

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, I yield back my time.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho (Mr. HANSEN).

The question was taken; and the Chairman being in doubt, the committee divided, and there were—ayes 47, noes 57.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 203, noes 163, not voting 68, as follows:

Mr. Le Fante for, with Mr. Richmond against.

Mr. SARASIN changed his vote from "aye" to "no".

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE changed his vote from "no" to "aye".

So the amendment was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments?

If not, under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LEVITAS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 12598) to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979 for the Department of State, the International Communication Agency, and the Board for International Broadcasting, to make changes in the laws relating to those agencies, to make changes in the Foreign Service personnel system, to establish policies and responsibilities with respect to science, technology, and American diplomacy, to establish a Commission on Proposals for a Center for Conflict Resolution, to establish an Institute for International Human Rights, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 1204, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gros.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

MOTION TO RECOMMIT OFFERED BY MR. BURKE OF FLORIDA

Mr. BURKE of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. BURKE of Florida. In its present form, yes, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BURKE of Florida moves to recommit the bill, H.R. 12598, to the Committee on International Relations.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the motion to recommit.

There were no objections.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The motion to recommit was rejected.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER

The SPEAKER. May the Chair announce this will be the final piece of legislation for the evening, and we intend to work until at least 9 o'clock tomorrow night.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 240, nays 124, not voting 70, as follows:

Mr. TREEN changed his vote from "yea" to "nay."

So the bill was passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

TITLE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. ZABLOCKI

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Title amendment offered by Mr. ZABLOCKI:

Amend the title so as to read: "An Act to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979 for the Department of State, the International Communication Agency, and the Board for International Broadcasting, to make changes in the laws relating to those agencies, to make changes in the Foreign Service personnel system, to establish policies and responsibilities with respect to science, technology, and American diplomacy, and for other purposes".

The title amendment was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING CLERK TO MAKE CLERICAL AND CONFORMING CORRECTIONS IN THE ENGROSSMENT OF H.R. 12598

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, in the engrossment of the bill H.R. 12598, the clerk be authorized to correct section numbers, punctuation, and references and cross references to reflect the actions of the House in amending the bill H.R. 12598.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 15, EDUCATION AMENDMENTS OF 1978

Mr. MURPHY of Illinois, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 95–1234) on the resolution (H. Res. 1208) providing for consideration of the bill (H.R. 15) to extend for 5 years certain elementary, secondary, and other education programs, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON H.R. 11401, NATIONAL AERONAUTICS AND SPACE ADMINISTRATION AUTHORIZATION ACT, 1979

Mr. FLIPPO. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the gentleman from Texas, Mr. TEAGUE, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 11401) to authorize appropriations to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for research and development, construction of facilities, and research and program management, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment thereto, disagree to the Senate amendment, and request a conference with the Senate thereon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama? The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. TEAGUE, FUQUA, MILFORD, ROE, LLOYD of California, WYDLER, and WINN.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY TO SIT ON TOMORROW DURING 5-MINUTE RULE

Mr. FLIPPO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Science and Technology may be permitted to sit at 10 o'clock a.m., on tomorrow, Thursday, June 1, 1978, during the 5-minute rule.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

OSHA—COTTON DUST

(Mr. COLLINS of Texas asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks).

Mr. COLLINS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, at a time when Government regulations are multiplying almost faster than the Federal Register can print them, OSHA is a major source of senseless Government interference. Although OSHA has received a Supreme Court ruling to obtain search warrants before inspections, this has not stopped the agency from increasing regulations for private industry.

Recently, I heard from a group which represents the business community of an area geographically encompassing over half of my home State of Texas. The West Texas Chamber of Commerce is going through the frustrating ordeal of fighting 1976 OSHA proposals dealing with cotton dust standards. Any businessman will tell you that the commonsense economics of good safety and health programs already controlled working conditions before OSHA stepped in. The cotton dust standards will only add to the thousands of ludicrous OSHA regulations which are already strangling private industry.

The cotton dust standards were contrived to combat a respiratory disease called "bysinnosis" which occurs among workers in the textile industry. Having never heard of the disease, WTCC Executive Vice President Ed Coltharp initiated a survey of medical doctors in several towns located in cotton-producing areas of west Texas to determine the frequency of "bysinnosis."

A statement submitted by the WTCC to the Department of Labor concluded:

The results of the survey show that of the 17 physicians contacted, 16 reported no knowledge of its existence in their areas. One physician, with a practice spanning 32 years, reported having treated only one suspected case several years ago. One suspected case is infinitesimal when considering the thousands of people who have worked at cotton-related jobs over the years in West Texas.

At least four of the physicians contacted specialize in lung-related disorders. In addition, the Texas State Health Resources Department indicates that no employee has ever filed claim for this illness in the west Texas area. In other words, OSHA is setting out to reduce exposure to a disease in a section of the country which has rarely, if at all, experienced the disease.

What will this mean to the cotton industry in west Texas, an industry which has provided a way of life in the area for many years? Instead of improving the working environment in the plants, these standards will destroy cotton production and eliminate thousands of jobs. Estimates indicate that investment in gins alone will have to double; only seven mills in Texas and 18 mills in the total United States could financially afford the standards; and costs for a small mill to comply would run over $1 million.

Adding to these costs would be the increased burden of medical screening and recordkeeping. Higher cotton product prices for livestock feed would in turn drive up overall food costs for the consumer. The price for finished textile products would also rise.

The OSHA cotton dust standards will mean economic disaster for west Texas and many other parts of the country. For too long, industry has been saturated by similar unnecessary regulations that are destroying production, jobs, and the livelihoods of millions of Americans whose taxes are funding these wasteful Government programs. It is time for the bureaucrats to realize that the American public has more Government than it wants, more Government than it needs, and more Government taxes than they can pay.

CLEVELAND GIVES QUESTIONNAIRE RESULTS—ANSWERS IT HIMSELF

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. CLEVELAND) is recognized for 60 minutes.

● Mr. CLEVELAND. Mr. Speaker, this spring my 16th annual questionnaire was mailed to postal patrons in the Second Congressional District of New Hampshire. More than 18,000 constituents took the time and trouble to respond. This response is the highest number in the 16 years these questionnaires have been distributed.

The tabulated results and my own answers will be set forth for readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and will be mailed to Second Congressional District residents. In previous years there have been issues on which my position differed from that of a majority of my constituents. This year, I find myself in substantial agreement with respondents on all the questions.

NEW AGENCIES VERSUS BETTER ONES

As an example of previous disagreement, last year the question was asked: "Do you favor the establishment of a Federal Consumer Protection Agency?" Although 54 percent of the respondents replied in the affirmative, my position on the issue was set forth and explained in the negative. Since that time a majority of this House has voted against establishing a Consumer Protection Agency. This willingness of a majority of the House to vote its convictions against a proposal favored by a popular majority was reassuring. This country cannot afford some of the agencies we already have, let alone an endless creation of new ones.

The matter of agencies' performance, increasingly beyond the control of their congressional creators, should be of far greater concern than it is. A scholar at the prestigious Brookings Institution—Edward F. Denison—has reported that Government regulations in environmental and safety areas, along with unchecked crime, have caused a measurable decline in our economic growth rate in recent years. Furthermore, an American Enterprise Institute scholar—Murray Weidenbaum—has estimated the total cost to our society of Federal Government regulations to be well in excess of $100 billion per year.

Some of this Federal activity has a purpose, and accomplishes something desirable. Much, however, is more complicated than necessary, duplicative, and sometimes simply excessive. We must fully recognize that it costs us all money, makes business less efficient and all too frequently is counterproductive.

The high cost and poor performance which is characteristic of many Government agencies is bad enough. To make matters worse, many agencies—under their rulemaking authority—are in effect writing laws. Courts too are guilty. This is a problem area which needs attention and is a major contributing factor to the "Government out of control" situation which prevails in Washington.

GOVERNMENT OUT OF CONTROL

The public has begun to perceive that Government agencies are out of control. President Carter was elected, after all, on the promise to clean up the mess in Washington, only to have his administration become part of it. However, the public perception of the problem is limited. For every letter I get complaining about a Federal program inflicting harm or costing too much, another comes in with a pitch for a new program usually labeled as a reform and always costing money. The myth that Government in Washington can solve all problems by spending money continues to flourish in spite of impressive evidence to the contrary. It is the ultimate frustration. How long this can continue I do not know. The temptation to walk away from the mess is in precarious balance with the will and desire to deal with it. An increasing number of Members of Congress have decided to walk away. There is a lonely feeling among those who remain.

REPEAT QUESTIONS

This year we again asked a question identical to one last year. This provides insight into the trend of thinking from one year to the next. This year the question was on the relative urgency of inflation and unemployment. Last year it was evident that inflation ranked far ahead, going from 3 to 1 in 1976, to 4 to 1 in 1977. This year it is an overwhelming 9 to 1. The message is clear that the people of New Hampshire understand the problem. Hopefully, Washington will get the message and do something.

The questions asked, the results and my comments follow:

1. Panama Canal: Do you support the Panama Canal treaties?

[In percent]

Yes	30
No	63
Undecided	7

The response to this question is not surprising as it is consistent with a number of national polls. It is gratifying, however. Although House Members did not vote on the treaties—only the U.S. Senate votes on treaties—my position in opposition to the treaties was clearly set forth in response to a large volume of mail before this questionnaire was sent out.

The Panama Canal treaties suffer from several defects. They do not require congressional authorization for the proposed grant of U.S. property to Panama, nor do they require approval from the House of Representatives for loan payments to Panama. They do not provide for adequate defense of the canal after 1999, and they expressly preclude the United States from unilaterally negotiating with another country for the construction of an interoceanic canal anywhere in the Western Hemisphere, even if we become very dissatisfied with Panamanian operation of the existing canal. In fact, no one has even seen the implementing legislation. The timing is unfortunate, for it comes at a time when many people perceive the United States at a nation in retreat. Thus, although the treaties are well intentioned, the giveaway appears to be yet another act of weakness and uncertainty.

The concept of renegotiation of our current treaty status with Panama is basically sound, but in my opinion a better first step would have been to internationalize the canal, with operating control resting in a number of Central American and South American nations along with the United States.

2. Middle East: Do you approve of the Administration's proposed sale of military aircraft to Egypt, Israel and Saudi Arabia?

[In percent]

Yes	44
No	45
Undecided	11

The Carter administration proposed a package sale of warplanes to three Mideast countries. As proposed, the sales would provide 60 F–15 fighter bombers to Saudi Arabia, 15 F–15's and 75 F–16's to Israel, and 50 F–5E's to Egypt. In March there was some mail in opposition to the proposal. In answer to that mail I stated that "if we had a vote at this time and based on the information provided to me I would vote against it." My answer also questions the proposal's timing and possible adverse affects on the peace negotiations between Israel and Egypt.

The questionnaire results are very close and the number undecided significant. By this time, of course, the U.S. Senate has voted to allow the sale, with assurances of additional sales to Israel.

3. Abortion: The Supreme Court has ruled that women cannot be denied an abortion during the first 3 months of pregnancy. Should Congress deny payment of Medicaid funds for women too poor to pay for an abortion, otherwise legal and available to them?

[In percent]

Yes	32
No	61
Undecided	7

In 1973 the Supreme Court established the constitutional right of women to decide whether or not to continue a pregnancy during the first trimester. It would be inherently unfair to put restrictions on medicaid eligibility that are not similarly imposed on women who have the means to pay for their own health care. The denial of such funds would in essence make a medical procedure available to only the more privileged women in our society and, in my opinion, amount to discrimination. Poor women would be forced to either bear unwanted children or undergo dangerous and unauthorized "back-alley" abortions, when richer women could avoid that choice.

This issue has come before Congress a number of times and on repeated occasions I voted against the so-called Hyde amendment to deny medicaid funds for abortions. This position generated a great deal of emotional mail, reflecting the nature of the controversy. This questionnaire sought an assessment of whether my thinking was in tune with the majority of my district. For this reason the results on this issue are indeed reassuring to me.

4. Government accountability: When both Houses of Congress and the White House are controlled by the same political party, should Congress establish a Committee controlled by the minority party to investigate allegations of wrongdoing and abuses of power?

[In percent]

Yes	65
No	26
Undecided	9

An idea which has been discussed at least since 1965 is a Select Committee in the House under the control of the minority party when the executive and legislative branches are under the control of the same political party. In such circumstances this select committee would be automatically created, funded, and vested with wide-ranging investigatory authority. The rationale for such a committee is a simple one; that is, that an administration cannot be relied upon to investigate itself and that a Congress controlled by the same party cannot be relied upon to investigate an administration of the majority party in Congress.

This was proposed to the Joint Committee on the Organization of Congress in May of 1965, but met with little approval with the majority. Next, in a book "We Propose: A Modern Congress" which I edited, Congressman ROBERT MICHEL of Illinois wrote a chapter advocating such a select committee. The proposal was renewed in 1973–74 while the House was considering various reform proposals. I offered it as an amendment to the reform bill in 1974, but was rejected on a nearly party-line vote. The inability to get widespread interest in this proposal is a bit hard to understand. During the unravelling of the Watergate scandal, Congress controlled by the Democratic Party, insisted that there be a Special Prosecutor on grounds that a Republican-controlled Justice Department would not have the confidence of the people in investigating alleged wrongdoing by a Republican President. Now, there is a Democratic President and Democratic control of both Houses of Congress. The fact that we have already been through the Lance and Marston affairs should provide sufficient evidence that wrongdoing is not limited to either political party and that, in fact, assurance of vigorous investigation is the best deterrent to misconduct.

5. Social security for Federal employees: Should Federal employees be required to participate in the Social Security System?

[In percent]

Yes	65
No	24
Undecided	11

It is now mandatory for non-Government employees to participate in the social security system, and cities and States are encouraged to do so. Federal employees should also be required to participate in the social security system. There was recently a specific vote on this in the House and I joined a very small minority of Members—only 38, in fact—in voting to include Federal employees.

Federal employees in my district were quite vocal about not wanting their retirement system changed. Nonetheless, Federal employees may under present law retire early and then work just enough years to obtain the minimum social security benefits to supplement their Government pensions. This is simply unfair to other working people who put in a lifetime under social security in order to receive benefits.

Mandatory coverage of all Federal employees would accomplish at least two goals. First, it would help put the system on a more secure financial footing. Second, it would help assure taxpayers that the system is fair. Otherwise, Congress and the executive branch create the impression of having foisted a social security system on the taxpayers that apparently is not good enough for the Federal Establishment to join.

6. Natural gas: Do you favor deregulation of the price of newly discovered natural gas?

[In percent]

Yes	48
No	39
Undecided	13

With sharp criticism of my longstanding position in favor of deregulating new natural gas still ringing in my ears these results are heartening. The large number of undecided is also heartening because this issue is a complex one.

Proponents of deregulation loudly proclaim their "pro-consumer" stance. But they seem to have lost sight of the fact that New England's dependence on natural gas is minimal compared to our heavy reliance upon imported oil, the price of which is clearly beyond our control. By artificially holding down the price of a product which is used extensively in other parts of the country but little in our own region, we are placing ourselves in a decidedly adverse economic position. The disparity in economic growth rates between Sun Belt States and the older regions of the country such as New England—except New Hampshire—has been painfully evident. Since it is the rapidly growing Sun Belt States which have been able to supply a large part of their energy needs by controlled cheap natural gas, we should realize that a continuation of this regulation is detrimental to our region's interests. The following statistics supplied by the New England Congressional Caucus make the point:

Energy Source Mix—New England vs. U.S.

	Oil	Natural Gas	Coal	Hydro	Nuclear
1976-NE	79.7	9.6	0.7	1.7	8.3
U.S.	47.3	28.2	18.2	3.8	2.5

In addition, regulation holding its price to artificially low levels has increased the demand for natural gas, deterred exploration for new sources and tilted the economic balance against alternate forms of energy.

Deregulation is an incentive both to conservation, since it makes a scarce commodity more expensive, and to increased production. Market forces setting the price of natural gas at a realistic level would benefit newer forms of energy that are just beginning to be utilized, eliminating an unfair disadvantage now preventing them from being cost competitive. Unpleasant it may be, but it is a fact that the greatest spur to development of solar, small hydro, wood, solid waste, wind, and other alternative energy sources, and to energy conservation, is the higher prices we are paying for oil and coal. Artificially low prices of natural gas indisputably retard these developments.

7. Human rights: Do you feel the President's emphasis on human rights has helped to further our overall foreign policy objectives?

[In percent]

Yes	27
No	61
Undecided	12

The systematic denial of fundamental human rights by various governments is deplorable, and should be condemned by the United States on the moral and political principles for which this country stands. However, the administration's application of its human rights problem in its foreign policy has been inconsistent and uneven. It has also seemed, at times, as if more criticism were directed at some of our allies than at our adversaries. Thus I agree with the majority.

It is disturbing that early criticism of Soviet human rights violations has been largely stopped because of the Carter administration's desire for a SALT Agreement. This tendency to back off from a strong policy undermines the very goals sought to be achieved—and further, sends out a dangerous signal about our national resolve.

8. Korea: Do you favor withdrawing all American combat troops from South Korea?

[In percent]

Yes	34
No	58
Undecided	8

The strength of this response in support of maintaining our armed forces in Korea is very reassuring. It is my deep conviction that total pull-out of all American combat forces from South Korea will invite invasion from a very militant North Korea, with the risk that we would perhaps start World War III.

The close proximity of South Korea to our ally Japan, which is now the third largest economic power in the world, cannot be overemphasized.

9. D.C. representation: Do you favor a Constitutional amendment providing the District of Columbia two U.S. Senators and two Members of the House of Representatives?

[In percent]

Yes	37
No	51
Undecided	12

The District of Columbia was created to establish the seat of the national government beyond the jurisdiction of any State or local interest. The federal concept upon which our Nation is based was that of a union of States which delegated certain powers to the Federal Government; thus it was considered appropriate only for the States, not a Federal city, to enjoy full representation in the Congress.

Granting full voting representation in Congress to the District of Columbia would, I believe, undermine the concept upon which the Federal city was established and set a precedent for other territories of the United States to demand full voting representation, since the adoption of the amendment would permit voting Members of Congress from an entity which is not a State. When the House approved such an amendment I voted against it.

My concern for the fundamental constitutional principles involved does not reflect any reluctance to allow residents of the District self-government. I strongly supported the home rule measure designed to insure District of Columbia residents the right to govern their own civic affairs.

10. ERA: The Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) which was passed by Congress in 1972) has to be ratified within seven years by ¾ of the states to be implemented; it is now three states short of that figure.

[In percent]

Yes	31
No	61
Undecided	8

10B. If the time limit is extended, should states that have already ratified it be given an opportunity to rescind their ratification?

[In percent]

Yes	60
No	29
Undecided	11

I agree with the majority response to both parts of this question. I voted for the equal rights amendment in 1972 because the issue is important enough to allow State legislatures to decide whether or not the amendment should become part of the Constitution. However, I oppose the proposed extension of the time limit for ratification. The time should be adequate to permit a consensus to develop among the States; 30 of the 35 States which ratified the ERA did so within 1 year of its submission to the States. Furthermore, if the ground rules are changed for the time limit for ratification, equity would demand that states should be allowed to rescind earlier ratifications.

11. Education: Which of the following approaches to increasing aid for private and post-secondary education do you prefer:

[In percent]

a. Federal income tax credits for a portion of tuition	66
b. Expansion of existing Federal aid programs to students	34

I have sponsored legislation to provide tuition tax credits ever since my first term in Congress. This approach to aiding education now enjoys support of two-thirds of the respondents.

Although both approaches are designed to improve the quality of education and provide financial relief for parents who pay tuition, I prefer the tax credit proposal at this time.

12. United States-Soviet relations: Some feel our present policy toward the Soviet Union (detente, SALT agreements, etc.) is good for the United States and should continue. Others argue that we are not strong enough in our dealings with the Russians. What do you think?

[In percent]

a. Maintain present policy	29
b. Soften our position	3
c. Adopt harder line	68

The public's perception of our relations with the Soviet Union is clearly evident from the results of this question and I concur.

It is important not only that our Government adopt a harder line in our dealings with the Soviet Union, but also that there be consistency. There can be no question that the Soviet leadership perceives a lack of decisiveness in our National Government, and is testing it in various parts of the world. If we are to increase cooperation with the Soviet Union, it is imperative that it be done from a position of strength and not one of weakness or vacillation. The decision against production of the neutron missile just days before our Secretary of State journeyed to Moscow to negotiate a new SALT Agreement is a case in point.

13. The economy: At this time, which of the two following economic problems do you consider the greater threat to the American economy?

[In percent]

	Unemployment	Inflation
1978	10	90
1977	20	80
1976	24	76

The continued shift toward inflation as the greater threat is dramatic—and thoroughly justified.

At current levels, ranging from 8 to 15 percent at annual rates, inflation causes unemployment. It also, of course, penalizes the poor, jeopardizes the middle class, reduces the real wages of workers, discourages investment, reduces consumption. If allowed to continue, each element of inflation feeds on others, creating a cycle that becomes more and more destructive.

Inflation must be fought at all levels—by restraining Government spending—which I have tried to do in a long series of my votes—limiting wage demands, delaying price increases where possible, avoiding speculation, and the list can go on.

14. President Carter: How would you rate President Carter's performance in office thus far?

[In percent]

Excellent	3
Good	17
Fair	35
Poor	45

My own feeling is that President Carter's job rating to date falls somewhere between fair and poor, depending in part on the specific issue involved.

More than anything else, it is the uncertainty which comes from the constantly changing positions, and sometimes flatly contradictory positions taken in the name of the administration. This is happening in domestic affairs such as various aspects of energy policy. Then there are unkept promises of tax reform and movement toward a balanced budget.

But it is the area of foreign policy and national defense which gives me greatest concern. Our allies are so discouraged by the administration's inconsistency that they are seriously questioning whether they can depend on U.S. assurances. Our adversaries are obviously encouraged to test our resolve in Africa and elsewhere. The trumpet is apparently giving an uncertain sound.

These results rather closely reflect national polls which is further evidence that, though unscientific, these questionnaire results are very representative of general opinion. These results are also disquieting. Although we are members of different parties and in sharp disagreement on a number of issues, I want my President to be doing a lot better than he seems to be doing.

15. Priorities: Of those issues and concerns which in your opinion are properly subject to Congressional action which three would you most like the Congress to deal with in the coming months?

After only 1 year of dropping from top position, inflation is once again right at the top of the list of New Hampshire concerns. New Hampshire residents continue to place energy in second position which clearly demonstrates that most people fully understand the urgency of the energy problem.

Inflation should indeed be a top priority for Congress to deal with. One can only hope that it will do so with more fortitude than heretofore. To reduce the inflationary problem facing us, Congress must take steps to get the national budget into balance. It is appalling that Congress keeps spending $60 billion or more a year in excess of our revenue. This deficit can be covered only by running the printing presses, or by borrowing in the private bond market which drives up the interest rates for people buying a home, businessmen expanding their factories, and so forth. Fighting inflation involves tough decisions, and a willingness to anger special interest groups which want ever more money for their favorite programs.

Energy is also a high priority. It is regrettable that almost 5 years after the Arab oil embargo, the U.S. Congress has not enacted a comprehensive, integrated energy policy.

Deregulation of natural gas prices was discussed earlier. Yet another example is the fact that we continue to profess support for nuclear power for electricity generation, yet Congress and the administration have done absolutely nothing to end the incredibly duplicative and time-consuming procedural steps necessary to construct nuclear powerplants.

Another priority, is one that includes the Panama issue inferentially, the priority being the status of our national defense as it is interrelated with the conduct of foreign policy. The morale and effectiveness of the defense establishment is not as good as it should be. As commented on elsewhere in this report a weakness of our foreign relations is uncertainty and the status of our Defense Establishment compounds this problem. The increased role of Congress in foreign affairs also adds to uncertainty in the conduct of foreign policy. There is increasing comment that the congressional role may be getting a bit out of balance.

The matter of priorities is important. Perhaps the reason we now have some of the problems we do, is the result of a failure in previous years to set national priorities. Congress has been so busy addressing myriads of problems that it has not properly dealt with the really important ones which should receive priority attention. We have also failed in our oversight functions. Congress seems to enjoy setting up new programs more than making the ones we already have either work effectively or be terminated.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. SARASIN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. SARASIN. Mr. Speaker, on May 24, 1978, I was absent from the legislative session of the House of Representatives. Had I been present, I would have voted in the following fashion:

Rollcall No. 365: H.R. 10929, DOD Authorization—The House rejected an amendment that sought to reinstate the committee substitute language for title II, Research, Development, Testing and Evaluation, "No";

Rollcall No. 366: H.R. 10929, DOD Authorization—The House rejected an amendment in the nature of a substitute to the committee amendment that sought to replace the committee substitute with the Administration's DOD budget request, with the exception of the $911.9 million authorization for the Trident submarine, "No";

Rollcall No. 367: H.R. 10929, DOD Authorization—The House agreed to an amendment that deletes the $8.1 million authorization for procurement of a Gulfstream II executive aircraft for use by the Marine Corps in its Aircraft Support Detachment, "Yes";

Rollcall No. 368: H.R. 10929, DOD Authorization—The House rejected an amendment that sought to replace the $2.1 billion authorization for a large nuclear-powered carrier (CVN) with a $1.5 billion conventionally powered, medium sized carrier (CVV), "Yes";

Rollcall No. 369: H.R. 10929, DOD Authorization—The House rejected an amendment that sought to delete the authorization for procurement of aircraft carriers, "No";

Rollcall No. 370: H.R. 10929, DOD Authorization—The House rejected an amendment that sought to add a $29.2 million authorization for the development of a wide-bodied cruise missile carrier, "Yes";

Rollcall No. 371: H.R. 10929, DOD Authorization—The House rejected an amendment, as amended, that sought to prohibit the use of authorized funds to reduce Army combat troops in South Korea below 26,000 except in the case of an emergency declared by the President, "No"; and Rollcall No. 372: H.R. 10929, DOD Authorization—The House passed the measure, Department of Defense Appropriation Authorization Act, 1979, "Yes".

Mr. Speaker, on May 25, 1978, I was absent from the legislative session of the House of Representatives. Had I been present, I would have voted in the following fashion:

Rollcall No. 374: S.J. Res. 137, North Atlantic Alliance—The House passed the joint resolution reaffirming the unity of the North Atlantic Alliance commitment, "Yes";

Rollcall No. 375: H.R. 7814; Flexible Work Schedules—The House agreed to the rule (H.R. 1165) under which the bill was considered, "Yes";

Rollcall No. 376: H.R. 7814; Flexible Work Schedules—The House agreed to resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole, "Yes;

Rollcall No. 377: H.R. 7814; Flexible Work Schedules—The House passed the measures to authorize Federal agencies to experiment with flexible and compressed employee work schedules, "Yes";

Rollcall No. 379. H.R. 9400, Civil Rights of Institutionalized Persons—The House agreed to an amendment that reinstates coverage for persons in jails, prisons, or other correctional institutions, but only permits the Attorney General to initiate a civil action in these areas when the court has transmitted a complaint of petition, "Yes".●

TUITION TAX CREDITS: AN IDEA WHOSE TIME HAS COME

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK) is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, first, it should come as to surprise to anyone that I have been a longtime advocate of tuition tax credits, the voucher plan and voluntary programs which assist the taxpayer and private schools. During my years in Congress, the most consistent and basic philosophy which can be traced through my voting record and public position reduces to one simple proposition: In all battles between the bureaucracy and local government or individuals, between the citizen-taxpayer and his Government, between private sector and public sector, between freedom of choice and governmental dictation, I have carefully supported, first, the overriding principle of the supremacy of the Constitution and the need for a strong but limited Government to deal effectively with our domestic and international problems. Second, within that guideline I support the maximum legal rights and freedoms for individuals against their Government, for private sector activity against the very growing, massive public sector.

Some issues are most difficult to fit into that basic set of principles: The compulsory draft in fact of a strong conviction that individuals should be free of Government restraints. Outrageous pornography in face of a belief that Government censorship is wrong. Wiretapping and electronic surveillance which can be abused but the use of which must be balanced against the insidious nature of crime, subversion and terrorism. Not all fit neatly but the basic principles apply and they clearly apply in the case of tuition tax credits.

I am a strong supporter of public education. My children all attended public schools and I never had a thought of sending them to private schools. If they were first-graders right now, they would still go to a public school. At the same time, I believe there should be a freedom of choice and I applaud the growth of private schools which serve as a valuable and proper function in a free society, not a challenge to free, universal public education and something to be feared.

Public education has gradually changed in outlook and perspective and it is fitting that it be examined like any other aspect of our American life. I served on an education committee 4 years in the Ohio legislature and have been on the Education Committee since 1961 in the Congress. It is with some perspective that I address this overall subject.

IT IS OUR MONEY

Probably the greatest criticism I would have of the professional education lobby here in Washington is that they believe your money, the money of you the taxpayer, is really their money. If you start from their point of view, they have the basic right to tell you what to do with it. From my point of view, it is your money and while we do compel you to pay taxes for many things which are less than universally accepted, we must not allow bureaucrats to convince you that it is theirs. It is yours. To the extent we can encourage you to use your own money to pay your hospital bills, take care of yourself, provide for your own retirement, educate your children, and all of the other functions of the American family, our system will work all the better.

Here is where the liberal sees things differently. They would rather tax you to the hilt and then, in their superior judgment, allocate your funds as they see fit. It is precisely this attitude of the past 20 years that has brought about the growing protest and tax revolt throughout the country, a revolt I see as bringing some restraint to the spenders and taxers.

How well I recall some 10 years ago visiting the office of the U.S. Commissioner of Education on a mission with two prominent educator friends, John Howard who was then president of Rockford College and the late Ernest Wilkinson, then head of Brigham Young College. We were urging Commissioner of Education Francis Keppel to support our tax credit and deduction proposals which would have covered college as well as elementary and secondary education. It was the same tax credit theory which now is so popular. This was 1966.

Mr. Keppel listened intently for about 45 minutes and then gave the answer which really is the heart of the liberal's objection to tax credit legislation of any kind. He said:

"Your ideas are fine but they overlook one point. They will make it more difficult for us to implement our social policies and objectives.

Flat out, that was it. What social policies? Those social policies of the past decade are the basic reason why many schools now lack the support of the taxpayer which are needed to make public education as effective as it should be. Busing, interference with curriculum, and teacher assignment, quotas, secular humanism, deemphasis of values. Yes, the bureaucrats have used your money to implement their social policies and education has suffered for it.

THE MISERY LOVES COMPANY ARGUMENT

In light of the liberal social scheme developments in education over the past decade it is a most interesting argument that I now receive from many of my good friends, the beleaguered superintendents of schools. I well understand their opposition to tax credits. Ohio schools in particular see dwindling resources, taxpayer resistance to added millage and therefore want to keep every resource limited to public education. I understand that.

When they write me and say if we are to have tax credits, these private schools should have the same restrictions and controls they have, it is interesting. Interesting, because in most cases they argued properly against the bureaucratic implementation of these restrictions and controls in the first place. Misery loves company.

WHY THE GROWTH OF PRIVATE SCHOOLS

There has been a phenomenal growth of private schools in the past decade. While we have always had the old line, parochial schools there is a new nondenominational private school boom. I have made it my business to challenge the HEW elitists who think they know best. While most of innovative educational gobbledy-gook has not permeated schools in my area, it is clear to me that the more controls the Federal bureaucrats have over education, the more their liberal direction will be implemented in the Mt. Vernons, the Bellvilles, the Johnstowns, and Ashlands of this country.

Over the years, I have made scores of statements and made hundreds of speeches about the liberal trend in education, fostered by a combination of the bureaucratic liberal elitists here in HEW, the unions and the social planners. Education traditionally had as its goal the preparation of our youth for responsible citizenship and self-sufficiency by equipping them with necessary learning skills and, above all, an ability to think. More and more, the liberal would edge education toward the undemocratic goal of right thinking, translated this means what they think, in economic, social, political, racial, international terms, Schools are to be centers, clinics, dispensers of social services, correcting the ills of the home.

As long as there is competition in education, as long as Federal planners do not get total control of education, as long as we have local control of public education and a healthy private sector of education we can prevent these social planners from achieving their goals. Tuition tax credits are a vital part of this fight. Keeping public education strong and under local control is also a vital part. These goals are compatible, not in conflict.

I am glad to see that my distinguished colleague from Nebraska (Senator ZORINSKY) has been alert to these trends in education and is fighting many of the battles some of us waged before his election to the Senate. The trend of the past few years is with us but the liberal theoreticians are entrenched in this city. It is not a partisan matter. The same tendencies were there during Republican administrations although they seem to have more encouragement under Carter.

My constituents as well as parents all over the country have become increasingly alarmed by certain changes taking place in our schools. They see dangers in the schools becoming more concerned with children's attitudes, beliefs, and emotions than providing them with a basic education. The techniques being widely used today to change children's attitudes and values are an invasion of privacy, a threat to the family unit, and the emotional stability of the child.

Vance Packard, whose books have alerted the public conscience to changes in society which alter our lives, writes in The People Shapers:

In less than a decade the behavioral technologists have moved in a major way into our compulsory government-operated schools.

The curriculum writers, theorists, and behavioral scientists who have managed to change the thrust of American education in recent years have been able to accomplish their goals through the use of Federal grants from various agencies, particularly the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare.

A large portion of these grants come under the Elementary and Secondary Education Act—mainly titles I and IV—and are generally described as "innovative" programs. Many of the techniques used in these projects are objectionable to parents and do not improve academic performance. Some examples are: Pre- and post-testing of students for attitudinal change toward sociological problems such as the aged, population, death, and so forth; role playing to diagnose attitudes and simulation games to change attitudes; keeping of diaries; and, behavior modification, not just for the handicapped or special education students, but the normal child. As stated by one of my constituents, "A great majority of these materials deal with some sort of desperate need to treat all students as if they lived in a mental health center." Some of the objectionable programs funded under the Elementary and Secondary Education Act which have been brought to my attention include the following:

1. Project Reflect. Pre-testing and post-testing to achieve "desirable concepts."

2. Hilda Taba Social Studies. Altering attitudes through emotional, psychological and psycho-therapeutic techniques. This course was investigated by the California Legislature, hearings were held, and the program was dropped. It was later introduced into other states and additional funds were granted.

3. APEX English curriculum. Subjecting students to radical, sensational materials most of which are contrary to basic family concepts.

4. Contact Language Arts Series. Self-disclosure techniques leading to invasion of privacy of students and parents.

5. Human Development in the Family—Home Economics. Students being asked to read Sexology magazine, discuss homosexual marriage, keep diaries about conflicts in the home. They are asked how much money the family spends on them, how many charge accounts parents have, etc. Students are sacrificing class time in nutrition, diet, cooking and sewing for this human development unit.

6. Project Developmental Continuity. Materials and techniques for students with handicapping conditions are being used in regular classes with students not identified as having handicapping conditions. Children placed in this project can be harmed emotionally and socially, and participation should be voluntary.

7. Understanding Child Maltreatment. For all grades—kindergarten through 12th. Teaches children how to tell if they are being abused by their parents who are referred to as "caretakers." Some typical acts of "abuse" are "unrealistic demands, unequal sibling treatment, consistently negative responses . . ." of which almost all parents would be found "guilty" in the children's minds at one time or another.

8. Humanities Education Materials. Includes How to Live With Your Parents and Survive, a "humorous" presentation on why parents of today are such poor excuses for parents. Another course, Living with Dying, insinuates that it is unrealistic to search for immortality. Other death education courses in this project have led to fixations to the point where children have nightmares and physical symptoms such as stomach pains. Doctors have stated this is unhealthy and unnecessary. (Note: This program was evaluated. The third quarterly evaluation report stated that lack of full teacher involvement remains an area of concern, yet the evaluators recommended that the program be continued and the following year the entire school profile should be coordinated into a Humanities Learning Center—a total Humanistic School.)

Mr. Speaker, these are a few examples of behavior modification programs which HEW should be required to justify before Congress approves continued funding for such projects. Usually HEW describes the entire program in glowing and general terms, rather than on the basis of the number of programs funded as compared to those found to be successful. However, my requests for evaluation and justification of these types of programs have gone unanswered. It may well be they are unable to justify these expenditures for the following reasons:

First. There is not even a listing of total innovative projects funded, despite the requirement for such a listing in section 424 of the General Education Provisions Act, 1974. Even though HEW is now attempting to identify currently funded projects, where there was a measure of effectiveness, they claim a complete listing is impossible.

Second. A very small percentage of these innovative projects have even been evaluated. The few examples listed in "Educational Programs that Work" are those which local school districts voluntarily evaluated and submitted to the Joint Dissemination Review Panel. This would indicate that the vast majority of these programs do not work.

Third. A recent study at the U.S. Office of Education and the National Institute of Education entitled "A Research Perspective on Educational Improvement" questions the effectiveness of many of these federally-funded projects. This work was based on reviews of nearly all the major studies on educational innovation since 1970. The report states that "Most projects funded by these programs were designed primarily to take advantage of the availability of Federal money."

Fourth. An earlier study by the National Institute of Education indicates that the Office of Education provides little clear guidance or supervision in administering Federal aid to education Auditors have become so discouraged with the infighting and failure to enforce Federal laws that they are now reluctant to audit school aid programs.

Fifth. The GAO report on Office of Education programs September 1977 stated unequivocally that the Congress should recognize that HEW is not in compliance and does not intend to comply with the General Education Provisions Act requirement regarding evaluation of Office of Education programs.

Sixth. The GAO report on Federal Support of Curriculum Materials and Behavior Modification Techniques Used in Local Schools April 1977 indicated that Federal funding for curriculum development and dissemination and for other education techniques, such as behavior modification, is significant. Yet it noted that data needed to accurately assess the impact of Federal funding on behavior modification techniques used in local schools does not exist.

An article in the New York Times magazine in 1977 and recently reprinted in Reader's Digest entitled, "The More We Spend, the Less Children Learn," claimed that "in 1976, $75 billion bought schools filled with new technology, 'innovative programs'—and poorly educated pupils." It stated:

The factor that does appear to affect academic performance is the degree to which the schools sacrifice traditional disciplines and subjects for the sake of "innovative" teaching activities.

Similar articles have appeared in such magazines as the New Republic, the American School Board Journal, Psychology Today, Learning magazine and Newsweek.

Many teachers are becoming disturbed by these programs. Instructor magazine, a monthly publication for elementary teachers, recently conducted a survey of its readers, asking "Is Teaching Hazardous to Your Health?" Most of the 10,000 teachers who responded cited "stress" as their biggest health problem and complained of headaches, hypertension and nervous stomaches. When asked what the one factor contributing most to the stress was, a significant number responded that it was the growing pressure of monitoring students' social and moral development. This finding was reported in the feature article of the February 26, 1978, issue of Parade magazine.

A serious question is raised when Congress permits programs such as those I have described to continue with Federal help. When concerns are voiced, the advocates of behavior modification cry "censorship" and demand even more Federal funds with less controls. They ignore warnings from authorities such as Dr. David Elkind of the University of Rochester, speaking at the annual meeting of the American Psychological Association in 1977. He stated that—

A segment of mental health specialists is putting its own interests ahead of children's welfare . . . that for children under 12, affective education can be confusing and possibly disturbing.

He stated that—

One-fourth to one-half of young children categorized as "learning disabled" are really curriculum disabled, victims of the floods of untested, poorly written learning materials that inundate the schools.

Those who defend these grants, in the agencies as well as in the Congress, argue against Federal interference, citing the law prohibiting Federal control of education. However, an analysis of the intent of this provision prepared by the American Law Division of the Library of Congress, Congressional Research Service, states:

The prohibition would not, however, appear to limit the applicability of conditions which Congress attaches to its grant-in-aid programs.

This is only sensible. The picture of Congress sitting by helplessly while the bureaucrats indiscriminately hand out money for all kinds of social experiments is absurd.

My findings indicate that even those persons who favor innovation admit that it fails to bring about significant educational improvement. Walter Borg of the Far West Laboratory for Educational Research and Development, at a 1970 conference of persons actively involved in attempts to change the schools, stated that:

Local innovations are almost never subjected to any sort of rigorous evaluation. Thus, for most innovations we do not really know whether the new approach is better than the old. Innovations are usually adopted not because they are better, but because they are different.

He further stated:

Perhaps the best reason for abandoning local innovation as national strategy for improving education is that it is incredibly inefficient and expensive. We need look no further than Title I of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 to illustrate this point. The proponents of Title I assumed that if you gave local schools enough money they would build new programs and bring about improvement in education. To date Title I has provided us with a shocking six-billion-dollar test of this assumption. Although it is not easy to get quantitative data on Title I projects (since most of them have collected little or no valid research evidence), what information we do have indicates that these projects have brought about virtually no real improvement in the schools. Of course, no program that involves thousands of projects and spends billions of dollars can be completely barren, but it is sadly apparent that Title I has produced tons of chaff for every ounce of wheat.

He further stated:

Large scale attempts to legislate educational improvement through local innovation, such as Title I, without doubt constitute the most wasteful and unproductive strategy that has ever been devised.

It should be noted that these comments were directed only to title I, while most innovative programs are funded under title IV.

How many more years will we continue to perpetuate this waste—not only of tax dollars but of children's precious school years? Children can be properly educated without infusion of new Federal funds. The President has requested higher expenditures to support emphasis on the teaching of basic skills. If additional funds are needed, Congress can fund these efforts by yielding to the overwhelming evidence and ending the funding of unproven, unnecessary, and unwanted projects.

The list could go on and on. Psychological testing, minimum of privacy, behavioral changes and other liberal schemes are only a few of the subjects I have observed emanating from the NEA and HEW.

SUMMARY

Tuition tax credits represent an idea whose time has at last come. For those of us who have fought uphill against the Federal behemoth for years, it is a welcome sign of relief. To summarize, this legislation should be supported because:

First, it is a visible, family-oriented and constitutional form of tax relief in this year and era of tax revolt;

Second, it is a concrete expression of the traditional philosophy of those of us who want to restore rights to the people and encourage both competition and individual choice;

Third, it provides needed relief to individuals, not to institutions; and Fourth, it operates as a check on the arrogant power of Federal bureaucracy in the HEW and the courts.

As a ploy and ruse, HEW Secretary Califano hastily came up with a bureaucratic "answer" to tax credits. His proposal would supposedly help middle income taxpayers. The Carter administration program would again force taxpayers who after all pay the bill and carry the freight, to prostrate themselves before Federal bureaucrats, fill out lengthy forms detailing intimate personal questions on income and so forth, sign a form of pauper's oath to get back some of their own money. Nonsense. The tax credit avoids all of this expensive and foolish garbage. That it does thus terrifies the regulators and bureaucrats whose jobs depend on you coming before them to seek alms.

The bill before us today does not go far enough. My bill would provide a tax credit of $500 or a deduction of up to $1,000 per individual for tuition paid by a taxpayer to educate himself, his spouse, or his dependents. The credit or deduction would be applicable across-the-board from elementary school through college including vocational school.

As one who has fought for tuition tax credits for more than a decade, I am obviously supporting this less comprehensive bill. It represents a victory for the people. The winds of change are blowing. Public opinion is clear and strong. A liberal Congress has responded favorably despite itself. A liberal President can do no less. A liberal Secretary of HEW can do no less. Despite themselves.

The bottom line is very simple. Public education does not have the unequivocal right to all of our tax money that goes for education. Competition in education is desirable, not a tragedy. Freedom of choice of the individual is of overriding importance and should be encouraged. Tax credit legislation for colleges as well as elementary and secondary schools should be supported by all of us. Public education can stand on its own feet. It has been and will continue to be supported by all of us. If public education sees a peril in tax credits, possibly some reexamination of its own house will be in order. The public after all is supreme under our system and the elitist theory of telling parents and taxpayers what is arrogantly believed to be best for them is the only theory that will suffer in the passage of H.R. 12050.

A TRIBUTE TO "TEX" EASLEY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. WAMPLER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. WAMPLER. Mr. Speaker, today marks the last day on the job of one of the finest congressional staff members with whom I have had to opportunity to be associated. I am referring to Louis Thomas Easley. Since not too many Members of this body know him by that name, let me hastily add that I am talking about "Tex" Easley, press assistant to the House Committee on Agriculture.

In trying to put together some words to best summarize my feelings about Tex, I sought out the thoughts of his colleagues on the staff of the committee and his friends in journalism. The suggestions ranged from "one of the nicest people I have known" to "even-handed, diligent, dedicated and dependable"—with a lot of other kindly words thrown in along the way. But I found it hard to pick out just one word to best describe Tex—so I came up with three of my own: colorful, congenial, and considerate. I think it takes at least all three to describe Tex Easley.

A native of Texas and a 1930 graduate of the University of Missouri School of Journalism, Tex worked as a reporter for the Denver Post for 5 years and then joined the staff of the Dallas Times Herald. Along the way, he married in 1932 his lovely wife, Bonita. The two came to Washington in a new Reo car in March 1937—with Bonita 8 months pregnant at the time—so Tex could start work with the Associated Press in the Nation's Capital. For the next 30 years and 6 months, he covered Senate and House news of interest to the Southwest for the AP, retiring on September 30, 1967. The next day, he started work for the House Agriculture Committee.

Today, after a combined journalism-committee staff service on Capitol Hill of more than 41 years, Tex will retire. I understand he plans to catch up on some homework on his 110-year-old cabin which sets on 40 acres of land near Harper's Ferry, W. Va., and then he and Bonita will start a leisurely drive to Panama.

From that point on, he and Bonita are up for grabs. I understand they plan to sell their car in Panama and grab the first freighter through the canal—going either east or west—and keep traveling as long as Tex holds out and his pension lasts.

The other night some friends held a little going-away party for Tex and Bonita—and one of the Agriculture Committee staff members, Lydia Vacin, expressed the sentiments of most there when she quoted James Whitcomb Riley's words:

To make the world a friendly place, one must show it a friendly face.

Lydia went on to say about Tex:

That is what I believe you have always done as a member of this "illustrious"—or rather "industrious staff . . . I'm sure that when you get to Heaven, Tex, you'll be there hours before the devil knows you're dead. But please don't make any more plans to retire. You'll be needed there—as you have been here. Have a blessed and long retirement.

Mr. Speaker, I believe Lydia's warm words about Tex Easley sum up what I have been trying to say. We on Capitol Hill will miss him. We wish Tex and Bonita "Godspeed." And may they travel always with the wind at their backs.●

PRESIDENT KAUNDA OF ZAMBIA SPEAKS TO NATIONAL PRESS CLUB

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DIGGS) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. DIGGS. Mr. Speaker, on May 18, 1978, His Excellency Kenneth Kaunda, President of Zambia, spoke at a luncheon given in his honor at the National Press Club in Washington, D.C.

President Kaunda is one of the world's most respected leaders, and his comments on the situation in Africa and the Anglo-American initiatives in southern Africa provide unique insights into the perspectives of those most knowledgeable on the subject. I would like to take this opportunity to share the President's remarks with my colleagues:

SPEECH BY HIS EXCELLENCY THE PRESIDENT OF ZAMBIA

I want to thank you for the opportunity you have given me by this bountiful luncheon to share with you some reflections on problems facing us in the world today.

I am sure you would want me to focus my attention on the dangerous crisis unfolding in Southern Africa. By drawing your attention to Southern Africa, I do not mean to underrate the gravity of other problems such as disarmament, the lack of satisfactory progress in the protracted Strategic Arms Limitation Talks, the fuel crisis and the world economic recession with all their adverse consequences on mankind. We in Zambia share common concern for the security and well-being of our fellowmen the world over. It is our sincere hope that at such critical time, world leaders will make decisions which will save man from self-destruction.

I would, however, like to focus my attention on Southern Africa as today's grave threat to international peace and security. Zambia's geo-political location and our commitment to the enhancement of human dignity give us special responsibility in building peace in Southern Africa. The future of Zambia is inextricably bound up with that of the entire region of Central and Southern Africa. We can never turn our backs to that crisis.

Since the dawn of the liberation struggle, there have been two roads to the establishment of peace in Southern Africa. The one road led to violent conflict and the other to lasting peace and stability by negotiations.

OUR CHOICE

For us in Zambia, attainment of independence by peaceful means was our choice from the beginning of our struggle. Our commitment to this noble ideal is not any less today than it was when we launched our struggle decades ago. We have expressed our commitment to non-violence many times in word and in deed. We tried in the 1960s to end the unfolding armed conflict in Angola, Mozambique, Zimbabwe, Namibia and South Africa. In 1969, the Manifesto on Southern Africa adopted in Lusaka further confirmed Africa's fundamental belief in non-violence. In 1974 and part of 1975, we pursued the line of peaceful change to its logical conclusion. We engaged South Africa and the rebel regime in Salibsury in talks and tried to persuade them to give up power in Zimbabwe and Namibia, and to end apartheid in South Africa by non-violent means. Our intensified efforts left no stone unturned between October, 1974 and August, 1975. This non-violence approach as a first option in the struggle for liberation failed.

Our initiative was neither the first nor last. Successive British Governments tried in the 1960s and 1970s. They failed. The combined efforts of the United States and Britain in 1976 also floundered on the stubborn intransigency of Ian Smith.

OUR ALTERNATIVE CHOICE

The result of these failures is that today armed struggle has been forced upon the freedom loving people in Zimbabwe and Namibia. Resort to arms has thrust upon the millions of people in South Africa itself as the only option in a reaction against brutal force. These oppressed people want peace, individual liberty and prosperity based on equality. These are the same rights that the Americans want for themselves. This is what the people want in Southern Africa. There may be some in America who may dangerously compare the American declaration of independence more than 200 years ago to Smith's illegal declaration of independence. Any attempt to do so would be an abandonment of the democratic principles which America believes in and a clear vote for violence in Rhodesia. The United States cannot pursue a policy of liberation at home and reaction in Southern Africa. Human rights are indivisible. They deserve respect in Southern Africa as they do in America.

This is why we welcome the efforts of the Carter Administration which has for the first time completely identified itself with those struggling for freedom and independence. This is correct. Equivocation must be replaced by forthrightness in removing the root cause of conflict in Southern Africa.

I know that there are many illusions about the situation in Rhodesia. There are those who think that the so-called "Internal Settlement" is good and should be made to work. They are wrong. They are not reading Ian Smith's motive correctly. Americans should not be deceived by reading Smith's motives from his declarations designed to hoodwink them and the world.

Behind this cloak of verbiage there are sinister actions which are the reality we in the frontline and the liberation movements must deal with, namely, there is no change in the situation in Rhodesia.

Smith has not reduced his oppressive measures.

Massacres of innocent civilians are increasing, not decreasing. Only two days ago 94 people were massacred in cold blood.

Smith has not stopped recruiting mercenaries and expanding the army and procuring more sophisticated weapons in amounts without precedent.

Smith has intensified his acts of aggression against neighbouring countries on whom whites will depend for stability in the post-independence era.

Smith's military budget is of the order of one million dollars a day.

From our intelligence, we know Smith's briefings to white audiences namely; Nothing has changed. The whites have sought more time. They are guaranteed a minimum of 10 years of the status quo in black/white power relationship. The recent sacking of one of the Ministers in the newlook illegal regime for voicing out the necessity for change in the master servant relationship shows that Smith is only using his black partners to the Agreement as instruments for his political programme to keep the majority population in their place.

This is most dangerous. Consequently we have no moral right to postpone this liberation war. We cannot allow Smith to extend it into the 1980s. If we do, victory will be by far more expensive than in the 1970s. More weapons and money will be needed to fight the liberation war to victory. More life will be lost and property destroyed. The danger of external involvement will multiply. The risk of a full-scale world-wide war too grave to be ignored. At that point the American people might find themselves fighting on the wrong side. America might well find herself fighting Africa.

The answer lies first and foremost in completely abandoning any idea that Smith's Salisbury cover-up Agreement is worth any more than the price of paper on which it was written. It is ill-advised. It is a disaster. I wish God in his infinite wisdom will inspire Bishop Muzorewa and Rev. Sithole with the courage to accept that the signing of the cover-up Agrement was unwise. It is a mark of good leadership to retreat when circumstances demand. No agreement can and will work in Zimbabwe without the agreement of the Patriotic Front engaged in the war with Smith. For our part we have never advocated the exclusion of Bishop Muzorewa and Rev. Sithole from the future Government of Zimbabwe. It is our firm view that every genuine nationalist leader has a role.

The choice is not between the Salisbury cover-up Agreement and the Anglo-American Proposals. The choice is simply between the Anglo-American Proposals and war.

Good progress was made in the recent round of talks in Dar-es-Salaam. All the talks attended by Secretary of State Vance, Foreign Secretary David Owen and the Patriotic Front have brought the two sides closer. We in Zambia will continue to support this initiative. The pressure should not be put on the Patriotic Front who are now the allies of the United States and Britain in the initiative. The Patriotic Front have not rejected the Anglo-American Proposals. Pressure should be put on the cover-up group in Salisbury that have rejected the proposals. I urge the powerful mass media of this country to help the United States and Britain bring pressure to bear on the signatories to the Salisbury Agreement. By this ill-fated agreement, Smith will buy the whole of 1978 and is already working out a strategy to buy 1979.

I must at this point dispel one illusion, namely, that Joshua Nkomo will return to Rhodesia to Smith's cover-up group in the rebel regime. Neither Joshua Nkomo nor Robert Mugabe will return until there is an internationally accepted agreement endorsed by the Patriotic Front spearheading the war of liberation. Efforts being made to get Mr. Nkomo back are intended to split the Patriotic Front and destroy the unity of the nationalist leaders even further. We in Zambia know it. We will not accept it.

I urge all those who desire peace and stability in Zimbabwe to work for the success of the Anglo-American initiative. Any other initiative at this time is an exercise in futility which will lead to an even greater internationalised conflict. President Carter is right to throw his whole weight behind the current initiative. Ian Smith is the stumbling block to the initiative. He must be removed. The supplies of oil by Western Oil Companies have sustained his disastrous war programme. These oil supplies must be stopped. Sanctions must be tightened to the last limit.

On Namibia, we have maintained our position: We support a negotiated settlement if possible and armed struggle if necessary. We welcomed the efforts of the Group of Five as a positive move. In our opinion their recent proposals went a very long way towards ending the conflict. But we had always suspected that Petoria will continue to pursue its own programme of creating puppet regime in Windhoek to guarantee South Africa's continued multipurpose presense in an indepednent Namibia. The recent racist acts of aggression against Angola and the massacres of so many innocent SWAPO refugees and civilians was an act of sabotage. South Africa's intention was to stop the talks on Namibia in New York. We must be careful to read Petoria's motives not from declarations but from actions. Nonetheless, we in Zambia accept the proposals of the Five in principle. We hope that the talks with SWAPO will be resumed in the near future. We, therefore, urge that pressure be brought against South Africa to end her acts of aggression against the people of Namibia as well as the people of Angola and Zambia. We welcome the international support SWAPO enjoys at the United Nations and in the world as a whole.

Apartheid South Africa is a time bomb. The final explosion cannot be too far off. The Soweto sparks were a mere prelude. The blacks in South Africa know it and accept the consequences. The whites know it too. The West knows it. Yet despite all our pleas, we cannot say there are any serious efforts to defuse the South African bomb. Time is not waiting. No one can turn the clock back. The mood of the masses in South Africa is becoming even more tense and intolerant. Non-white children increasingly see for no future themselves. A large number have fled the country as refugees in neighboring Botswana. Others are braving the brutal fascist force being exercised against them. There is only an armed peace in South Africa. Tension is rising and conflict is inevitable.

I have declared before and I repeat it now: No matter how much South Africa arms herself against external aggression, the enemy is not outside. The enemy is internal—right in the backyard and in the kitchen. The Bantustans will become liberated zones in the liberaiton struggle. The system of Apartheid is ill-conceived and ill-fated. When the explosion comes, all the investments, all the interests, all the hopes of men of goodwill, will go up in flames. Such is the future of the revolution now taking place in South Africa.

The dangerous situation is reaching critical point. American news media have a most decisive role to play. You have a moral obligation to awaken the conscience of America to this tragedy.

Finally, let me say that the Carter Administration has an excellent chance of improving the relations between Africa and Amercia. The people of this country should not lose this great chance of sharing the joy of building the edifice of peace on the foundations of freedom and justice in Africa.

Thank you.●

IN MEMORIAM: PAUL K. FROST II

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. ENGLISH) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable sadness that I rise today to join with my colleagues from Oklahoma, and from across the Nation in mourning the passing of Paul K. Frost II, in an untimely and tragic accident.

Paul has been both a close personal friend, and a valued professional associate to many of us who serve in Congress. Throughout his varied career, he never failed to uphold the highest standards of integrity and decency—both while a highly respected public servant, and during the years that he assisted the legislative process from the private sector.

He earned our trust, by always working for the public interest even while representing a specific interest or group.

He earned our respect, by his ability to work effectively within the complex legislative process.

And his sincerity, ability, and warm nature, even under the most trying circumstances earned him our close and lasting friendship.

Paul was one of the most effective, and most successful gentlemen whom I have had the honor to know, and his passing leaves our lives the poorer. Our thoughts and prayers are with his wife, Vicki, and with the family in this hour of tragedy.

Mr. Speaker, I am joined today in paying tribute to our late friend by several of my colleagues, and by Frank Moore, on behalf of the administration. I include the eulogy delivered by DeVier Pierson, and the remarks of my colleagues to be included in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
May 23, 1978.

Hon. GLENN ENGLISH,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR GLENN: I understand that you will be making some remarks in memoriam of Paul K. Frost, II, on the House floor in the near future, and I wanted to offer my support to you in that effort. It was with considerable sadness that I learned of Paul's tragic death along with three other members of his family on May 4, 1978. I have known Paul both personally and professionally over the past several years, and thought highly of him.

The circumstances of his death say a great deal about his life. He was on a vacation trip with family, being out west for a public purpose—to attend a meeting of the Board of Trustees of the Library and Museum Society of Yellowstone National Park on which he served. Paul was one of the newer breed of professionals in Washington who, while representing a private interest, kept a good conscience as to what also best served the public interest. He was loath to oppose legislation with valid public purpose, preferring instead to work closely with the Congress to correct deficiencies, clarify objectives, and work out any particular difficulties not foreseen by the dratfers. He was personal, in the sense that he recognized it was people who write our laws, and it was people to whom they utilmately applied. He was substantive in the sense that he recognized that there is no substitute for strong, unbiased, factual arguments in support of one's position. Finally, he was conciliatory, in that he recognized the art of politics to compromise, and always worked diligently to seek a middle ground.

We will miss Paul—his warm smile, his good sense of humor, his caring for others. I appreciate your taking the time to honor the memory of this fine young man, and I'm grateful to be part of that remembrance

Sincerely yours,

PAUL G. ROGERS,
Chairman.

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
May 23, 1978.

Hon. GLENN ENGLISH,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR GLENN: It is my understanding you plan to make a statement on the House floor on Wednesday, May 24 to eulogize our late good friend, Paul Frost, who was killed in a plane crash on May 4 in Wyoming. I would appreciate it if you will include my comments on your submission.

Paul's death is a terrible tragedy, occurring at a time when he had so much going for him at such an early age. Audrey and I express our deepest sympathy to his lovely wife, Vickie.

In the three years we knew Paul I was always impressed by his keen and thorough understanding of difficult economic issues, and his sound judgment on the political realities of legislating in the 1970's. He represented private interests in the best tradition of lobbying. He was a hard worker, an excellent vote counter, and his word was as good as gold. Personally, he was one of the nicest and friendliest young men we have known. He was a good friend to us and to several members of my staff. We will all miss him, but we must remember his many fine qualities and give thanks that we had the opportunity to know him as long as we did.

Thanks, Glenn, for your assistance.

Sincerely,

AL ULLMAN,
Member of Congress.

STATEMENT OF THE HONORABLE DAVID L. BOREN, GOVERNOR OF THE STATE OF OKLAHOMA

The untimely death of the Paul Frost represents a tremendous loss to all of us who were privileged to know him, as well as thousands of people in Oklahoma and across the country who were the benefactors of his insight and ability and public service.

Mr. Frost's contributions to the betterment of his fellow man were many and the effects of his actions will be evident for years to come. The respect that he engendered from those with whom he came in contact will serve as an inspiration and goal for those who will follow in his footsteps.

His passing is a personal tragedy for me, as well. It was my privilege to have known him for many years and the benefits that I have derived from our friendship will remain vividly with me thoughout the years.

If it is true that each of us should strive to leave the world better for our having passed this way, then Paul Frost attained and surpassed that goal.

MAY 23, 1978.

Hon. GLENN ENGLISH,
U.S. House of Representatives,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR GLENN: Paul Frost was an honest and decent man with a strong understanding of our government and how to make it work to meet the needs of the American people. On behalf of the Carter Administration I praise this good man and his work and join with you and others in mourning his passing.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

FRANK MOORE,
Assistant to the President for Congressional Liaison.

EULOGY FOR ALLIE DALE REYNOLDS, MICHAEL REYNOLDS, AND PAUL K. FROST II, MAY 9, 1978

When a man takes a wife he also joins a family. Thus, when Shirley and I were married over twenty-one years ago, I became part of a close and loving family which was enriched through the years with Marta's marriage to Allie, the arrival of their children and Paul's marriage to Vicki. You accept your family—as you do your wife—with the conditions imposed by the vows of matrimony—for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, in sickness and in health, to love and to cherish till death do us part.

We are now parted suddenly, albeit temporarily, from Allie, Michael and Paul. As we gather to honor them, the family has granted me the privilege of saying a few words about each.

Allie Reynolds was the most selfless person I have ever known. Some part of each day of his life was spent in assisting others. Many of us here must be thinking at this moment of the acts of kindness—large or small—that Allie has performed for each of us. No task was too small or too humble. If Allie was your friend, you knew he would always be there when you needed him.

This was no pose. Allie worked quietly and without any effort for special recognition or praise. It was simply a part of his nature that he was happiest when he was doing a good deed which would make others happy as well. He was the proverbial Good Samaritan.

Allie's life was his family. No one ever gave his wife and children more love, support and care. No family has ever been closer. They have worked together and played together. They have smiled through adversity. Their love and concern for one another has given them a special strength and unity they now must call upon to tide them through this terrible time.

Allie not only cared for his children—but for all young people. He always found time to teach and to help. Yesterday I saw a plaque hanging on the wall in Allie's office given to him almost ten years ago by the Blue Yankees, a little league team he coached to a championship. It says, To Allie:

"A hundred years from now it will not matter what my bank was, the sort of house I lived in or kind of car I drove. But the world may well be different because I was important in the life of a boy."

If this is true—and I believe it is—our world will most certainly be a different and better place. For Allie planted seeds that will grow for generations to come.

This transfer of values from generation to generation was never more evident than in the character and personality of Michael Reynolds. He was his parents' son—quiet, strong, sweet, willing and cheerful. He had the same unselfishness, the same wish to help others, and the same concern for the happiness of his family and friends. I have never heard him utter an unkind word about another person.

Most young people are loved by their own family. But Michael also had the affection of every young person's most severe critics—his own contemporaries. He was a top student and popular leader in his fraternity pledge class at OSU. On Sunday the fraternity held memorial services for him in Stillwater. Many of his fraternity brothers are here with us today. They also miss him.

Michael was intrigued by the mystery of life. As a horticulturist, he knew how to create and nurture living things. Like his seedlings, he also flourished into a manhood of character and promise. As we ponder the unfairness of this promise cut short, Michael might even remind us that the finest flower is often one of short bloom and that the memory of its beauty remains with us long after its season has passed.

Michael was not totally unprepared for death. This year he was taking a course in death and dying and was well aware of the frailty of mortality. When asked on one test—considering the ever-present possibility of death—how he would characterize his life thus far, his answer was that he had been "very fortunate." He knew that those who live together in happiness, however short the time, are indeed the fortunate ones.

I loved Paul Frost very much. I have watched Paul grow from childhood to manhood and into professional success. He has been at once my son, my brother, my good friend and my professional colleague. Paul and Vicki are our Washington family. Because Paul has been away from Oklahoma for so long, it is especially important that all who are here today know more about him.

Wherever Paul went in Washington, he excelled. When he was in the government, he soon acquired a reputation as a man of special capacity and judgment. When he joined one of the world's great corporations, those who worked with him have affirmed that he had the capacity to reach the ranks of its senior management. In the last few months, he was offered a partnership—an opportunity sought by many but instead offered to Paul without effort on his part—in one of Washington's most prestigious consulting firms. He worked with and was admired by many of the great public men of our time. Paul had achieved more at the age of 34 than most men ever achieve.

The beauty of Paul's success was that it did not come at the expense of his character or ideals. Paul knew how to do his work in a calm, efficient way in which he did not need to lose friends to win causes. No one was pushed out of the way. There were no ethical compromises.

Paul's colleagues—a number of whom have come today from Washington and New York to honor his memory—knew he was a special person and loved him as we do. They know that he did not leave us before he had made his mark.

Paul also received the greatest gift that can be bestowed upon any man—the deep and constant love of a good woman. Vicki was Paul's companion in his life's work as well as in marriage. She strengthened and inspired him. Most of all, she gave him happiness.

And so these three men and Vicki's brother Jack—bound together by ties of family and friendship—shared life's final experience as they had shared so many happinesses in life. Shakespeare told us of such men when he said:

"We few, we happy few, we band of brothers; for he today that sheds his blood with me shall be my brother."

Those of us who have lost this band of brothers must now look for comfort and strength.

For those parents who have lost a son, there is the comfort that the son they brought into this world grew to manhood as a fine and decent person who commanded the respect and affection of those around him.

For those who lost a brother, there is the comfort that there was a loving relationship between brother and sister and brother and brother—and that the happy experience of growing up together will never be erased.

For those who have lost a husband, there is the comfort that they had a love and companionship of a quality which rarely exists between man and wife.

Life is after all a long chain of memories—some beautiful and some ugly, some bitter and some sweet. Because of the quality of their lives, our memories of Allie, Michael and Paul will be warm, happy and beautiful. These memories will support this brave family as they draw closer together to renew their own lives. And, while the loss is deep, we will always be grateful for the glory of these years together.

W. DeVier Pierson, May 9, 1978.

Mr. STEED. Mr. Speaker, it is always difficult to offer a eulogy for a friend, especially one so young and full of life as my fellow Oklahoman, Paul K. Frost II, who died tragically in an airplane crash on May 4, 1978.

Many of my colleagues will remember Paul as an aide for former Oklahoma Senator Mike Monroney, as assistant director for Federal Government relations with the Union Carbide Corp., or in his recent transfer to the Charles E. Walker Associates, Inc., as a senior associate.

My personal memories will be of an energetic young man who willingly accepted challenge with rare determination and whose unselfish contributions to the Oklahoma State Society of Washington, D.C., added significantly to its success and strength.

To his wife, Vicki, I extend my heartfelt sympathy, and I want to assure her that all of us who knew Paul so well share in her loss.

Mr. JONES of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, it came as a great shock to learn of the untimely death of a fellow Oklahoman and friend, Paul Frost. All of us who knew Paul feel the loss and share in the tragedy of his passing from the scene so abruptly.

Paul was a mover and a shaker of events. Throughout the years, I was always impressed with the manner in which he approached every job he undertook. Paul has an uncanny grasp of the issues, and a thorough knowledge of the facts upon which to base his decisions or offer advice to those who sought his informed counsel. Paul was not a mere technician; he was a warm human being who loved life and wanted to do his part to make things better for everyone.

Paul was concerned with building, not destroying. His service to the country stretched from his time on the staff of Senator Mike Monroney to his most recent work in the private sector. Like the many other friends Paul had, I have many memories of the help and personal kindnesses Paul extended to me. He was always there with the right answer, a helpful suggestion, or just a kind word when the occasion called for such assistance. I will miss him.

It would be possible to fill up pages listing Paul's attributes and how sorely he will be missed, but somehow, I do not think he would prefer that sort of praise. It was always enough for him to know that he had done a good job on whatever task he set his mind to accomplishing. That is a rare quality in any person, and one that needs no further praise.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, though I regret the occasion of these remarks, I am honored to have the opportunity today to pay tribute to the late Paul Frost, a good friend and a tireless worker. I came to know Paul, as I am sure many of my colleagues did, through his endeavors here on the Hill. The professionalism that he brought to the job of representing the concerns of private corporations gave special meaning to the term Government relations. Paul was always as ready to listen to my reservations about legislation as he was to adovcate his company's position. This willingness to give due consideration to both sides of an issue is a quality that all of us who serve in or work with the Congress would do well to possess. My staff and I join Vicki and Paul's family, as well as his many, many friends, in remembering the vibrant spirit and personal dedication that Paul demonstrated every day of his life. What a privilege it has been to know this young man.

Mr. RISENHOOVER. Mr. Speaker, among the fundamental rights of our Government is the freedom to petition the Government for a redress of grievances. The great art is doing it effectively.

Early this month, our Nation lost one of the fine practitioners of that art. Paul Frost, an associate of Charls Walker and former representative of Union Carbide Corp., died in a plane crash along with three other men.

Paul came to Washington from Oklahoma as an aide to Senator Monroney. He enjoyed a fine professional reputation in the Senate and later as a representative of business. He was responsible, truthful, and knowledgeable. More, he was a friend. We miss him greatly.

Mr. JENRETTE. Mr. Speaker, there are many marks made by men upon the world, some are bold and brilliant, others are a softer blend, a tangible touch of excellence and warmth that keep coming back to mind like the remembrance of a warm spring day.

Paul Frost exemplified the best of the blend of human nature. His life was like an illuminating light which reflected his kindness and warmth. He encouraged the efforts of his family and encircled his friends with his spirit and cheer.

Washington can sometimes be a difficult environment in which to make true friends. However, Paul Frost was one man Rita and I considered a close friend. He had none of the pretension which generally goes hand in hand with the Washington scene. He was intelligent, kind, warm, and genuine. Paul and Vickie Frost were our close friends. We will miss his warm smile and gentle spirit.

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, we have recently lost one of the finest young men it has been my pleasure to know.

Paul Frost was an Oklahoman by marriage, a man who came to exemplify all of the fine qualities we Okies are so proud of in our people. The airplane crash that took his life was a tragedy not only because it took life, but because it ended what would have been an unusual life, full of continued accomplishment.

To reflect on what Paul Frost meant is to understand the difference between a life lived casually and a life with purpose and achievement. Paul was a bright young man, with a lively, good mind, and with a sense of life that made him stand out in any environment.

In the last couple of years I had come to know Paul Frost and to respect him tremendously. His absence will be very clearly noticed, and he will be missed.

EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. DINGELL) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to indicate how I would have voted were I present on the House floor for the last recorded vote on May 18 and subsequent votes on May 19 on the Alaska national interest lands conservation bill. I would have voted "nay" on roll No. 335, an amendment which would have reduced the total acreage within the national park and wildlife refuge system by 5 million acres to permit State selections. I would have voted "nay" on roll No. 336, an amendment which would have reduced wilderness from 66 million to 33 million acres. I would have voted "yea" on roll No. 338 which would allow for a continuation of minerals assessment on conservation units in Alaska. I would have voted "nay" on roll No. 339 which would have recommitted the bill to the Interior Committee and Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee. Finally, I would have voted "yea" on roll No. 340—final passage of the bill. I certainly regret that a previous commitment necessitated my absence on these very important votes.●

NCOA TO HONOR CONGRESSMAN BENNETT WITH ITS 1978 "L. MENDEL RIVERS AWARD"

(Mr. PRICE asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I am honored to announce that our colleague, my friend, and fellow member of the Committee on Armed Services, the Honorable CHARLES E. BENNETT of Florida, has been selected by the Non Commissioned Officers Association of the U.S.A. (NCOA) to receive this year's "L. Mendel Rivers Award for Legislative Action."

The award, a most coveted one I might add, is presented to a Member of Congress who, in the opinion of the association's directors, is worthy of recognition for his or her efforts in furthering the ideals of democracy, freedom, and patriotism on behalf of our beloved Nation.

There were not too many who can match CHARLIE BENNETT'S scoreboard in these testimonial manifestations of our American heritage. He believes fully in maintaining a Government by the people. He votes this way. And what an enviable record he possesses. In what will soon be 27 years he has never missed a legislative vote.

When it comes to freedom, CHARLIE has few peers. He fights hard and long for a strong defense posture. As chairman of the Subcommittee on Seapower and Strategic and Critical Materials, he continually seeks better ways to keep our naval forces second to none—and to insure adequate protection of the sealanes bringing the needed strategic and critical materials into the United States. Truly, he is "Mr. Seapower" in Congress.

As for patriotism—let us look at the record:

Enlisted March 13, 1942, and served 58 months in Infantry in World War II, including guerrilla combat in the Philippines; awarded Silver Star, Bronze Star, Combat Infantry Badge, Philippine Legion of Honor, Gold Cross for gallantry in action, and French Chevalier de la Legion d'Honneur; discharged as Captain January 13, 1947, elected to Infantry Hall of Fame, Fort Benning Officer Candidate School.

As a civilian he also has distinguished himself. CHARLIE has been the recipient of, among many, the Izaak Walton League Award, Distinguished Service Award from Jacksonville (Fla.) University, Significant Alumni Award from the University of Florida, Distinguished Eagle Scout Award, Distinguished Service Award from the President's Committee on Employment of the Handicapped 1969, Good Government Award, and the 1978 Man of the Year Award from the Reserve Officer's Association.

So it is, without reservation, time to salute our Florida colleague for the outstanding work he has done for our country and, God willing, will continue to do for many years to come.

It is time to render a salute to this honest and capable legislator who believes that democracy and freedom are protected by those who serve their Nation in uniform in war and in peace.

It is he that said:

America's attitude toward the military man must be improved. . . . In spite of all the sacrifices that are made by these people, there is constant nitpicking about commissaries, medical benefits, double-dipping, and the Civil Service practice of giving veterans a five-point advantage on examinations. . . . It is sad that we are not doing more to show our gratitude to the people in the service.

So, to my dear friend, CHARLIE, I say, congratulations. You truly deserve the honor.

In behalf of the association's previous winners—the Honorable Messrs. STROM THURMOND and JOHN TOWER of the U.S. Senate; F. Edward Hébert and Thomas N. Downing, Members of Congress, both now retired; and BOB WILSON and myself—I welcome you aboard to the NCOA's "Hall of Legislative Fame."●

LAST HOPE FOR UNDERSTANDING BETWEEN TURKEY AND THE UNITED STATES

(Mr. SIKES asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the Record and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, the presence of Turkey's Prime Minister Ecevit for the NATO Summit Conference now in progress in Washington may present the last real hope for achievement of a better understanding between the United States and Turkey. The Prime Minister's speech at the summit conference should leave no doubts that Turkey recognizes the essentiality of self-preservation; feels that they are being slighted by other NATO members, and particularly by the United States, and that they must make an accommodation for the procurement of weapons needed for their own protection.

Turkey's forces, among the largest in NATO, occupy one of the most strategic positions in that organization. Turkey provides the anchor of the southern flank of NATO. Greece would be left defenseless without Turkish participation in NATO. Italy, the eastern Mediterranean, and the oil rich nations of the Middle East would be open to Russian aggression.

The Turkish forces are largely equipped with U.S. weapons. No other NATO country is in position to supply weapons and spares in the quantities needed to insure continued effectiveness of the Turkish forces.

Russia, which has unlimited weapons for disposal, is taking advantage of every opportunity to establish better relations with the Turks, and they are making some progress.

Congress established an embargo on arms to Turkey and must accept the responsibility for the present impasse. However, if the problem is to be relieved, it is essential that the administration provide much greater emphasis on a solution than has yet been forthcoming.

The Christian Science Monitor on May 19 discussed the matter in clear terms in an editorial entitled, "Carter and the Turks." I submit it for reprinting in the RECORD.

The article follows:

[From the Christian Science Monitor, May 19, 1978]

CARTER AND THE TURKS

President Carter has a host of foreign policy problems but none more serious now than the question of Turkey's weakened role in NATO. So far he has not given this matter top priority. The Panama treaties and the Middle East arms package consumed his energies in Congress. But now that the day has been won on these issues, it is indispensable that the President similarly pull out all stops in an effort to get Congress to lift the U.S. arms embargo on Turkey. No less is at stake than the strength and stability of the Western alliance in the face of growing Soviet assertiveness.

It is ironic that at a time when the Russians are exploiting fresh opportunities to extend their influence—in Africa, the Middle East, Afghanistan—the U.S. Congress is helping them. For that in effect is what it is doing. Washington's European allies alone seem to understand that if Turkey is not soon helped to improve its deteriorating defenses, the whole southeastern flank of NATO, now a strategic Mediterranean buffer between the Soviet Union and the Middle East and between East and West, will be softened. Already the United States has had to shut down some of its military installations in Turkey.

Turkish Prime Minister Bulent Ecevit does not go so far as to suggest that Turkey will pull out of the alliance. But, under growing pressures at home, he is being forced to look to other alternatives if the U.S. Congress continues its myopic policy. He has told Mr. Carter that Ankara will not sign a joint statement on NATO's future at the upcoming summit in Washington and he hints that Turkey will reduce the size of its armed forces (it now has the second-largest standing army in NATO).

That may sound like arm-twisting to some, but, in Mr. Ecevit's eyes, things look quite different. Failure of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee to end the embargo, imposed when Turkish troops occupied northern Cyprus has had serious repercussions in Turkey. Many Turks feel that they are being treated like second-class citizens, that the West does not appreciate them, and therefore they that they should perhaps stand all alone, bolstering their ties with the nonaligned world and—yes—with the Soviet Union.

On the Cyprus issue the Turks believe they have put forward reasonable opening proposals. UN Secretary-General Kurt Waldheim in fact termed them concrete and substantial, but the Greek Cypriots refuse to talk now—a stance Ankara views suspiciously as tied to a desire to keep the pro-Greek deadlock in Congress.

Whether these suspicions are true or not, the American lawmakers can be faulted for playing politics instead of pursuing principle. It is no secret that the pro-Greek lobby is highly organized and cohesive. It has influence over some important congressional posts and its financial support of Democrats and Republicans alike is a matter of public record.

Can it be doubted that the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and other members of Congress would view the situation differently if, instead of the pro-Greek chorus, pro-Turkish voices were heard in the land? To Turkey's disadvantage, there are few such. Hence President Carter faces a tough task in persuading the lawmakers to be ruled by good sense and patriotism rather than their political emotions. He managed this admirably well in the case of the Mideast arms deal. For the first time the power of the Jewish lobby in the Congress was broken because of a perceived overriding national interest.

This must be the touchstone in the Turkish arms issue as well. There is no rationale in sounding the alarm about the Soviet Union's inroads around the world and growing challenge to the West—when the West itself does not keep its house in order.●

NEW OPPORTUNITY TO IMPROVE NATO

(Mr. SIKES asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, the opening session of the North Atlantic Alliance Summit in Washington was an exciting occasion and, in my opinion, a productive one. It is very unusual for the leaders of so many of the world's important nations to participate in a Conference. It is a very unusual privilege to have an opportunity to meet with and talk with such a group. The session was opened by President Carter. He was followed by Prime Minister Ecevit of Turkey and by Secretary General Luns of Belgium. The opening session was held in the Kennedy Center. Subsequently, meetings were continued at the White House, the State Department, and other agencies of Government.

President Carter's talk stressed America's interest in NATO and again pointed to the strong support being given by our country. The United States is doing more than other nations in NATO, and the basic military strength of the alliance is provided by the United States and Germany. Other nations, however, are responding in a more realistic way to the need for a stronger NATO. It is reassuring to note the President's continued emphasis, in addition to NATO, to the threat posed by Russian-Cuban aggression in Africa. This is a very real threat to the future security of the United States and the free world because of the dangers posed to free world shipping of oil and minerals. If Russia can control the sealanes around Africa, there will be a new threat of an actual loss of essential minerals and oil to American and free world industry.

In the meantime, it will be noted that Russia has offered new bait for progress in disarmament talks. They propose to give up weapons they do not have and do not need if the United States and our allies will forgo weapons we now have or that are being developed and which we definitely need. This is a typical Russian ploy. It is to be hoped that we will not allow ourselves to be taken in by this flimsy strategy.●

CARTER-HEW ATTEMPT TO END RUN TUITION TAX CREDITS A SHAM

(Mr. ASHBROOK asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, middle class parents are so burdened by taxation and rising prices today that it is becoming impossible for many working people and small professional people to send their children through school and college. A large part of the reason for this is the huge tax burden we have placed upon middle-income Americans. These taxes, in turn, pay for the public assistance programs which are sending the children of lower income parents to college. The rich are helped very minimally by these credits, despite the arguments of our opponents.

The middle income American, who has few tax deductions, and whose salary is openly earned and honestly reported, is therefore left to pay for the huge programs which send lower-income students to school. But that is not all he has to pay for. The actual aid to poor students is only a part of the cost of programs of this sort. Taxes also pay for the huge number of bureaucrats who administer these programs, and for the cheats and frauds who make use of these programs as well. As a result, the middle class parent must try to send his own children to school while paying for the education of poor children, a huge staff of bureaucratic administrators, and for a huge number of outright frauds. HEW admitted recently that it had been defrauded of at least $6 billion last year alone.

Between 1967 and 1976, the cost of sending a student through college has risen by 77 percent. The average cost of a 4-year college program is about $30,000, and is rising rapidly. To a middle-income parent, with neither the rich man's income nor the poor parent's public aid program to fall back on, and with the immense tax burden he faces, the education of several children presents an enormous financial burden. I have been fighting to give the middle income tax payer relief to face this burden ever since I entered the Congress.

During my first year in the House of Representatives, I introduced a bill providing, "That 2 per centum of all income taxes collected on individual incomes under Federal statutes" be given to the States, without any strings, to be used for educational purposes. The Federal educational bureaucracy and the national education lobby objected violently, because such a bill would have given money directly to the States without any chance of producing the bureaucratic empire that HEW has developed.

In 1965, seeing the burden building up more and more specifically on the middle income taxpayer, I introduced a tax credit plan to help parents in this income group to send their children to college. It provided that a taxpayer be allowed, * * * an amount * * * equal to the aggregate amount paid during such taxable year by such individual to one or more institutions of higher education as tuition for the education of such individual or his spouse, or any person with respect to whom he is entitled for the taxable year to an exemption * * * at a level above the 12th grade.

As I expected, I was solidly and passionately opposed by the liberal education lobby and the full force of the Federal educational bureaucracy. I was not at all surprised, because groups like the National Education Association and the educational bureaucrats have consistently shown a far greater interest in building a bigger, ever more powerful bureaucratic domain than they have in the betterment of the school system or the preferences of middle-income taxpayers. Nor did the Washington educational establishment formulate even a token substitute for my legislation aimed at helping the overburdened middle-class parent. They simply beat back my attempts through their liberal majorities in Congress, and ignored the burdened middle class altogether.

It was therefore a shock for me to hear HEW Secretary Califano state before the House Education and Labor Committee that "President Carter is committed to increasing student financial aid for middle-income families with children in college," and to follow this up with the statement that, "There should be no doubt that a President sits in the White House who cares deeply about the quality of education in America." These statements give one the distinct impression that Mr. Carter cares about the school cost burdens of middle-class parents. The fact is that Mr. Carter, like other establishment liberals, has ignored this problem. The hastily thrown together boondoggle which the administration has presented to Congress was not even thought of until it was clear that voter unrest was overcoming liberal legislators' obstinacy on tax credit relief.

The time has come for relief of the educational burden of middle-income parents. A President sits in the White House whose only concern is to be sure that this relief is funneled through and controlled by Mr. Califano's bureaucratic empire.

Mr. Califano's arguments in favor of HEW's grab for control of this program are as shabby a patchwork as is the administration program itself. Mr. Califano is the head of a department which admits to having been defrauded of over $6 billion last year. Yet he has the gall to insist that a program that the same department does not administer "will lead to increased administrative burdens, confusion, and complexity." Surely he does not expect anyone to believe that his bureaucratic nightmare at HEW will do an efficient job. IRS needs only to follow the rules it has already set up for over a generation to determine the tax deductible status of schools in order to determine school eligibility for tuition tax credits, while HEW would issue books of new regulations if the new program Califano proposes goes through.

One need only look at the official February 16 HEW report on its administration of the guaranteed student loan program, the national direct student loan program, and the basic educational opportunity grant program, if he wants to see some horror stories involving "administrative burdens, confusion, and complexity"—not to mention simple incompetence. It is an act of real desperation for a Cabinet official to testify that this same agency is a guarantee of efficiency.

Another argument of transparent desperation made by Califano is his repeated indication that enoromously rich people will somehow rob the Treasury of substantial sums by sending their children through school. First of all, very few enormously wealthy people have children of school age. It is not worth public funds to put the entire program under HEW in order to weed out those few. Secondly, given that there is a limit on every proposal for tuition credits of a few hundred dollars per child, how much can these few very wealthy parents actually save by this means? The bureaucratic morass which would administer the program under the Carter-Califano plan would be far more expensive—and far more oppressive—than a straightforward tuition tax credit.

Nor can one take seriously Califano's statement that Attorney General Griffin Bell agrees with Mr. Carter that tuition credits are unconstitutional. This is hardly a surprise. Mr. Bell thought that discrimination against Alan Bakke was unconstitutional, but switched his position without hesitation when his superiors told him to opine otherwise. Mr. Bell thought that school "pairing" as an excuse to use money for busing, directly against explicit congressional prohibition, was illegal. He changed his mind instantly when Mr. Califano told him to. The Attorney General has not shown the slightest hint of any independent judgment on the law or the Constitution since becoming the Carter administration's family lawyer.

In only one area does Mr. Califano's testimony come close to expressing the administration's true reasons for opposing tuition tax credits. He speaks of "fragmenting education policy," of tax credits being a "blunt instrument." What all this means, in plain English, is that tuition tax credits are a direct challenge to HEW's bureaucratic stranglehold on our educational system. Tuition tax credits would take money and power from the bureaucrats and give it to the people. Parents would be allowed to make their own educational choices for their own children.

Parental control of education is the one thing the Federal bureaucracy strives day and night to prevent. If the parents can make their own choices, who can be forced to support the expensive drones who rule our educational system from Washington? The Carter-Califano boondoggle which masquerades as an alternative to tuition grants would give the Federal educational empire another small plum, whereas the tuition credit system might be the first step in a national declaration of independence from Congress' disgraceful years as unquestioning servant of the national education lobbyists.

It is clear for all to see that the time for tuition tax credits has come. When I began in this fight there were few of us willing to see the educational policy conducted from Washington as the failure it was. With the pressure groups in the driver's seat and the public not yet aroused against this costly disaster, the majority of my colleagues continued to knuckle under with little protest to the demands of lobbying powers like the National Education Association. But here as elsewhere the liberal experiment has failed. Only the last ditch true believers, like Califano and Carter, will not admit this fact.

Rebellion is underway. Contrary to what his HEW Secretary would have us believe, only this rebellion has forced President Carter out of his original opposition stand against help to middle income parents. Faced with this revolt Carter and Califano threw together another standard Federal education boondoggle to substitute for tuition tax credits. By a vote of 14 to 1, the Senate Finance Committee told the administration it would have no part of this shabby subterfuge.

Carter's fight against tuition tax credits is but another example of his die-hard stand for bureaucracy against public interest and the popular will. Once again, as in his stand for busing, as in his fight for reverse discrimination, Carter is showing himself to be the last absolute true believer in the dead pseudo-theology of liberalism in a nation which has grown out of that nonsense.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

(Mr. MIKVA asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD.)

● Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably absent from the floor during part of the session on Thursday, May 25, 1978, and missed several rollcall votes as a result. Had I been present, I would have voted as follows:

Roll No. 375, the rule for consideration of H.R. 7814, "yes";

Roll No. 376, to resolve into a Committee of the Whole for consideration of H.R. 7814, "yes";

Roll No. 377, for approval of H.R. 7814, "yes";

Roll No. 379, an amendment to H.R. 9400 by Mr. RAILSBACK, "yes."●

TUITION TAX CREDITS

(Mr. MIKVA asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. MIKVA. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow, Thursday, the House will vote on an amendment to be offered by Mr. KETCHUM and me to the Tuition Tax Credit Act. Our amendment would substitute a tax deferral for the tax credit contained in H.R. 12050. Mr. KETCHUM and I have recently received a letter from COPUS, the Coalition of Independent College and University Students, supporting our amendment, and we would like to share it with the other Members of the House. We think the letter from COPUS accurately states the benefits of tax deferral over the $100 tax credit of H.R. 12050. Following is the letter from the national director of COPUS, Lawrence Zaglaniczny:

THE COALITION OF INDEPENDENT COLLEGE AND UNIVERSITY STUDENTS,
Washington, D.C., May 31, 1978.

To: CONGRESSMAN ABNER J. MIKVA, CONGRESSMAN WILLIAM M. KETCHUM.

From: Lawrence S. Zaglaniczny, National Director.

Subject: Mikva-Ketchum Tuition Tax Deferral Substitute to H.R. 12050.

DEAR CONGRESSMEN: On behalf of the Coalition of Independent College and University Students (COPUS), I would like to inform you of our strong support for the amendment you will be offering to H.R. 12050, the Tuition Tax Credit bill. Our organization represents over one hundred student chapters enrolling some half-million students who attend private colleges and universities across the nation.

While we are absolute in our desire for increased Federal student assistance, we have polled our membership and they have informed our Washington office that they much prefer your tax deferral substitute instead of tuition tax credits. Many of these students attend independent colleges that charge more than three or four thousand dollars a year in tuition and they favor your substitute for the following reasons:

1. The Mikva-Ketchum substitute will provide more significant aid to students and their parents, than tax credits. A $250 tuition tax credit is not sufficient relief to those individuals attending expensive private colleges. The Mikva-Ketchum substitute will allow taxpayers to defer up to $2,000 in taxes per year per student. With high tuitions in the private higher education sector, the ability of a taxpayer to obtain such relief, as provided by your amendment, is of more consequence compared to the small benefit given by a tax credit. The Mikva-Ketchum substitute will provide ten times more relief than tax credits.

2. Tuition tax credit proponents suggest that the competitive balance may be restored between the public and private higher education sectors, because of the credit. We cannot understand how a $250 tax credit will make a difference in the college selection process when a student decides between a low tuition public school and a high tuition cost independent college. If the tax system is to be used as a means to encourage enrollment, then a $250 tax credit is of minimal importance in the selection of a college compared to the great liquidity Mikva-Ketchum provides parents at the time they need substantial aid. Your substitute is a more compelling means of aid to parents and their children in assisting them to select what college to attend and how to pay for that college education without going bankrupt. Tax credits do not come close to providing the liquidity needed by an individual in order to pay for college.

Finally, your amendment will be self-sufficient and revolving eventually resulting in no revenue loss to the Treasury. Since it is a tax deferral plan the initial loss of revenue would be replaced once the taxpayer began to repay their tax deferral. The modest three percent interest rate will cover the administrative costs to the government in managing the program.

Again, Congressman Mikva and Congressman Ketchum, the Coalition of Independent College and University Students strongly support your substitute tax deferral plan as a more beneficial means of aiding the middle-income parent with students in college, than tuition tax credits. We thank you both and appreciate your offering this meaningful alternative. We urge all Members of the House to vote for the Mikva-Ketchum substitute.

Sincerely,

LAWRENCE S. ZAGLANICZNY,
National Director.●

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS

Under clause 2 of rule XIII, reports of committees were delivered to the Clerk for printing and reference to the proper calendar, as follows:

[Pursuant to the order of the House on May 25, 1978, the following report was filed on May 26, 1978]

Mr. ZABLOCKI: Committee on International Relations. House Resolution 1194. Resolution expressing the sense of the House that until the testimony of Kim Dong Jo is made available under oath to the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, the transfer of anything of value to the Republic of Korea for nonmilitary purposes should be made only where the refusal to do so would imperil the national security of the United States or the territorial integrity of the Republic of Korea; and that refusal of the United States to make such transfers, would not, under present circumstances imperil the national security of the United States or the territorial integrity of the Republic of Korea; with amendment (Rept. No. 95–1222). Referred to the House Calendar.

[Submitted May 31, 1978]

Mr. BENNETT: Committee on Armed Services. H.R. 9486. A bill to authorize a contribution by the United States to the Tin Buffer Stock established under the Fifth International Tin Agreement; with amendment (Rept. No. 95–1057, Pt. II). Ordered to be printed.

Mr. STAGGERS: Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. Supplemental report on H.R. 11622 (Rept. No. 95–1167, Pt. II). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. MAHON: Committee on Appropriations. House Joint Resolution 944. Joint resolution making urgent grain inspection supplemental appropriations for the Department of Agriculture, Federal Grain Inspection Service, for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978 (Rept. No. 95–1223). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. MAHON: Committee on Appropriations. Report on subdivision to Subcommittees of Budget totals agreed to in First Concurrent Resolution on the Budget (S. Con. Res. 80) for fiscal year 1979 (Rept. No. 95–1224). Referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union.

Mr. ROBERTS: Committee on Veterans' Affairs. H.R. 10173. A bill to amend title 38, United States Code, to improve the pension programs for veterans, and survivors of veterans, of the Mexican border period, World War I, World War II, the Korean conflict, and the Vietnam era, and for other purposes; with amendment (Rept. (b) No State or local educational agency located therein shall, on the basis of noncompliance with standards established by regulations prescribed pursuant to section 5(d)(2) of the Act of September 30, 1950 (Public Law 874, Eighty-first Congress), be required to make restitution of funds distributed to local educational agencies under such Act for the 1977–1978 school year if such State has an equalization program which, for the 1978–1979 school year, complies with such standards.

H.R. 15

By Mr. KILDEE:

—On page 100 add at the end of section 133 (b): "Such standards will be developed only after widespread consultation and hearings with practicing state and local agency evaluators, and the Commissioner's standards will reflect the input of these groups".

—On page 100 strike out section 133(c) and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The Commissioner shall consult with state and local educational agencies in order to provide for jointly sponsored objective evaluation studies of prorgams and projects assisted under this title within a state".

H.R. 15

By Mr. ROSE:

—Page 315, strike out line 22 and everything that follows through line 25.

Redesignate the following section and conform the table of contents accordingly.

—Page 315, strike out lines 23 through 25 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(b) Effective October 1, 1983, section 453 (1) of such Act is amended by striking out "or in the future".

H.R. 15

By Mr. SIMON:

—On page 32 strike lines 21 through 23 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(A) the number of children counted under section 11(c) for local educational agencies in such county for the preceding fiscal year exceeds five thousand, which constitutes at least 10 per centum of the total enrollment in such county for such fiscal year, or"

H.R. 15

By Mr. VENTO:

—On page 28, line 21 insert immediately after "41(b)" "or if a local educational agency has in effect for that fiscal year a program for educationally deprived children which meets the requirements of section 41(b)"

On page 28, line 24 insert immediately after "State" "or local educational agency"

On page 29, line 9 insert immediately after "State" "or local educational agency"

—On page 33, strike out lines 8 through 14 and insert:

"(A) the number of children counted under section 11(c) for the preceding fiscal year in the school districts of local educational agencies in such county for such preceding fiscal year, and".

—On page 142, strike out lines four through 10 and insert:

"(B) pilot grants to local education agencies to operate early childhood and family education programs. Early childhood and family education programs are programs for children before kindergarten and below age six which may include the following: identification of potential barriers to learning, education of parents on child development, libraries of education materials, family services, education for parenthood in secondary schools, in-center activity, home-based programs, and referral services.

"(i) The State education agency shall prescribe the form and manner of application and shall determine the participating pilot programs. (I) Grants for such pilot programs shall be awarded only to local education agencies otherwise receiving funds under this act. (II) The State education agency shall distribute such grants as equally as possible among urban, suburban, and rural local education agencies.

"(ii) Each local education agency receiving a grant for a pilot program shall establish and maintain an account separate from all other accounts for the receipt and disbursement of all funds related to its early childhood and family education program.

"(iii) A local education agency may charge reasonable fees for early childhood and family education services; however, such fee shall be waived if any child, his parents, or guardian is unable to pay it.

"(iv) The local education agency shall designate a specific portion of the area it serves to determine the eligibility of parents and their children to receive services from the program in its application to the state education agency. Within that designated area, all participation by parents and children in its early childhood and family education program shall be voluntary, and shall not preclude participation in any other federal, state or local program. Each early childhood and family education program shall provide services to children and their parents in the designated area without regard to race, religion, ethnic background, and family income, and no program service shall be used in whole or in part for religious worship or instruction.

"(v) The local education agency shall appoint an advisory committee with a majority of parents participating in the early childhood and family education program. The advisory committee shall report at least annually to local education agency advisory councils established pursuant to Section 35 of this act.

"(vi) The State education agency shall annually review the local early childhood and family education programs, and may conduct research to compare their relative cost-effectiveness with other local and state education programs, including elementary and secondary school services supported by this act and special education services, and identify whether benefits accruing to children in elementary and secondary grades are increased by the provision of early childhood and family education services."

H.R. 12157

By Mr. EVANS of Delaware:

—Page 4, strike lines 7 through 13 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"(8) In no event shall the Bank guarantee, insure or extend credit or participate in the extension of credit (a) in support of any export which would contribute to enabling the government of the Republic of South Africa to maintain or enforce apartheid; (b) in support of any export to the government of the Republic of South Africa or its agencies unless the President determines that significant progress toward the elimination of apartheid has been made and transmits to the Congress a statement describing and explaining that determination; or (c) in support of any export to other purchasers in the Republic of South Africa unless the United States Secretary of State certifies that the purchaser has endorsed the following principles: non-segregation of the races in all work facilities; equal and fair employment for all employees; equal pay for equal work for all employees; initiation and development of training programs to prepare nonwhite South Africans for supervisory, administrative, clerical and technical jobs; increasing the number of non-whites in management and supervisory positions; and improving the quality of life for employees in such areas as housing, transportation, schooling, recreation and health facilities."

H.R. 12250

By Mr. OBERSTAR:

(Amendment in the nature of a substitute)—Strike all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

SECTION 1. The Congress finds that it is necessary to provide for orderly management of the lakes, waterways, and associated forested areas known as the Boundary Waters Canoe Area (hereinafter in this Act referred to as the BWCA) so as to provide for the widest public use and enjoyment of the area, primarily as wilderness, and to assure protection of the area's primitive character.

SEC. 2. It is the purpose of this Act to provide for such measures respecting the BWCA as will—

(1) maintain high water quality in such area, and protect against chemical degradation,

(2) protect the natural character and environmental quality of lakes, streams, shorelines in such area,

(3) assure access to such area by all Americans, including senior citizens and the handicapped,

(4) prevent the exploitation of mineral resources throughout the area,

(5) provide for the optimum management of fish and wildlife in such area and enhance the recreational enjoyment of such resources, including fishing and hunting,

(6) prevent further road development throughout the area, and restore existing roads in the area to a natural condition.

SEC. 3. (a) The Secretary shall administer the BWCA in accordance with the provisions of this Act, the Wilderness Act, and in accordance with other laws, rules, and regulations generally applicable to areas designated as wilderness, except that any reference to motorboats in section (4)(d)(1) of the Wilderness Act shall not apply to the BWCA.

(b) Paragraph (5) of section 4(d) of the Wilderness Act is hereby repealed and paragraphs (6), (7), and (8) of such section 4(d) are hereby redesignated as paragraphs (5), (6), and (7).

SEC. 4. (a) The use of motorboats and snowmobiles shall be permitted by the Secretary in the areas within the BWCA designated for such use on the map entitled "Motor Recreation Zones—Boundary Waters Canoe Area" dated April 1978. The use of motorboats and snowmobiles under this subsection shall be subject to such reasonable rules and regulations as the Secretary deems necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act.

(b) In administering the areas in which the use of motorboats is permitted under subsection (a), the Secretary shall not impose any horsepower limitation on outboard motors which are ten horsepower or less except that in the case of the following lakes, the Secretary shall impose no horsepower limitation on outboard motors which are twenty-five horsepower or less:

Trout.
Lac La Croix.
Fall.
Newton.
Brasswood.
Moose.
Newfound.
Birch.
Sucker.
Snowbank.
Saganaga.
Seagull.
Brule.
East Bearskin.
Clearwater.
Pine.

(c) Nothing in this section shall be construed to provide that mechanical portages necessary to serve motor routes permitted in the BWCA shall not be permitted to remain in operation.

(d) In establishing limitation on outboard motors used on canoe towboats and utility boats, the Secretary shall consider—

(A) the size of any lake on which any such boat primarily will be used, and

(B) the size of any motor necessary to provide towing or utility service.

SEC. 5. (a) In addition to any other applicable prohibition or withdrawal from entry or appropriation under any provision of the Wilderness Act or under any other provision of law, no permit, lease, or other authorization may be issued by any agency or authority of the United States for—

(1) exploration for, or mining of, minerals owned by the United States within the BWCA; or

(2) the use of land owned by the United States in relation to any mining or exploration for minerals in the BWCA.

The prohibitions contained in this subsection and any withdrawal from entry or appropriation for mining or exploration for minerals applicable to the BWCA shall not apply to the extent specifically provided in legislation enacted by the United States after the date of enactment of this Act pursuant to a national emergency declared by the President.

(b) The provisions of paragraphs (2) and (3) of section 4(d) of the Wilderness Act (78 Stat. 890; 16 U.S.C. 1133d(5)) shall not apply to the BWCA.

(c) The Secretary is authorized and directed to acquire any minerals or mineral rights alleged to be owned by persons other than the Federal or State governments in the following manner—

(1) The Secretary first shall seek to acquire these minerals or mineral rights by donation. In seeking a donation, the Secretary shall inform the person alleging the ownership interest of the procedures and limitations to be followed in acquisition by purchase as set forth in paragraph (2) below.

(2) If the person alleging the ownership interest does not donate his minerals or mineral rights to either the Federal or State governments, the Secretary shall acquire the rights by purchase, within the limits of funds appropriated for land acquisition in the Superior National Forest, and in an amount appropriately discounted for the following factors existent in relation to the particular mineral interest:

(A) The original patenting from the Federal public domain was fraudulent. The patenting of lands in the BWCA is prima facie fraudulent if (i) the Act under which the patent was issued was one of the Acts intended to put settlers on the land, such as, but without limitation, the Cash Purchase Act of 1820 (chapter LI, Act of April 24, 1820, 3 U.S. Stat. 566, 567, as amended); the Preemption Act of 1830 (chapter CCVIII, Act of May 29, 1830, 4 U.S. Stat. 420, 421, as amended); the Homestead Act of 1862 (chapter LXXV, Act of May 20, 1862, 12 U.S. Stat. 392–394, as amended); and the Timber and Stone Act (chapter 150, Act of June 3, 1878, 20 U.S. Stat. 88, 89, as amended, particularly by chapter 375, Act of August 4, 1892, 27 U.S. Stat. 348); and (ii) the land was patented after 1875 and before the establishment of the Superior National Forest by proclamation on February 13, 1909. The Secretary also shall consider any other evidence of fraud when determining the value of the minerals such as (i) the transfer by the entryman or patentee of whole or partial interests in the property during the patenting process or soon thereafter, (ii) the appearance in the chain of title of persons known to have participated in land speculation as land brokers, entrymen, or in other capacities.

(B) The date of separation of the mineral or mineral rights from the surface interest, if the separation occurred after 1927, the year when the courts have determined that the roadless policy was established by the Secretary for the area.

(C) Any other factor, such as restrictions on mining within the area imposed by State or local government, or by operation of treaty.

(3) In the event any legal action or proceeding arises in relation to minerals or mineral rights where the patenting is prima facie fraudulent, the Secretary shall assert his right to constructive or public trusts or to recover money damages for the land acquired through fraud.

(e) Notwithstanding any requirement of this section, the Secretary shall have authority to acquire within the BWCA, existing mineral interests by donation, purchase, exchange, or through exercise of the power of eminent domain.

(f) There is authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary such sums as may be required to carry out the purposes of this section, to be available until expended.

SEC. 6. (a) The Secretary is directed to terminate, as of the date of enactment of this Act, all timber harvesting in the BWCA whether under contracts in effect on the date of the enactment of this Act or otherwise. Immediately following the date of the enactment of this Act the Secretary shall act expeditiously to remove from the BWCA all structures, bridges, culverts, debris, and other human impacts associated with logging and take such similar ameliorative measures as he may deem necessary in order to facilitate the reforestation of cutover areas, the obliteration of roads, and other disturbed areas.

(b)(1) The Secretary and the Secretary of the Interior are directed to replace the softwood timber withdrawn from production under subsection (a) with softwood timber sale contracts on other Federal lands in Minnesota which are available for timber harvesting, at competitive prices, and comparable in species, species mix, volume, accessibility, and economic operability. The substitute timber shall be located within the eighteen Minnesota counties of Aitkin, Becker, Beltrami, Carlton, Cass, Clearwater, Cook, Crow Wing, Hubbard, Itasca, Koochiching, Lake, Lake of the Woods, Mahnomen, Pine, Roseau, Saint Louis, and Wadena. In replacing softwood timber under this paragraph, the Secretary shall insure the replacement of equivalent amounts of saw timber as near as practicable to the sawmill locations existing on the date of enactment of this Act. For purposes of this Act, the annual allowable softwood yield of lands withdrawn from timber production under subsection (a) shall be deemed to be forty-seven thousand cords, not to include more than five thousand five hundred cords balsam fir.

(2) The United States shall pay just compensation for any timber contracts terminated under subsection (a), consistent with amendment V of the Constitution of the United States. Losses due to costs incurred in directly fulfilling the terms of such contracts shall be paid by the United States. Any action for the recovery from the United States of costs as provided above shall be brought in a court of competent jurisdiction. Any such judgments shall be paid from the claims and judgments fund (31 U.S.C. 724a) no later than one year after the filing of such judgments.

(c)(1) The Secretary and the Secretary of the Interior, in consultation and cooperation with the State of Minnesota, are authorized and directed to implement a program of intensive forest management within the Superior National Forest and on other Federal lands available for timber production within the eighteen counties referred to in subsection (b)(1) for the purpose of replacing softwood timber withdrawn from production under subsection (a), consistent with the existing applicable laws and regulations. Such program shall be designed to immediately enable such lands to produce a sustained yield of softwood timber equivalent to the 1976 softwood timber yield from such forest and other lands plus forty-seven thousand cords of softwood, not to include more than five thousand five hundred cords balsam fir.

(2) The forty-seven thousand cords amount referred to in paragraph (1) may be reduced in any year by an amount equal to the number of cords of softwood timber which is—

(A) available in such year at competitive prices, in comparable species, species mix, volume, accessibility, and economic operability from lands owned by the State of Minnesota, and

(B) in excess of the 1976 annual timber production from lands owned by the State of Minnesota.

(d) In administering the Superior National Forest, the Secretary is authorized and directed to engage in planting, direct seeding, natural regeneration, release, site conversion, and site preparation.

(e) The Secretary is authorized to employ twenty additional employees (including not less than one hardwood utilization and marketing expert) at levels on the General Schedule not in excess of level 16 and not below level 5 for purposes of administration of the Superior National Forest.

(f)(1) There is authorized to be appropriated $12,000,000 for each of the five fiscal years beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act for the purpose of fulfilling the requirements of subsection (c) as it relates to lands in the Superior National Forest in Minnesota. Of such amount, not less than $2,000,000 shall be used for road development for each such fiscal year, not less than $1,000,000 shall be used for timber stand improvement (including release, thinning, and pruning) for each such fiscal year, and not less than $1,000,000 shall be used for reforestation for each such fiscal year. Any of the amounts specified in this paragraph not appropriated in any fiscal year shall remain available for appropriation in subsequent fiscal years.

(2) In addition to amounts authorized under paragraph (1), there is authorized to be appropriated $3,000,000 for each of the five fiscal years beginning after the date of the enactment of this Act to be used for grants to the State of Minnesota for the development of the commercial softwood timber base on State lands in Cook, Lake, Koochiching,

Saint Louis, and Carlton counties in the State of Minnesota. Not more than 80 per centum of the cost of such development shall be paid from amounts made available under this subsection. The State of Minnesota is authorized to use any portion of the amounts available from the United States under this subsection for assistance to such counties to assist such counties in the development of commercial softwood timber production on lands owned by such counties.

SEC. 7. Nothing in this Act shall be construed as affecting the jurisdiction or responsibilities of the State with respect to fish and wildlife in the BWCA.

SEC. 8. Nothing in this Act shall affect the jurisdiction as established by law of any governmental authority over any waters included in the BWCA.

SEC. 9. The Secretary shall cooperate with the State of Minnesota, any political subdivision thereof, or both in the administration of the BWCA and in the administration and protection of lands within or adjacent to the BWCA owned or controlled by the State or any political subdivision thereof. Nothing in this Act shall deprive the State of Minnesota or any political subdivision thereof of its right to exercise civil and criminal jurisdiction within the BWCA and impose land use controls and environmental health standards on non-Federal areas within the BWCA or of its right to tax persons, corporations, franchises, or other non-Federal property, including mineral or other interests, in or on lands or waters within the BWCA.

SEC. 10. The Secretary is authorized and directed to develop a program of dispersed outdoor recreation in the BWCA. The Secretary shall consider, in developing such program, the need for additional lake access sites and parking facilities outside of the BWCA to provide more widely dispersed access for canoe use of the BWCA, especially with respect to lightly used canoe routes.

SEC. 11. Nothing in this Act shall affect the provisions of any treaty now applicable to lands and waters which are included in the BWCA.

SEC. 12. The provisions of Executive Order 10092, dated December 17, 1949, establishing an airspace reservation over certain areas of the Superior National Forest, are hereby incorporated into this Act.

SEC. 13. Nothing in this Act or the Wilderness Act shall be construed to prohibit the maintenance of the Prairie Portgage Dam (on the international boundary chain between Birch and Basswood Lakes), and the Secretary is authorized to perform such maintenance work as may be required to keep that dam functional at its present height and width. Dams or other impoundments which are in existence within the BWCA on the date of the enactment of this Act on any waterway within the BWCA may be maintained or replaced as the Secretary deems necessary to preserve the wilderness character of the area.

SEC. 14. All authorizations for funds to be appropriated under the terms of this Act shall not be effective until October 1, 1978. Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, authority to enter into agreements or to make payments under this Act shall be effective only to the extent or in such amounts as are provided in advance in appropriation Acts.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

OLDER AMERICANS MONTH

HON. JOHN BRADEMAS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, the month of May has been proclaimed by President Carter as Older Americans Month.

This year the month of May is a particularly appropriate time for Congress to direct its attention both in word and deed to the Nation's elderly citizens. That both Houses of Congress have taken action this month to extend the Older Americans Act of 1965 gives May particular relevance to this year's theme of "Older Americans and the Family."

On the 15th of this month the House of Representatives passed, by 361 to 6, the Comprehensive Older Americans Act Amendments of 1978. This legislation, H.R. 12255, contains several features designed to strengthen the roles of older Americans in their families.

Before pointing out some of those features, I should observe that Bureau of Census statistics have shown a striking trend toward more elderly persons living alone. In 1960, one-sixth of all noninstitutionalized elderly persons lived alone. Today that proportion has risen to one-fourth.

There are undoubtedly many factors contributing to this trend, but one of obvious importance is that few American families can now afford to provide, in their own homes, the kind of professional care which their elderly parents or grandparents may need.

Many elderly persons and their families may not know where to turn for help.

Let me speak of the ways in which the Older Americans Act and H.R. 12255 could assist American families in meeting the serious social, health, and rehabilitative service needs of elderly persons.

First, the act currently supports a network of over 500 area agencies on aging in communities where 92 percent of the elderly citizens of this Nation live. These agencies can provide valuable assistance in locating and obtaining the appropriate services needed by the family in order to assist its elderly members to remain in the home. H.R. 12255 builds upon this important service, the keystone of the Older Americans Act.

Second, H.R. 12255 recognizes that the lack of legal advice and counseling on problems besetting elderly persons frequently means that elderly persons and their families are confused about their rights and benefits, and, therefore, may accept needless abuse and fraud. H.R. 12255 approaches this problem by authorizing the establishment of legal service programs for the elderly in each State.

Third, H.R. 12255 recognizes that a sound diet is an important factor in maintaining good health. It, therefore, proposes to establish, in each State, programs of home-delivered meals for elderly persons. Such programs frequently may be able to prevent the worsening of an individual's health and assist him or her in avoiding the institutionalization which sometimes may result.

Fourth, H.R. 12255 recognizes that the costs of long-term care are both expensive and frequently borne solely by elderly persons and their families. The bill recognizes that despite the broad scope of both public and private health insurance, there are many gaps. It, therefore, authorizes the Commssioner of the Administration on Aging to make grants and award contracts for establishing model projects in long-term care. Under such projects, elderly persons would be able to receive services for which reimbursement is not allowed under medicare, medicaid, and title XX of the Social Security Act.

Fifth, H.R. 12255 recognizes that elerly persons frequently may require institutionalization in order to receive the kind of specialized professional care they may not be able to obtain in their own homes. It, therefore, proposes to create, in each State, ombudsman programs to insure that elderly persons receive the best possible care during their stays in long-term care facilities so that they may return to their homes and families as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker, the proposals which I have just briefly outlined are, I believe, important steps in assisting older Americans to remain active members of their families.

There are, of course, many more steps which should be taken, but as chairman of the Subcommittee on Select Education and sponsor of H.R. 12255, I want to thank the Members of the House for their strong support, during this Older Americans Month, of these proposals.

I would also like to commend to the reading of my colleagues an article which appeared in an April 1975 publication of the National Council of Senior Citizens entitled, "A National Policy for Older Americans." The article portrays the many legal problems unique to the elderly. Indeed, Federal laws alone probably have greater effect on the lives of elderly Americans than on any other population group in the Nation.

THE NEED FOR LEGAL SERVICES

INTRODUCTION

Some segments of society traditionally have suffered from unequal treatment and neglect under our system of law regardless of its lofty goals. The poor and the ignorant have lacked effective representation and advocacy until recent times. While the legal profession has always accepted the principle of ministering to the needs of those who were unable to pay for services rendered, this responsibility in large part has been neglected by a majority of the members of the bar.

Statements or insertions which are not spoken by the Member on the floor will be identified by the use of a "bullet" symbol, i.e., ●

Business corporations, labor unions, and numerous other special interest organizations and groups use lawyers with their special skills as advocates, lobbyists, negotiators and strategists. The elderly also have special needs. Involvement, commitment and participation in the concerns of the elderly by the legal profession is at least as necessary as those of other special interests.

Indeed, the elderly have additional difficulties in attracting attention to their legal needs. Many of them are ill and/or infirm. Until very recently older persons have tended to be an invisible group, with few leaders who could articulate their urgent problems. Obtaining counseling, navigating a course through the court system and the administrative appeal agencies can cause confusion and fear in an old and infirm person. Legal processes are a maze of complexity even for the most healthy and intelligent individual. A lack of knowledge on the part of attorneys about the specific legal needs of older persons further compounds the problem.

LEGAL RESEARCH AND SERVICES FOR THE ELDERLY

In order to more fully explore the legal issues facing older Americans, the National Council of Senior Citizens has sponsored a research-demonstration program since 1968. Initially funded by the Office of Economic Opportunity, Legal Research and Services for the Elderly worked on 12 separate projects in 10 different cities across the United States. In January 1974, the Administration on Aging, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, funded Legal Research and Services for the Elderly as a model project in Region III: Pennsylvania, Maryland, Delaware, the District of Columbia, Virginia and West Virginia. The primary objective of the grant has been to maximize the capacity of state and area agencies on aging and the voluntary sector to develop, implement and coordinate legal resources to meet the needs of their elderly residents, particularly low-income and minority persons.

The law is involved in an older person's life in innumerable ways. Legal Research and Services for the Elderly has examined a score of issues which affect the aged. With this knowledge, a lawyer can better serve the individual older person and effect changes in the lives of the elderly as a group.

LEGAL NEEDS

Most older persons receive the majority of their income from federal benefit programs. These programs include Social Security, Supplemental Security Income, veterans benefits, civil service retirement, and Railroad Retirement pensions. All of these benefit programs, because of their complexity, will generate disagreements with respect to eligibility, denial of benefits, amount of entitlement and rights under the program. Counsel may be necessaary during claims and hearings procedures as well as in forcing administrative responsiveness on the part of local Social Security offices and other benefit programs.

At the national level, lawyers could concern themselves with such issues as raising Social Security benefits; liberalizing the Social Security retirement test; and calling on government to utilize a new Consumer Price Index more suited to elderly people when determining cost-of-living increases in Social Security, Railroad Retirement, etc. Private pensions have been the object of frequent difficulty due to a lack of uniform regulation. The new Pension Reform Act of 1974 will aid lawyers in protecting older people's rights with regard to bankruptcy, portability, vesting, and fraudulent representation of benefits.

For the elderly with low, fixed incomes, taxes of all types are a heavy burden. Complex procedures for relief also present a stumbling block to the aged. There are myriad ways federal, state and local governments can reduce or eliminate income taxes, sales taxes, and property taxes which eat up precious income. Complicated rebate procedures that necessitate the physical presence of an older person further exacerbate a bad situation. Lawyers are needed to reform our tax laws and bring relief to our senior citizens.

The aged person's lot during these times of rapid, uncontrolled inflation is especially painful. Discount programs and rate preferences are the most common forms of special treatment for the elderly. Attorneys can assist senior citizens organizations in obtaining public and private discounts for goods and services.

The issue of health care is of considerable concern to the elderly. It is a fact of life that older people suffer from more illness than other age groups. The quality and enforcement of federal and state health care standards, especially fire safety codes, the availability of Social Security Administration evaluation reports, the existence of qualitative information with respect to hospital and nursing home licensure, the level of state Medicaid payments, and commitment procedures all are vital issues necessitating the assistance of an attorney.

Housing ranks among the most important issues affecting the elderly. Maintaining one's residence is often a financial hardship, and relocation presents an emotional and physical hardship. For elderly homeowners the legal issues involve the availability of property tax relief, the rate of property tax assessment, the availability of low-cost home repair and maintenance loans, and the contractual sale of the home in exchange for lifetime annuity payments.

The aged renter faces arbitrary rent increases and traditional landlord/tenant difficulties. However, the aged renter usually lacks the mobility and flexibility of the younger renter when he or she receives no satisfaction from legitimate complaints.

A new unpleasant prospect also faces the renter. In urban areas many apartment owners are converting their properties into condominiums requiring substantial down payments for the privilege of purchasing one's apartment. In addition to the financial difficulty which most elderly face, myriad legal questions are involved in this new type of property ownership. Legal assistance is needed to protect the rights of those who wish to purchase their apartment as well as those who cannot afford to do so. This will require new laws regulating condominium conversions requiring substantial notice and relocation assistance.

There are several established areas of the law which particularly affect elderly persons. These include commitment, guardianship, age discrimination, consumer protection, wills and probate. While these are more traditional issues, lawyers serving older persons nonetheless need to learn about the problems involved and the possibilities for improvement.

Commitment to a mental institution and guardianship of a person or property are legal arrangements to deal with incompetency of an older person. The threshold legal issues are the definition of mental incompetency (or senility) and due process protections of the older person's rights. With regard to commitment, the issues involve the older person's right to counsel in commitment proceedings, to treatment in the institution, to periodic review of commitment, and to consultation with legal counsel during commitment.

With respect to guardianship the issues involve the powers and qualifications of the guardian, the duration of the guardianship, and review procedures.

In 1967 the Age Discrimination in Employment Act was passed protecting persons ages 45–64 from discrimination in employment on the basis of age. However, the major legal question remains—the legality of age 65 for mandatory retirement policies, housing, credit, insurance and driver's licensure.

As people advance in age they become increasingly concerned about their estates and their beneficiaries. Will writing, education for future executors, estates counseling and probate reform all are important in properly serving the needs of the elderly.

Consumer protection laws have particular pertinence to older persons for several reasons. Very old, disabled or lonely persons are especially susceptible to the devices of a high-pressure salesman or con artist. Door-to-door sales of many health devices needed by older persons are poorly regulated. The inability of many aged persons to shop for quality and value for the price makes them particularly vulnerable to price gouging.

Legal assistance in the area of consumer protection might include formation of consumer advisory boards with counsel, regulations insuring non-fraudulent advertising and disclosure, a 30-day cooling off period for door-to-door sales, and licensing of salespersons and distributors.

With the incomes of our nation's elderly becoming more inadequate by the day, it is entirely proper and necessary that credit be readily available. Laws protecting the rights of senior citizens to borrow money on the basis of a lifetime of good credit must be enforced. Old age is not the time to deny a person financial recourse.

THE NEED FOR A CATEGORICAL APPROACH

The availability of lawyers trained to meet the special needs of the elderly is very inadequate. New programs directed to this specific purpose are necessary to meet the enormous demand for services. Older people with limited incomes, that in many cases do not even cover food and shelter, must sacrifice the expense of paying a lawyer to represent their interests. The elderly are frequently victims of abuse and cannot afford to take action.

A national program to train and supply lawyers for the elderly is urgently needed. Only through direct action at the federal level for this purpose will we be able to deal with the serious deficiencies in legal services for older Americans.●

OBSERVATIONS ON THE CANADIAN HEALTH CARE EXPERIENCE—PART III

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I have shared with my colleagues portions of a paper prepared by Mr. Richard Lehrman who serves on the staff of the Select Committee on Aging, regarding the Canadian health care program.

I wish to include at this point in the RECORD the third part of this paper which deals principally with the costs of the Canadian program:

COST

The adjustments in the federal-provincial cost-sharing structure, as well as other provisions in Bill C–37 were enacted as a result of deficiencies in an otherwise sound program. The most glaring deficiencies in the Canadian National Health Insurance experience relate to factors that contribute to the high cost of health care.

Since hospital insurance was introduced, costs have risen almost 10 per cent per year in current dollars, and about four per cent per year in constant dollars.[77] Canada spent 5.3 per cent of its Gross National Product on health care expenditures in 1960 (Harry Nelson). This quotient rose to 7.1 in 1971, and to 7.3 in 1975.[78]

Between 1961 and 1973, hospital costs increased about 10 per cent per year and never below 8 per cent per year.[79] Hospital beds in Canada increased 33%, bed occupancy remained at about 80%, but population grew only 18%.[80]

Between 1965 and 1972, physician fees increased an average of 6.3% per year, physician net income increased over 10% per year, and per capita expenditures increased 12.3% per year.[81] National Health Insurance in Canada was thus becoming an extremely expensive venture.

Methods of cost-control, ranging from copayment to expenditure ceilings, have been attempted, all with varying degrees of success. However, the factor that appears to exert the greatest influence over health costs is the focus of the program itself; that is—in the particular areas of health services that are emphasized. It is in this area that Americans might well pay special note.

Not unlike the Medicare and Medicaid programs, historically, the Canadian Health Program has emphasized the costliest areas of health care. The program initially only covered care in an institution. Thus, "the system was driven into its most expensive component." [82] Many persons sought unnecessary and costly institutional care, because hospitals were the only insured component of the health care program. The provinces were, in effect, also given incentives to bias their programs toward institutionalization since services were eligible for federal cost-sharing only when provided in a hospital.

Hospital expenses are not only the most expensive component of the health care system, they also account for the greatest cost increases. The cost of insured hospital insurance increased 25.5% from 1974–1975, as compared with the increase of 65% for the cost of insured medical services, (not performed in a hospital) that same year.[83]

The rapidly increasing hospital costs were aggravated by the high rate of hospital utilization. Especially during the period Canada's health insurance covered only hospitalization, Canada experienced significantly higher rates of hospital admissions, patient days of care, and expenditures per capita, than the U.S.[84] Canadian hospitals also reported a significantly higher occupancy rate than hospitals in the United States.[85]

In an attempt to discourage unnecessary usage, many Canadian provinces utilized deductibles, or coinsurance, as is common in the United States. However, this method proved so unpopular that only 2 provinces, British Columbia and Alberta, still use it.[86] Moreover, the ensuing reduction in point of service cost of care (after coinsurance was dropped) did not lead to a large increase in utilization, suggesting that hospital admissions are not very sensitive to price.[87]

What they may be sensitive to is an alternative method of care. In 1968, almost all Canadians were covered by Medicare, which provided coverage for physicians' services. As early as 1969, a few of the many cost-escalating trends began to reverse themselves. In that year, the average length of stay in a hospital stabilized after years of increases, beginning a trend of year-to-year decreases.[88]

In fact, by 1972, Canada experienced the shortest length of stay of any year since 1961.[89] In 1972, Canada's hospital occupancy rate also decreased.[90]

More important trends directly concerning the price of health care manifested themselves after the advent of Medicare. Soon after enactment of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, expenditures of personal health care (as a per-cent of personal income) in Canada had eclipsed such personal expenditures in the United States.[91] However, the percentage of personal income going to health care in Canada decreased in 1973 for the first time since 1961, and was again surpassed by American expenditures (as a per-cent of personal income).[92] Health care costs (as a percentage of GNP) in Canada stabilized in 1971.[93] Costs continued to rise after Medicare, but the increases were not as great.

This phenomenon is not only attributable to the relatively less expensive cost of non-institutional medical care, but to a different cost-sharing structure. The federal contribution to a province under the Medical Care Act is equivalent to fifty per-cent of the average per capita cost for the year of all Canadians, multiplied by the number of insured persons in that particular province.[94] The new cost-sharing arrangements resulted in greater federal aid per capita to provinces that kept costs down, providing incentives for the more expensive provinces to cut costs.

Contrary to fears concerning implementation of universal health care in the United States, the evidence increases that availability of inexpensive medical care does not result in runaway overutilization. On the other hand, medical care is merely moderately redistributed from the upper income groups to the lower income groups. In a two year study of the distributive effects of Medicare measured by annual visits to a physician before and after Medicare, nonuse by the lowest income group declined substantially. However, utilization by all income groups did not rise significantly.[95]

The institution of co-payment to reduce costs was also attempted under the Medical Care Act in Saskatchewan from 1968 to 1971. However, rather than reduce costs, the deductibles served to impose a barrier for the poor, elderly, and large families. Moreover, the higher income groups utilized the less crowded doctors' offices more frequently.[96]

Deductibles are a more common part of the scene in the United States, where they often take the form of private insurance premiums, and have a similar effect of providing barriers to health care for the poor. According to the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, the poorer a person, the less likely he is to have health insurance. 90 and 89 percent of the persons in the U.S. earning over $10,000 are covered by private hospital and surgical insurance, respectively. These percentages drop to 70 and 68 percent of persons earning less than $5,000 who have hospital and surgical insurance, respectively.[97] This phenomenon manifests itself in even greater proportions regarding children. In families with incomes above $10,000, 9 out of 10 children under 17 have hospital insurance. This figure drops to less than two-thirds for children of families earning between $5,000–$9,000, and only one-fourth of all children of families earning less than $5,000 have hospital insurance. In effect, then, co-payment serves only to redistribute health care from the poor to the rich.[98]

Although Canadian Medicare somewhat abated the soaring increases in health care costs, expenses continued to rise to unprecedented heights. Again, misplaced emphasis appeared to hold the key. After the cost of hospitalization, the next most expensive component of health care is physician care. The advent of Medicare meant only a slightly less expensive alternative to hospitalization. Until April of 1977, a strong bias toward institutional care was deeply ingrained into the Canadian health care system.

The United States has learned the bitter lessons of a health care system that discourages alternative forms of health delivery, such as home health care. According to a General Accounting office report, home health care is less expensive for 83% of the citizens aged 65 and over.[99] Home care becomes more costly than nursing home care only for the 17% of the elderly who are greatly to extremely impaired, according to the GAO. In effect, a policy which disproportionately favors institutional care is not only less humane but more expensive. In addition, in a country without universal Medicare such as the United States, millions of persons desperately in need of long term care must either seek costly institutional care, or do without.[100]

A joint study of home care costs by a regional medical program and a visiting service in New ork City found that the cost of providing a complete range of home health services averaged $768 per patient, including patient outlays.[101] Seventy-three percent of the patients had costs below this,[102] and the mean length of service was two months.[103]

Other evidence cited by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare report on the Regional Public Hearings included the following:

a hospital based home health service program found that home health maintenance care was one-third the cost of nursing home care; and an insurance company testified that once health care is available in the community, total cost reductions will result; for example:

intensive home health care reduces hospital admissions and length of stay.

intermediate care can reduce inappropriate hospital and skilled nursing facility admissions.[104]

In short, health care programs in both the United States and Canada have served to provide barriers to home health alternatives to institutionalization, due to the false rationale of cost-effectiveness. Although what amounts to forced institutionalization is often dehumanizing and cruel, health legislation was inspired by the contention that care in an institution is cheaper.[105] Only recently have studies proved that such is not the case.[106] As a result, Canada has taken action to reverse effects of a health care system that in most cases discourages home health care.

Bill C–37 provided for an additional equal per capita cash contribution to the provinces commencing April 1, 1977, to contribute toward the cost of certain extended health care services. These services are: nursing home intermediate care, adult residential care, converted mental hospitals, health aspects of home care and ambulatory health care services.[107] According to the Health Programs branch of Canada Health and Welfare, the basic objective of the extended health services program is "to provide the provinces with financial assistance toward the cost of lower cost alternatives to the insured services covered under the Hospital Insurance and Medical Care programs." [108] A second objective was to encompass most of the spectrum of health and institutional health care services within a similar financial arrangement to that for the established programs.[109] The importance of Canada's positive step toward rectifying the deficiencies in the home health care realm should be obvious regarding any proposed U.S. Health Insurance plan.

REGIONALIZATION

Under the previous federal-provincial cost-sharing arrangement, the federal government paid over one-half the costs, but had very little control over policy. The provinces had very little incentive to find more efficient means of delivering health services. The recently enacted law (Bill C-37), however, contains provisions that serve to regionalize the Canadian Health Care System. Although the provinces were previously responsible for policy-making concerning their respective health care programs, they were not financially responsible to the same extent. The new federal provincial cost-sharing arrangements represent a major shift in responsibility.

As previously mentioned, all provincial health plans will be financed with federal funds that will, within five years, supply an equal per capita sum to each province, based on the cost of health for the entire country. Since the provincial programs will only have to meet minimal conditions regarding the provision of program information to the federal government in order to receive this contribution, financial impediments to provincial priorities for program development have been eliminated.[110] Any savings from established programs may now be applied by the provinces toward home health care.

This effort aimed at providing the provinces with more responsibility regarding program emphasis not only provides them with increased flexibility in the use of their funds, but it provides a stronger incentive for the provincial governments to become cost-conscious. The cost concerns of the provinces will probably cause many to encourage programs that result in real cost reductions.[111] Conversely, high cost programs such as hospital care will be de-emphasized.

Stronger emphasis on alternative care methods have proved beneficial for health, as well as financial reasons. Efforts to promote preventive medicine intended to stop ailments in their earliest stages are strengthened when it is more difficult to get into a hospital. Also, due to drug interactions, or merely because of increased exposure, there are possibilities of some persons actually becoming sicker in hospitals.

Regionalization of the health care programs essentially results in more cost-effective administration, and the promotion of programs that stress alternatives institutionalization. Responsibility and accountability, and funding for the program are handled at the same level. Upper limits are not imposed on the insured services of the national programs which are covered by the provincial plans, allowing each province the flexibility to tailor its medical plan to its specific needs. According to the Lewin Report to the Health Resources Administration, such a structure merits our fullest attention:

In the U.S. when problems arise in a joint-Federal-State program, a frequent response is to increase Federal administrative requirements. The Canadian debates underscore an alternative which is to place a firm upper limit on Federal contributions while leaving States the obligation to meet all other financial requirements and the freedom to establish administrative and regulatory systems. Increasing the risk of the States might act as an incentive to efficiency and cost consciousness, and allow for innovation and experimentation.[112]

CHINA AND THE UNITED STATES

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, since Dr. Brzezinski, the President's adviser on foreign affairs, has just returned from a trip to mainland China, speculation abounds as to what foreign policy developments relating to that Communist regime may be forthcoming.

An editorial, appearing in the May 24 Chicago Tribune, analyzes the status of the very difficult subject of normalization in our relations with Red China. I commend this objective editorial to the attention of the Members:

CHINA AND THE U.S.

QUOTE.—Here is what the Shanghai Communique of 1972 said about Taiwan:

The Chinese side reaffirmed its position. The Taiwan question is the crucial question obstructing the normalization of relations between China and the United States; the government of the Peoples Republic of China is the sole legal government of China; Taiwan is a province of China . . .; the liberation of Taiwan is China's internal affair . . . The Chinese government firmly opposes any activities which aim at the creation of "one China, one Taiwan," "one China, two governments," "two Chinas," an "Independent Taiwan" or advocate that "the status of Taiwan remains to be determined."

The U.S. side declared: The United States acknowledges that all Chinese on either side of the Taiwan Strait maintain there is but one China and that Taiwan is part of China. The United States government does not challenge that position. It reaffirms its interest in a peaceful settlement of the Taiwan question by the Chinese themselves. With this prospect in mind, it affirms the ultimate objective of the withdrawal of all U.S. forces and military installations from Taiwan. In the meantime, it will progressively reduce its forces and military installations on Taiwan as the tension in the area diminishes.

Zbigniew Brzezinski set the tone for his Peking visit with his statement on arriving there last Saturday: President Carter "desires friendly relations with a strong China" and "is determined to join you [China] in overcoming the remaining obstacles in the way of full normalization of our relations."

The words come easily. For six years, talk of normalization has marked nearly every meeting between Americans and Mainland Chinese. A thousand toasts have been drunk to it. After all, recognition of a country no longer implies approval of its form of government [if it ever did], and it is manifestly sensible that the United States should have normal diplomatic relations with the most populous country in the world. Americans who have visited the mainland, including the editor of this page last month, have found almost unanimously that while China is governed by controlled thought, it is a "government that works" and is in full control of the country. It is not going to be overthrown soon.

Progress toward normalization has been blocked by the conditions China stated in the Shanghai Communique following President Nixon's visit in 1972 and repeated consistently since then: Peking will not agree to normalization as long as the United States "interferes" in China's affairs by recognizing the government on Taiwan and guaranteeing to defend that island, presumably against an attack from the mainland.

As a reading of the communique will show, the United States does not specifically support either side's claim to be the one China. But this has become almost an irrelevancy. The mere assertion that there is only one China has become an embarrassment under today's conditions.

Peking maintains that it is speaking in behalf of 16 million or so "Taiwanese compatriots" when it calls for their "liberation" from the "Kuomintang clique." This is where Peking's position runs afoul of reality. As the editor of this page reported in a column on Monday, the 16 million native Taiwanese have no desire at all to be "liberated" by the Communists.

True, they have long resented the one-party rule imposed on them by the 2 million or so Nationalist Chinese who fled to Taiwan after losing the mainland in 1949. But the government has been slowly opening itself up to participation by the native Taiwanese [mainly Chinese who fled from the mainland centuries ago], and the newly inaugurated president, Chiang Ching-kuo, promises more of the same. To the Taiwanese, the relative freedom and the prosperity of Taiwan are far better than anything Peking can offer.

These are the solid facts upon which talk of normalization runs aground. The United States may be able to reduce or qualify its commitment to Taiwan, but it cannot conscientiously be a party to turning 18 million people over to a Communist regime against their almost unanimous will, nor can it suddenly take the position that a country we now recognize and do a great deal of business with is really a province of another country.

Normalization is a sensible goal worth looking forward to. But if it means sacrificing Taiwan, it will be a long time coming. Fortunately Peking recognizes this perhaps better than Mr. Brzezinski: Vice Premier Teng Hsiao-ping acknowledged only last week [according to a Nationalist translation] that Peking can wait "10 to 20 years" for a solution of the Taiwan question. If normalization is to come earlier than that, Peking will have to modify its conditions. There are in fact two Chinas, and any argument to the contrary is only an exercise in semantics.●

BUREAUCRACY

HON. JAMES M. COLLINS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. COLLINS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, when will Congress learn that our number one responsibility is to reduce the size of Government? We spend too much time passing laws and too little time out on the streets observing how they work.

I was keenly interested in an excellent editorial in Time magazine by Marshall Loeb. Loeb emphasized the views of a Prof. Murray Weidenbaum. Loeb and Weidenbaum understand the big picture.

Read the logic of Loeb's "Executive View" from Time:

BATTLING THE B.I.G. BULGE

The spread of big, intrusive Government (B.I.G. for short) is a source of so much public discontent that, like epidemiology or the Korean War, it has become a subject of serious study in universities. The leading professor is Murray Weidenbaum, a former Assistant Secretary of the Treasury (1969–71) who knows his subject only too well. At the Center for the Study of American Business, which he heads at Washington University in St. Louis, Economist Weidenbaum, 51, is examining how the policies and regulations of B.I.G. are feeding inflation, impeding efficiency and otherwise rubbing up against private citizens.

"The Government is the nation's largest employer," says Weidenbaum, his accents echoing Brooklyn, where he grew up in the Depression-poor family of a cab driver. "Clearly the pay raises of Government employees and postal workers have been leading the inflationary parade for years. Somehow, Congress got sold on the notion of 'pay comparability' between the public and private sectors, ignoring the high federal fringes. And who makes the computations of the 'comparability'? Surprise, surprise! It's the civil servants themselves, which is like having the foxes guard the henhouse."

Government is also the largest single buyer of goods and services, says Weidenbaum, and it is about as cost conscious as a Saudi prince in Beverly Hills. Instead of buying from the lowest bidder or the best supplier, Government agencies and contractors are required to favor small businesses and suppliers in high-unemployment areas. That policy may or may not have social benefits, but it surely hypes inflation and discriminates against bigger companies.

On Government-aided construction projects, the Davis-Bacon Act requires that the job go not to the lowest bidder but to the contractor who agrees to pay the "prevailing" wages of the region, often meaning the highest union scales paid in the nearest big city. "So in rural Maine they'll use the wage scales of Boston, and in Appalachia they'll use the wage scales of Pittsburgh," says Weidenbaum. "But those wages are so far above the standards in Appalachia that frequently Appalachia firms don't bid for the jobs. They can't pay their workers on Government projects a whopping differential over their workers on commercial projects. Result: Pittsburgh firms get the Government jobs. They bring in Pittsburgh workers, and the taxpayer, in the goodness of his or her heart, doesn't bail out the poor people in Appalachia but subsidize union workers from Pittsburgh."

But it is no joke when Weidenbaum brings forth sheaves of records of dozens of foundries—in Ohio, Pennsylvania, Alabama, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Kentucky—that had to close because they could not afford to meet requirements of the Environmental Protection Agency and the Occupational Safety and Health Administration. He collects reports of hundreds of small companies that have abandoned pension plans because they could not comply with the expensive requirements of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA), "and so the worker winds up with no pension at all."

A sad irony, say Weidenbaum, is that Government freely violates its own regulations. "Federal installations are among the worst environmental offenders. OSHA offices fail to meet OSHA safety standards. And think of Social Security and the Civil Service Retirement Fund being subjected to the Standards of ERISA. They would flunk."●

TED KAMINSKI CITES RISE OF INDEPENDENTS

HON. EDWARD J. DERWINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of debate, some optimistic and some negative, predicting the survival possibilities of small independent businessmen.

A recent article reporting on the success of a local independent businessman, Ted Kaminski, caught my attention. The article in the May 22 Penny Saver publication, serving the south suburban area of Chicago, makes interesting reading, and I wish to insert it at this time:

TED KAMINSKI CITES RISE OF INDEPENDENTS

A local independent businessman, who believes that the age of individuals is not over, has some happy facts to cite.

Ted Kaminski, president of Oak Foods and Family Center, at 151st & Central, and a member of the board of directors of the prestigious Illinois Small Business Association, cited some industry figures on the growth of the independent grocer.

According to government figures Kaminski said, there were 740 more independent grocery stores while the chains lost 320.

"In 1971, the U.S. Department of Commerce predicted that by 1981 the large food chains would be selling 75 percent of the food sold in this country," Kaminski related.

In that year of 1971, Kaminski added, the chains sold 50% of the food in the country and for three years in a row, beginning with 1975, the chain stores have lost ground.

"This indicates that the move is not towards bigness," Kaminski said.

Kaminski claims that many independents have taken over the abandoned stores once owned by the chain stores and have made these new stores very profitable.

Kaminski said that the independents do not have the overhead that the chain stores do.

"Lower operating costs enable the independents to operate with lower gross margins," Kaminski said.

Kaminski said from his own experience of eight years in Oak Forest that the independent can react quicker to market changes than a chain can.

Kaminski said that independents still buy their foodstuff from wholesalers at the same price as do the chains.

"The fact that the small businessman is not being shoved out of the market is an indication that the American consumer puts a high priority on friendly service and the positive qualities that make the independent more flexible," Kaminski said.●

A MAN WHO CARES

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to pay tribute to Frederick Fung in honor of his selection as Citizen of the Year.

Freddie Fung is a caring person. Over many years, his concern for those in need, for those the rest of society has let slip through the cracks, has manifested itself in many ways. Most notable is his dedication to providing a camp for diabetic children. He has been tireless in his efforts in behalf of Bearskin Meadow Camp in Kings Canyon National Park, Calif. Over the last 20 years, he has raised money to build it and support its activities and, in so doing, has also brought public attention to the unique opportunities offered there.

Bearskin Meadow Camp offers children not welcome in other camps, an opportunity to share an outdoor learning experience in a beautiful setting and to learn to take care of their personal needs by themselves. This is an extraordinarily important confidence-building experience designed to make diabetic children independent and self-sufficient. This camp is often the first opportunity these children have to try their wings away from home and is an important step in preparing them for full-fledged participation in the grown-up world.

In addition to Freddie's many other activities, he manages Trader Vic's restaurant in Emeryville, Calif. It is he who made this restaurant an institution in the Bay area; it is he who is always attentive, always tactful, as considerate of his colleagues and employees as he is of his guests.

Freddie Fung's help in making Bearskin Camp a reality and his commitment to its continued success is only one example of the many ways he looks to the needs of others. In his quiet way, he helps when needed, never seeking recognition or acclaim. He is one of those special individuals who can truly be called a "solid citizen." ●

NEED TO RELOCATE THE WATER SUPPLY INTAKE AT SPRINGFIELD, S. DAK.

HON. JAMES ABDNOR

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing H.R. 12892 which directs the Secretary of the Army to relocate the water supply intake for the town of Springfield, S. Dak. Springfield is located on the Missouri River at the headwaters of the Gavins Point Reservoir. Because of this, the present water intake is susceptible to sedimentation as the Missouri enters this area of the reservoir and deposits its sediment. The deposition of this material is forming a delta which is forcing the main channel to move away from the South Dakota side of the river creating a mudflat in front of Springfield.

I have repeatedly asked the Corps of Engineers to address themselves to solving this problem.

On March 3, 1978, the Corps of Engineers informed me that—

> Except to temporarily provide a water supply to the intake dredging would not be a practicable solution because of the magnitude of existing and future sand deposits.

The corps also looked at the possibility of raising the Gavins Point pool a few feet to provide higher water levels near Springfield but concluded that—

> It would not be a permanent solution because the delta would eventually grow downstream (and again cause sedimentation of the water supply intake).

On March 13, 1978, the Corps of Engineers reported to me that a relatively trouble free intake could be achieved by extending the intake line approximately 2 miles downstream into the main body of the reservoir. The estimated cost of the design and construction of this proposal is $1,250,000.

Mr. Speaker, the Federal Government, in constructing the Gavins Point Reservoir, took thousands of acres of rich, productive agricultural land from the economic base of the region. The residents of Springfield accepted this, however, because they were led to believe that the reservoir would guarantee a dependable source of municipal and industrial water, a critical ingredient for economic development, and provide a new industry in the area-recreation services.

However, these provisions have not been translated into reality. Instead, Springfield is forced to deal with a siltation problem which causes unacceptable environmental impacts jeopardizing their water supply, all the result of construction by the Federal Government of Gavins Point.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the Federal Government should stand up and recognize that we have taken prime agricultural properties to create this reservoir in the name of serving the public interest. But in taking these lands we have an obligation to protect the viability of those communities adversely impacted in order to serve this public good. In the case of Springfield, S. Dak., this means relocating the water supply intake in order to guarantee this community the opportunity to participate in the benefits of the Gavins Point project, as promised by their Federal Government when they gave up their land to build the reservoir.

THE FREESTONE PEACH BILL IS BACK

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, last Monday, May 22, I introduced a bill which will enable producers of freestone peaches to finance a nationally coordinated research and education program. It is entitled the "Freestone Peach Research and Education Act," H.R. 12807.

This freestone peach program would improve the productivity and nutritional value of freestone peaches, provide the highest quality peaches to consumers, and in other ways strengthen the ability of the freestone peach production sector to meet consumer demand.

Through improvements in the quantity and quality of peaches, and research into certain aspects of marketing, it also is expected that export markets can be opened, helping our growers and our balance of trade.

The research and education to be carried out under this bill would require only negligible expenditures by the Federal Government. Costs of the specific research and education projects, and administrative costs of the program, will be borne by peach producers themselves through a small per-bushel assessment on freestone peaches sold in commercial markets. This small charge will be collected by handlers.

Though the assessment will apply to all commercial freestone peach producers in the United States, the bill provides that any peach producer who does not wish to contribute to this program may obtain a full refund of his contribution, so this is not a tax bill.

It is known that peaches can provide vitamins, minerals, and trace elements needed for a properly balanced diet, but research has already shown that these qualities can be improved even as work is being done to improve factors which affect productivity.

Research on such factors as rootstocks, fertilization, varieties, tree disease prevention and control, tree resistance to insects, and other areas can enhance production, help hold down production costs and thus final costs to consumers, while protecting the environment through allowing decreases in the total amounts of chemicals which must now be used to produce the high quality fruit which the market demands.

Increased information which helps to put a higher quality peach on the supermarket or roadside market shelf will also supply information about how high quality peaches can be shipped to export markets.

Educational programs which can be carried out under the program can be directed to every group old enough to hear and read, so that more of them will "reach for a peach" instead of empty calorie products.

Peach producers will have the final say about which parts of these programs to put into effect, but both producers and consumers should benefit as a result of this legislation.●

TRIBUTE TO AL ATTLES—GOLDEN STATE WARRIORS COACH

HON. RONALD V. DELLUMS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, on June 1, 1978, in Goodman's Hall, Oakland, Calif., there will be a benefit banquet for the Oakland Boys Club. At this banquet, the honored guest will be a man whom all sports fans in the country know well: Alvin Attles, the coach of the Golden State Warriers.

At this time I would like to share with my colleagues a few words about Al Attles and his remarkable career, for in his story one finds the kind of inspiration and courage we all need to face the tremendous challenges of our times.

It has been said that Al Attles was not a great player, but a good one. His deeds belie the words. Al wore a Warrior uniform longer than any man, 11 years. Of the more than 1,300 who have been active participants in the 27-year history of the National Basketball Association, only 25 have played longer than Attles. He played the game with an unyielding competitiveness that only his nickname, "The Destroyer" could describe. In his 11 seasons as a player, Attles earned a reputation as a superb defensive performer. He played in 712 regular season games and averaged 8.9 points per game. His name is found frequently listed among the Warriors' all-time statistical leaders and he participated in seven playoffs as a Warrior. His playing highs were 33 points against the New York Knicks on February 29, 1964. He also had a record high 17 assists against Cincinnati on February 24, 1968. One game that stands clearly on his mind is the game in which Wilt Chamberlain scored 100 points and Attles was second leading scorer in that game with 17 points. His sense of humor is never more evident than when he is asked to recall his biggest night as a pro. "Well, Wilt and I scored 117 points one night," he will say with a straight face until the laughter takes over.

Attles picked up a basketball for the first time in the fifth grade but concentrated on baseball until enrolling in Wequahic High School. He worked for a year as a stock boy in a department store before entering North Carolina A. & T. College in Greensboro, N.C.

While performing there, Attles became acquainted with Vince Miller, who had played with Wilt Chamberlain at Overbrook High in Philadelphia. Miller sustained a knee injury, however, and returned home. This turned out to be the break for Attles. Miller told Chamberlain and Eddie Gottlieb about a guy down South named Attles and that the Warriors should draft him. The Warriors eventually chose Al in the fifth round, "mostly to get Vince to shut up," Attles points out.

"Getting drafted in the fifth round didn't mean much," Attles said. "Making the team was something else."

But make the team he did and has played for no other club. On January 27, 1970, he succeeded George Lee as coach of the Warriors, guiding the bay area team to a world championship in 1975.

Al is married to the former Wilhemina Rice, a graduate of Upsale College in East Orange, N.J. They live in Oakland with their two children, Alvin, 13, and Erica, 7.

It is a great pleasure for me, Mr. Speaker, to place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the synoptic review of Alvin Attles' record—as a player, a coach, and as a great human being.●

HAPPY BIRTHDAY, BOB

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, today is Bob Hope's 75th birthday. It is particularly appropriate, therefore, that the House has set aside this time to honor this great and good American.

For nearly half a century Bob Hope has been making us laugh. He has lifted our spirits in the bad times and has helped us enjoy the good. He has entertained us from the stage, and on radio and television. He has rendered invaluable service to our service men and women around the globe.

At Christmas, after Christmas, Bob Hope has eased the pain of thousands of service personnel who have to be away from their loved ones on this most special day of the year. In this unselfish act, Bob Hope reminds us all of what is still good and great about America.

Bob's great ability to make us laugh at ourselves has helped Americans keep a healthier perspective on life. He reminds us that there is always a bright side to every problem and a ridiculous side to every human nature.

Throughout history, there has never been a man so widely acclaimed for his wit, humor and compassion as Bob Hope. It truly can be said he is loved by everyone.

Today Bob is celebrating his birthday, but, it is we who are really celebrating—celebrating our friendship with a man who has dedicated himself completely to the well-being of America.

Though America is great, it would be less great without Bob Hope.●

REGARDING TURKISH "PROPOSALS" FOR PEACE ON CYPRUS

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, in the interest of fairness of presenting all sides of the Cyprus issue I wish to place into the RECORD a statement made by His Excellency, the Foreign Minister of Cyprus, Mr. Nicos Rolandis. His statement was made in response to one made by Turkish Cypriot leader Denktash which was distributed to the House in a "Dear Colleague" letter and which was praised by the State Department, in a rather unusual gesture.

The occasion of the NATO summit in Washington should permit negotiations between the Presidents of Greece and Turkey. Such talks should be encouraged by the United States, but our State Department must avoid its "Turkey tilt" of several years ago.

The settlement which is reached must respect the territorial integrity of Cyprus. It must also result in full unification of displaced Greek-Cypriots who today find themselves as refugees on their own land. Finally, a complete accounting of the estimated 2,000 Greek Cypriots missing since the invasion must be provided.

At this point in the RECORD I wish to insert the statement of Mr. Rolandis:

STATEMENT BY HIS EXCELLENCY THE FOREIGN MINISTER OF CYPRUS, MR. NICOS ROLANDIS, MAY 23, 1978

Mr. Denktash has made a new statement but there is nothing new in it. He presents again to the whole world his well known "whatever-we-have-occupied-is-ours", proposals, decorated with cleverly drafted ornamental phraseology. The essence is the same, namely

1. Out of the 40 percent of Cyprus territory occupied by the Turkish army he offers back less than 1½ percent of unimportant, unproductive land. Nothing more.

2. On the Constitutional issue he proposes Equal partnership of the eighty-two percent Greek majority with the Turkish minority of eighteen percent, furthermore, the proposed constitutional structure is tantamount to deadlock and partition.

3. On the question of part of the town of Varosha he invites Greek Cypriot inhabitants to return under conditions of occupation. The offer is simply repeated in his new statement.

4. Regarding the principles of freedom of movement, freedom of settlement and the right to property, he offers nothing new and concrete. Nothing more than vague talk.

Mr. Denktash tries to convince the world public opinion that he is full of good will and flexibility, but the substance of his proposals could not be more negative. We are not interested in the window dressing of Mr. Denktash. We are not interested in his no-frills offer, which as it stands is that we should legalise the occupation of Cyprus by Turkey. We are not prepared to negotiate along these lines.

However, what is more surprising is that the State Department has made the unprecedented move of becoming the advocate of Mr. Denktash. The promotion of the Turkish proposals has been undertaken on a joint venture basis by Denktash and the State Department's spokesman.

If the goodwill is there indeed, we would rather like to see it in the substance of the proposals and not in their wrapping.●

CANAL TREATIES AND ECONOMICS

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the following thought-provoking editorial on the Panama Canal treaties which appeared in the Carpinteria Herald, May 18, 1978.

The editorial follows:

CANAL VOTE WAS ECONOMIC

All the nation watched as the U.S. Senate debated and finally ratified the Panama Canal treaties with almost no votes to spare. Many Americans wondered why their government was so anxious to not only give the canal to Panama, but to pay the Panamanians to take it off our hands.

Since this international situation affects all shipping states, including California, there should be concern not only about the national defense ramifications of the treaties but the economic developments as well.

It just could be that American banking interests which strongly supported ratification of the treaties, were the main reasons the Carter Administration, and that of Jerry Ford, were pushing so hard for those treaties.

As we all know, money does all the serious talking in the world. If not, why else would the American government worry about a tinhorn dictator like General Omar Torrijos, whose family has been involved in scandal and who threatened to take military action against United States troops guarding the Canal?

The fact is that Torrijos rewrote the Panamanian Banking laws in 1970 to provide a tax-free haven for foreign banks.

By 1976, foreign banks controlled 91% of the deposits and 77% of the loans. Today, because of Torrijos, Panama owes U.S. banks $1.8–$2 billion in short-term loans, and he had no way to repay that vast amount of money.

Torrijos had to have the revenues from the Canal not only to satisfy nationalistic sentiment, which he helped to foment, but to pay off the banks and redeem some of his pledges to a nation foundering in unemployment, and economic stagnation, and high cost of oil imports.

So economic reasons, it seems to us, probably outstripped those readily given by the administration as to why the Panama Canal treaties were required.

Now, President Carter has announced he will go to Panama for the formal signings in June, and won't that be a dandy picture, given that most polls show that the majority of Americans did not favor the surrender of the canal in the first place.

We wonder what Fidel Castro is thinking these days. He has an American military base at Guantanamo, on his island Communist bastion. Will he next demand that the United States vacate the premises, under threat of armed takeover? And will he demand monetary tribute, to boot?

We'd be surprised if he didn't, under present circumstances. The Carter Administration, so far, has downgraded American military power to the degree that our enemies could make a serious miscalculation as to our public will. The American people will have to wake up to that fact very quickly, before we become vulnerable to every two-bit dictator in the world!●

MARYLAND SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION CONCERNING WORLD WAR I VETERANS' BENEFITS

HON. MARJORIE S. HOLT

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Speaker, during the 1978 session of the Maryland General Assembly, both Houses unanimously passed Senate Joint Resolution No. 40, expressing support for H.R. 9000 of the Congress of the United States to provide a pension for World War I veterans. A long-time friend of mine, former Maryland Senator John F. McNulty, himself a World War I veteran and currently the chairman of the Maryland Veterans Home Commission, was instrumental in having this resolution enacted. I am a cosponsor of H.R. 9000 and I respectfully request that the text of the resolution be printed in the RECORD.

RESOLUTION NO. 40

A Senate Joint Resolution concerning World War I Veterans' Benefits for the purpose of expressing the support of the General Assembly of Maryland for HR 9000 of the Congress of the United States, a pension bill for World War I Veterans

Whereas, H.R. 9000 is presently being considered by the Congress of the United States and is a measure which gives to all World War I veterans a pension of $150 per month; and

Whereas, This measure is vitally important to those brave persons who served their country so very long ago; and

Whereas, At the time of their release from public service they were sent on their way with but a paltry recompense of $60 and fare back to their homes; and

Whereas, They received no educational benefits, no home loan money, no social security, no unemployment benefits and very little hospitalization; and

Whereas, World War I veterans formed the American Legion and they were advocates of benefits veterans now receive; and

Whereas, This year is the 60th anniversary of the end of World War I and the General Assembly of Maryland urges the Federal Government to finally reward those men who fought so bravely for their country; those men are now in their eighties: now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the General Assembly of Maryland, That this Body urges the Congress of the United States to send H.R. 9000 sailing through that Body so that our World War I veterans can receive the very modest sum for which provision is made by H.R. 9000; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this Resolution be sent to the Maryland Congressional Delegation: Senators Charles McC. Mathias, Jr. and Paul S. Sarbanes, Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C. 20510; and Representatives Robert E. Bauman, Clarence D. Long, Barbara A. Mikulski, Marjorie S. Holt, Gladys N. Spellman, Goodloe E. Byron, Parren J. Mitchell, and Newton I. Steers, Jr., House Office Building, Washington, D.C. 20515.●

THE SOCIAL SECURITY DISABILITY PROGRAM

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my "Washington Report" for Wednesday, May 31, 1978, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE SOCIAL SECURITY DISABILITY PROGRAM

On a recent Saturday morning I visited four Ninth District post offices to talk with local residents. About half of the 60 people with whom I spoke had a problem with the social security disability program. My experience that morning was really only a small indication of a big problem: the social security disability program has drifted into crisis over the past few years and now appears to be out of control.

It should be recognized that the program has helped many disabled workers and their families. I myself am aware of case after case in which the program has saved families from financial disaster after a disabling injury or illness. Statistics show that the people who receive the benefits tend to be among the more underprivileged in our nation. They are typically older, have worked at low-paying, insecure jobs and have not had the advantages of advanced education. They are people who are very vulnerable to the devastating effects of serious injury or illness.

However, in the past 20 years the program has grown from a modest effort to assist disabled workers to one of the government's largest, most controversial and least understood initiatives. Since 1970 its cost has quadrupled to $13 billion per year while the number of persons receiving benefits—2.8 million—has doubled. In 1965 there were 18 beneficiaries for every 1,000 workers, but today the ratio is 31 to 1,000.

The program has been plagued with confusion about the definition of disability. This confusion has created a bureaucratic maze and has overloaded the courts with disputed claims for benefits. Program administrators are perplexed because their decisions are often overturned on appeal. Most importantly, millions of Americans are frustrated—and many are impoverished—because they are denied benefits in a ruling that seems arbitrary to them. To make matters worse, government actuaries missed badly in estimating the cost of the program. So high is the cost that the depletion of the disability trust fund has become a major issue in the financing of the social security system.

While the experts do not know precisely why program cost and the number of beneficiaries have risen so dramatically, several factors have surely contributed to the increases. High unemployment has made it harder for disabled workers to keep jobs and has thus prompted them to seek disability benefits. The program has become widely known and the receipt of benefits more socially acceptable. Benefits have been generous, making jobs less attractive. Claimants—often with the help of attorneys—have been more willing to challenge government decisions. Also, the test for disability has been liberalized, at least in the view of some observers.

Despite the widespread dissatisfaction with the program, it is not at all clear what the Congress should do to change it. Part of the problem is the decision-making process through which benefits are awarded or withheld. In order to qualify for benefits, a person must be unable to engage in any substantial gainful activity due to a medically determinable physical or mental impairment which has lasted or is expected to last at least a year, or which will result in death. There is no room for partial disability: a worker is disabled, or else he is not. Individuals in like circumstances are treated inconsistently and, given the subjective nature of the judgment on disability, inequities are inevitable. Since state agencies determine if applicants are disabled, standards vary enormously from state to state. I have reviewed hundreds of pending claims for benefits over the years, and I still cannot tell which will be honored and which will not.

The program is now under intensive scrutiny in Washington. Recommendations for improvement will soon be made to the Congress, probably sometime during 1979. Congressional committees have been tracking the program for years and will undoubtedly be urging reforms of their own.

In my view, several steps should be taken to assure the integrity of the social security disability program. We should—

Tighten the definition of disability,

Overhaul the cumbersome federal-state administrative machinery,

Reduce the delay in making decisions on eligibility,

Eliminate some of the excessive benefits, and Encourage more beneficiaries to return to work.

There is general recogntion that changes must be made, but it is apparent that the problems of the social security disability program will not be solved easily or soon.●

DOES CONGRESS MATTER?

HON. TOM HAGEDORN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. HAGEDORN. Mr. Speaker, if my memory serves me correctly, this body rejected legislation last Tuesday to establish a Federal Office on Domestic Violence, and to provide Federal grants in this area. One of the major opposition arguments, and that to which I subscribed, was that this was simply not an appropriate area for Federal involvement. Far less domestic violence would be done to the Constitution of this country if these programs were carried out—as I believe they ought to be—at the State and local levels.

It should therefore be of interest to this body that the next day's Federal Register contained a description of ACTION's proposed new demonstration grant program for family violence, at an initial cost of $450,000. It appears that all we have accomplished by last week's vote is to transfer authority for this program from the proposed new Federal agency to ACTION, an object, that I would guess, would not have been endorsed, by most of the opponents of this legislation.

Along with the initiatives by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms, the ACTION proposal is merely the latest instance in which the Federal bureaucracy has attempted to do what Congress has explicitly refused to do.

A majority of this body voted against involving Washington in affairs of domestic violence, with many of us relying heavily upon constitutional arguments. It is not ACTION's prerogative to overrule the decisions of this body.●

HOSPITAL COSTS

HON. PAUL G. ROGERS

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, later this week, the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce faces a crucial vote on the issue of hospital cost containment. Following that, the full Ways and Means Committee must also act on this issue. I need not remind my colleagues of the vital importance of hospital cost containment to Congress, and to the American people. Rising hospitals costs present one of the greatest inflationary pressures our economy will face in the months and years ahead.

The average cost per family of health care in this country is now $2,200 per year, and it continues to rise at a rate in excess of 15 percent per year. Unless we begin to control the rate of increase, those costs will continue to escalate far faster than any other segment of the economy, greatly hampering any efforts, by either the Congress or the President, to control inflation.

For that reason, as we prepare for full committee consideration of the hospital cost containment bill, I urge all my House colleagues to read a speech delivered by HEW Secretary Joseph A. Califano, Jr., to the National Journal's Third Annual National Leadership Conference on Health Policy last week. In it, Secretary Califano graphically summarizes the current trends in health care costs in America—and what it will mean for America's future, including any national health insurance program we may adopt, if those costs continue to rise unchecked.

While I and my health subcommittee colleagues have not always agreed with Secretary Califano on every aspect of his Department's proposals, there can be no question that on all major health care issues, we share common goals and common hopes for America's health care future. I therefore ask that the Secretary's speech be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

REMARKS OF JOSEPH A. CALIFANO, JR.

This meeting on the future of the nation's health policy takes place at a critical moment.

This week, the House Commerce Committee faces an important vote on the issue of hospital cost containment.

In the next few weeks, the President will announce principles that will guide the development of a national health program—an initiative we intend to propose later this year.

These two issues—national health insurance and Cost Containment—are linked not only by proximity on the calendar. They stand inseparably together in their importance to the nation, for hospital cost containment symbolizes the kind of changes we must make if the nation is to have a health care system that serves all Americans fairly, sensitively, efficiently and at highest quality.

Indeed, my purpose today is to underscore these points:

First, this Nation cannot afford its present health-care system, with its runaway, out-of-control prices and its perverse incentives that favor waste over efficiency.

Second, there must be broad, fundamental improvements in the health-care system: Improvements aimed at controlling the spiralling costs of health care, building new incentives, enhancing quality, improving the delivery system, and a major reorientation toward prevention.

Third, what this nation needs is a national health program—for even Lloyd's of London backed by the United States mint could not afford simply to insure the existing profligate, inflationary health care industry.

Without cost restraints and efficiency incentives, the towering inferno of health industry inflation will continue to threaten the entire economy; the Federal budget will be even more heavily skewed toward health care spending that too often does little to improve our national health; and scarce Federal dollars will be diverted from other urgent social needs.

With these basic thoughts on the table, let me describe briefly for you the conditions, as we see them, that render a national health program essential not only to provide quality health care for all Americans—but to provide such care at a reasonable price. In short, this Nation cannot afford not to have a national health program.

Nearly 45 million Americans—about one person in five in this Nation—have either no health insurance or inadequate coverage.

Twenty-four million have no health insurance, no access to free care through the Veterans Administration or the Public Health Service, and no help from medicaid or medicare.

Nineteen million people—most of them low-income families—have expensive but inadequate health insurance which does not include important elements of basic health coverage.

About eighty-eight million Americans are not adequately protected against the costs of medical catastrophes.

Yet in spite of these facts, the United States is the only major industrial nation without some form of universal health insurance or some national health program.

We see national health insurance as part of the answer to these critical problems of coverage, but also as part of our efforts to deal with other problems in the health care system.

We are deeply concerned that millions of families are denied decent health care because they live in rural areas or inner-city neighborhoods. It is widely recognized that we need to distribute our resources better and to build new capacity in underserved areas.

We are troubled by a health care system that neglects prevention and emphasizes costly acute care. The Federal health budget for fiscal 1978 reflects that imbalance: 48 billion dollars for treatment; less than two billion dollars for prevention.

We are deeply disturbed by the inadequacy of long-term care in America—particularly at a moment when the number and proportion of older citizens is growing. We have created a costly nursing-home industry that consumes 40 percent of every Medicaid dollar, but often fails to provide our elderly citizens with lives of dignity and self-respect.

Because we intend the national health program to address not only financing but other problems too, we believe it offers hope of changing some or all of these troubling conditions.

But first we confront squarely the biggest problem of all: the mushrooming cost of health care in America—the steep, uncontrolled, destructive inflation in health costs which today threatens to sabotage all our other efforts in the health field.

The dimensions of this health care inflation are staggering:

The nation's total annual spending for all health care has risen from $39 billion in 1965 to $163 billion last year. By fiscal 1983, on present economic projections, the nation's annual spending for health care will reach $310 billion—about a third of a trillion dollars, with little change in either the quality of that care or its uneven distribution.

In 1965, we spent 5.9 percent of the Gross National Product on health care. Today the percentage is 8.8 percent. Federal spending for health care in fiscal 1979 will total $63 billion: almost thirteen cents of every federal dollar. And by 1980, that figure could rise to $72 billion.

The median income of American families was $15,000 in fiscal 1976. And in that year, the average family expenditure for health care was nearly $1600—more than ten percent of median incomes.

The average annual inflation rate for the health care industry was 9.5 percent over the last three years: more than one and a half times the overall rate of increase for all consumer prices. If it had not been for steep health-care inflation, the Nation's inflation rate for those years would have been 5.8 percent, rather than the actual rate of 6.1 percent. In other words, 5 percent of inflation in that period could have been avoided if health costs had merely risen at the same rate as other prices.

Other Western industrial nations—notably Canada and West Germany—have also faced the problem of runaway health costs. But our rate of health cost inflation is steeper than theirs—and unlike them, we have not yet taken measures to contain costs.

The reasons for these steeply rising costs are not hard to find.

The consumer—the patient—may select his family doctor. But he rarely selects his specialist, his hospital, the services he buys, or the tests to which he is subjected. The physician is the key decisionmaker for such services—indeed, for 70 percent of all health services. This means, in dollar terms, that in fiscal 1977 the Nation's physicians controlled $110 billion in health care expenditures.

And the physician does not pay the bill; he only sends the bill. Indeed, neither the patient nor the doctor pays for most health services. Ninety percent of hospital bills, for example, are paid by third parties—private insurance companies, medicaid or medicare.

This means that the incentives at work in the health care industry are largely incentives to increase spending rather than to save. Doctors and other practitioners are paid on a fee-for-service basis: the more services, the more fees. In addition to the obvious economic incentives built into such a system, the present legal framework of malpractice provides added encouragement for doctors to order up more and more services as they practice defensively, as well as profitably.

Health costs today are an emerging political issue of enormous concern to the American people. In one poll, a majority listed health costs as one of their top three worries. The Carter administration has taken some major steps in the health field over the past sixteen months to deal with this corrosive problem.

Hospital Cost Containment legislation, now pending in the Congress, is the most important of these steps. That legislation, introduced almost a year ago, is still awaiting final Congressional action. The need for it is more critical than ever. Fully 40 percent of health care costs are hospital costs; the inflation rate in hospital costs was 15.3 percent last year. The Consumer Price Index indicates no let up in hospital price increases in recent months.

Consider the impact of hospital costs on the families of America and on the National Treasury:

As recently as 1965, an average hospital stay cost less than $350; it now costs over $1,525; by 1982, it will cost at least $2,600.

In 1966, total spending on hospital care was $14 billion. Eleven years later, in 1977, it was $67 billion. By 1986, if the rate of inflation is not slowed, total spending on hospital care alone could reach $220 billion.

From 1975 to 1977, hospital costs mushroomed at an average annual rate of 17.3 percent—more than two and a half times the overall rate of increase in the Consumer Price Index.

If this legislation had been enacted by October 1, 1977, as the President proposed, the nation could have saved $2 billion in hospital costs by now.

Those dollars are now lost. But the Hospital Cost Containment legislation remains one of the most important measures that Congress can enact to fight inflation. Indeed, it stands near the top of the President's legislative priorities.

If the President's proposals were passed this year, to take effect on next January 1, the nation could achieve impressive savings which could substantially reduce inflationary pressures:

We could save $19 billion in Federal spending by the end of fiscal 1983;

In the same period, overall savings—Federal, state, and private—would total $56 billion.

Those who argue that the legislation would diminish the quality of hospital care are wrong. In fact, this legislation is aimed at waste and inefficiency in hospital operations.

The nation's hospitals, under the legislation, will have the freedom to target their own areas for savings. But we have identified more than $5 billion in potential savings that can be achieved each year with no decline in the quality of patient care:

240,000 hospital beds nationwide are empty; at least 100,000 of these represent excess capacity; at a maintenance cost of some $20,000 per empty bed, their annual cost to America is $2 billion.

Of the 715,000 people now in acute care hospitals, an estimated 100,000 do not need to be hospitalized. They could receive better care at home, in skilled nursing or outpatient facilities. These patients are generating excess charges of $7.5 million per day—nearly $3 billion per year.

Hospitals are buying expensive equipment that is medically unnecessary or duplicated nearby.

Many hospitals are failing to achieve possible energy savings and other economies—savings that could amount to more than $300 million each year.

Other savings could be achieved by limiting expensive but unnecessary tests and therapies, by conducting some diagnostic tests on an outpatient basis rather than in the hospital. Prices could be lowered to reduce the $2 billion in surpluses and profits accumulated by hospitals in calendar 1977.

Given the pressure driving health costs upward, and the great savings that this legislation could achieve, the nation simply cannot afford to have this proposal languish in the Congress. Some leaders in the Congress have understood this and acted accordingly. But we have encountered some serious delays and diversions.

This week on Capitol Hill, opponents of the President's program are crowding the halls of Congress—most of them representing interests with a stake in high health-care prices.

The siren-song they are singing is, I would remind you, a song we've heard before, from an old familiar score. In early 1974, during oversight hearings on the Economic Stabilization Program, a spokesman for the hospital industry assured the Congress that if cost controls were lifted, the nation's hospitals themselves would undertake to prevent any bulge in costs. He expressed confidence that, if controls were lifted, hospital prices would rise only two to three percent.

You may remember what happened: Hospital expenditures shot up, and peaked at an inflation rate of 22.2 percent in March 1976.

The same forces are now at work to dissuade the Congress from enacting truly effective cost containment measures. The process in which they are engaged, I submit, is not in the national interest; they are, in effect, lobbying for runaway inflation.

In sum, I would simply say this: The time for the cost containment legislation is not just now—it was last year. I hope the Congress will act quickly and favorably in the national interest. I am working closely and energetically with the key leaders in the Congress to achieve the strongest anti-inflation, hospital cost containment legislation that the Congress is prepared to enact.

Beyond the cost containment legislation, we are taking other immediate steps to contain rising health costs.

We have drafted regulations limiting Medicare payments for lab tests and medical equipment to the most reasonable available price in a given community.

We are tightening our standards governing physician visits, hospital stays, and medical procedures under Medicare and Medicaid—to ensure that all services are medically necessary.

We are moving vigorously toward a program of "second opinions" designed to reduce unnecessary elective surgery by giving patients more to say about their own health care.

We are taking steps to encourage health institutions to launch savings efforts—competitive bidding, for example, and shared services such as billing and laundry service.

And finally, beyond immediate, urgent steps to control health inflation, we have made, over the past year, several more fundamental changes in health policy; changes that in time should help change not only the cost of health care, but the whole landscape of health care in America.

So far, these efforts are just beginnings—but they promise important results.

We have taken steps to encourage Health Maintenance Organizations with more than rhetoric. We have submitted new legislation to improve the legal and fiscal position of HMOs. And the Department has made a major effort to interest corporate America in the concept of quality health care through HMOs.

We have published the first set of National Guidelines for Health Planning designed to help state and local agencies assess their need for medical services and facilities. These guidelines will help communities act forcefully to control excess capacity in the health care industry—action that is desperately needed both to assure quality care and to keep costs down. They are aimed at preventing investment in expensive, unnecessary medical equipment and facilities in eight areas ranging from hospital capacity to specialized cardiac-care units to "CAT" Scanners.

We have launched Project Integrity, aimed at rooting out fraud and abuse in the Medicaid program. We will expand this project into other areas of federally-funded health care. We have also issued regulations to establish state fraud and abuse control units.

We are urging PSROs to adopt nationally established criteria for eleven of the most commonly performed surgical procedures. These standards were drawn up by medical professionals at the request of the National PSRO Council. Further criteria are now under development so that regional performance can be compared and individual surgeon's profiles assessed by their peers. The incredible range of surgical operations for similar population groups must be explained to an increasingly informed and concerned public.

For years, leaders and citizens concerned with the Nation's health policy have had a vision of the kind of health care system that this Nation should have.

Such a system, to begin with, would emphasize prevention—not just acute health care and intervention in illness. It would encourage people to take responsibility for their own health—to practice some habits, like exercise and good nutrition, and avoid others, like cigarette smoking and overeating.

Such a system would feature a range of health care alternatives:—effective programs of home health care; widespread health maintenance organizations that emphasize prevention and provide quality care; new types of health workers like physician assistants and nurse practitioners; mental health as an integral part of all health care.

Such a system would discourage excess capacity, creating only the services and facilities that are needed. And it would distribute its benefits more evenly—so that rural citizens and inner city people would not suffer for lack of health care.

Finally, such a system would emphasize both quality and efficiency—not simply quality at the highest possible price; not simply quality bought by and for those who live in the right place and can pay the right price.

For too many years, we have been able to envision such a system. But we have done little to achieve it.

The Carter Administration intends to change that. We intend to provide the kind of leadership that will ultimately build the kind of system I have described.

The initiatives I have described are a part of our effort to do that.

And we are considering other possible legislation:

A major prevention program;

A proposal to redirect our support of medical education to limit oversupply of physicians and to encourage physicians to choose primary care practice in rural and inner city areas.

Legislation to translate the recommendations of the President's Commission on Mental Health into a program of action.

Changes in our system of long-term care.

An overhaul of our disability program.

And finally, but by no means least—a proposal for a national health program to be advanced before the end of this year.

Let me emphasize, however—at the close, as I did at the start—that a national health program must not simply be a way of "buying" the present inadequate health care system. That system is simply too expensive and inefficient to buy at all—with or without national health program.

So I would urge all who are concerned with health care in America—the Congress, the medical community, our fellow citizens and opinion leaders like yourselves—to undertake with vigor the work of turning the vision I have described into reality.

I do not believe that vision is radical, utopian—or beyond our capacity as a nation. I believe it is a practical vision—a vision the President carefully set forth during his campaign and which he intends to work to achieve.

We have undertaken large efforts before, and we have succeeded.

I believe we can do it well: that we can achieve, for our children and for their children, our shared goal of quality health care for all—at a cost this nation can afford.

Thank you.●

JOINT CHIEFS AND TEST BAN

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the following column on the test ban by Rowland Evans and Robert Novak, which appeared in the Washington Post:

TEST BAN: BYPASSING THE CHIEFS

(By Rowland Evans and Robert Novak)

Just two days after secret testimony by the new chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff reaffirmed the military's opposition to a total nuclear test ban, President Carter ordered U.S. negotiators to press for precisely such a deal with the Soviets.

Carter's propensity for making military decisions against the military's advice has never been clearer. On May 18, at closed-door Senate hearings on his nomination as JCS chairman, Air Force Gen. David Jones unequivocally opposed, in the interest of national security, a "zero yield" ban (prohibiting even low-yield explosions) of all underground tests. He was patently unaware that a "presidential decision memorandum" taking the opposite position was being readied for Carter's signature May 20.

After the fact, the Joint Chiefs met on Blue Monday, May 22, with a majority opposed to the President's decision. The choices before them now are agonizing. Should they loyally back their President to support what they consider a hazardous course for the nation? Should they fully express their misgivings but only in congressional hearing rooms? Or should they go to the nation, either directly or indirectly?

The uniformed military's concern over the test-ban treaty surpasses earlier chagrin over removing troops from Korea, canceling the B1 bomber and suspending neutron-warhead production. Jones, criticized by fellow officers as overly pliable to civilian politicians, made no fuss about such earlier Carter moves as Air Force chief of staff.

Consequently, defense-oriented members of the Senate Armed Services Committee pounced on JCS chairman-designate Jones when his confirmation hearings began May 18. Those senators were particularly concerned about the test-ban treaty. Paul Warnke, chief disarmament negotiator, that week was pressing for a U.S.-Soviet moratorium on all tests prior to negotiations for a "zero yield" treaty.

Answering questions from Sen. Jesse Helms (R-N.C.), the general declared, "I could not recommend a comprehensive test ban . . . in the context of zero testing." The secret transcript reveals Sen. Harry F. Byrd (I-Va.) asking whether Jones agreed that any treaty must permit testing in the 3- to 5-kiloton range, below which tests cannot be verified. "Yes, senator, I do," the general answered.

Sen. Henry M. Jackson (D-Wash.) pointed out that the Joint Chiefs previously opposed a zero-yield treaty. "I subscribe to that," Jones responded. ". . . We don't see any capability to verify the Soviets with any assurance down to zero yield." Pinning Jones down, Jackson asked whether "this is still the JCS position." The response: "Yes, it has not changed."

Jones refused to alter this stance despite prodding by Sen. John Culver (D-Iowa), battering ram of the arms-control bloc. "Isn't it true," asked Culver, that the treaty "will provide us with a fair degree of confidence of compliance and provide a low incentive for Soviet cheating?" The general stood his ground: Cheating "may not be quite that difficult. . . . I am not assured that we would have confidence the Soviets couldn't cheat."

Culver persisted, suggesting that a treaty lasting five years or less would not threaten reliability of the U.S. nuclear stockpile. Jones replied that "something unexpected" can always effect "reliability," adding, "You just may not find the problems if you don't do testing."

Jones clearly was uninformed about other plays elsewhere in the Washington arms game. Warnke that week failed to get his pre-negotiations moratorium but won agreement on a zero-yield, five-year treaty (three years longer than the chiefs prefer). The "presidential decision memorandum" signed May 20 directed negotiators to start from Soviet proposals for on-site inspection and unmanned seismic-detector stations—considered inadequate for verifications by Pentagon scientific experts.

The JCS convened May 22 to talk it over. Army Gen. Bernard Rogers, Adm. James L. Holloway and Marine Corps Gen. Louis Wilson were dead against it. The new Air Force chief of staff, Gen. Lew Allen, wavered. Jones seemed to back away from his strong stance, suggesting that the chiefs should study the question a little more.

But during his confirmation hearings, Jones had locked himself into independence. When one defense-oriented senator after another asked whether he would be his own man as JCS chairman, Jones replied time and again: He would not travel the country making speeches, but he would give Congress his own blunt opinion even if it conflicted with Jimmy Carter's.

The president and the general obviously conflict on the test-ban treaty, barring an instant conversion by the general. Jones has told friends he will be an "activist" chairman, but it is not clear whether he means activity in behalf of administration policies or activity in behalf of the military's position. The answer will come from his next step on the test-ban treaty.●

EDMUND H. HARVEY

HON. THOMAS B. EVANS, JR.

OF DELAWARE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. EVANS of Delaware. Mr. Speaker, last month the conservation movement in the State of Delaware lost one of its most distinguished leaders with the passing of Mr. Edmund H. Harvey.

Mr. Harvey dedicated his life to preserving many of the unspoiled wildlife areas in Delaware, not only for this generation, but for future generations as well. He was the founder and president of Delaware Wild Lands, Inc., which purchased thousands of acres of land on the Delmarva Peninsula as refuges for wildlife, and had received scores of medals and citations for his efforts to preserve natural resources.

Mr. Harvey lent his considerable skills to many national and State organizations for the preservation of wildlife and natural resources, including the National Wildlife Federation, Delawareans for Orderly Development, and Ducks Unlimited.

During his lifetime, he received many honors, including the national conservationist of 1973 award, the American Motors Conservation Award and the United Auto Workers Conservationist of 1971.

The State of Delaware has always been proud of its conservationist traditions. These traditions have developed because of people like Ted Harvey and he will be sorely missed by all who treasure our State and Nations environmental values.●

OBSERVATIONS ON THE CANADIAN HEALTH CARE EXPERIENCE—PART IV

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, the Canadian experience with health care has been observed by many Americans who are involved in developing a national health insurance program for our country. I have been sharing with my colleagues a paper on this subject which was prepared by Richard Lehrman, who serves on the staff of the Select Committee on Aging, which it is my privilege to chair.

I wish to include, for the benefit of my colleagues, the final portion of this paper:

PHYSICIANS

Opponents of the Medical Care Act argued that Medicare in Canada would serve to drive physicians away to other countries where they would find a more lucrative and attractive practice. Such predictions appeared even more dismal in the face of Canada's low physician-per-population ratio—1 per 850 in 1961.[113] In fact, however, the physician-population ratio increased to 1 in 633 in 1972.[114] Apparently, physicians have found practice under Canadian Medicare to be attractive and lucrative.

A major contribution to this phenomenon is a curious paradox regarding physicians' fees and income. Physician fees in Canada rose steadily in relation to the Consumer Price Index until 1969, the year Medicare took effect.[115] Physicians' fees have since risen at a rate slightly lower than the Canadian Consumer Price Index.[116] In the United States, however, physicians' fees have continued to rise at a rate faster than that of the CPI.[117]

By contrast, the ratio of a physicians' net income to the CPI in Canada has skyrocketed in relation to that of a physician in the United States.[118] In fact, the average increase in net physician income, deflated by the Canadian CPI, was more than twice as great during the transition to Medicare as it was in the immediately previous period. In Quebec, the average physician earned approximately $23,000 in 1967, $25,000 in 1968, and $27,000 in 1969 and 1970.[119] The same physician earned over $41,000 in 1971, the year after Quebec joined Medicare.[120]

Canadian doctors more than doubled their gross and net earnings from fees between 1959 and 1969, while holding their expenses to a smaller increase.[121] Doctors are the highest paid category of workers in Canada, earning almost five times as much as the national average, and over $7,100 per year more than lawyers, the next highest-earning profession.[122] These figures may reflect the reasons why almost none of the Canadian physicians have opted out of Medicare (except in Ontario, where only 9% have opted out).

Footnotes at end of article.

There are two factors contributing to the seemingly illogical situation where physicians fees are increasing at a lesser rate than the Consumer Price Index, but their incomes continue to grow faster than the CPI. For the 99 percent of the physicians who do not go out of the program, the reimbursement method is based upon a fee schedule negotiated between the Province and the provincial medical association.[123] Often, the fees have been "leveled up", or hiked and passed off as "customary". In addition, physicians fees have traditionally been based on the principle that doctors must collect more from those able to pay because a certain percentage of patients ended up as bad debts.[124] Under Canadian Medicare, however, there are no bad debts, or collection expenditures.[125]

In evaluating the success of a nation's attempt to meet the health needs of its citizenry, three major factors must be considered. The patients' coverage must be comprehensive enough so that barriers to all types of health care will be removed. The compensation for those who administer the care must be high enough to provide for the best possible care. Finally, the cost of the health care must be low enough to provide the nation with remaining resources adequate to meet its other needs.

The Canadian Health Insurance Program provides far superior coverage in almost every category, and does so to a far greater portion of its population than the U.S. Physicians are compensated well enough for 98 percent of them to desire to remain with the plan, and for a doubling of the former number of physicians and surgeons who desired to immigrate to Canada.[126] Canadian expenditures on health care have stabilized to the point where Canadians actually spent a lower share of their GNP on health in 1976 than in 1971—7.1 percent as opposed to 7.3 percent. By contrast, health expenditures in the United States have soared from 7.6 percent of GNP in 1971 to 8.6 percent of GNP in 1976.[127]

It is indeed curious, in short, that there has been so little consideration of a health care program that is so much more successful than ours. From the perspective of a country where the average person's health bill grew from $78 in 1950, and $142 in 1960, to $547 in 1975; where health spending is over 10 times the spending of 25 years ago; and where over 75 percent of the poor have no hospital insurance, Canada's health insurance program should appear very attractive.[128] Canada's approach is not one of state or socialized medicine, but rather one of state sponsored health insurance.

"LOATHE-HATE" RELATIONSHIP

HON. CHARLES WILSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. CHARLES WILSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, as my colleagues are quite aware, OSHA and I have had a long-running "loathe-hate" relationship. Letters from constituents, such as the following, serve to reenforce my opinion of OSHA as an agency which specializes in the astonishing, absurd, and disgusting.

I respectfully submit the following for my colleagues' attention:

May 17, 1978.

DEAR CHARLIE: Bravo on your taking on the OSHA, or the "Oh, Pshaw" as I sometimes call them. My wife, who is a Industrial Nurse, came home with a funny story the other day about OSHA making her employer build a catwalk. The employees wouldn't use it, but next time the OSHA inspector came around he fell off it while inspecting it. The next day, three OSHA people came to inspect the site of the accident, but one female OSHA person was wearing pants too tight for her to get up to the catwalk unassisted. I've been trying to get Lois to write an eye-witness account of it so I can send it to you; I'll keep trying.

Regards,

BASIL BARBEE.●

RICHARD L. STROUT, JOURNALIST

HON. JOHN BRADEMAS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, last month a special Pulitzer Prize was awarded to Richard L. Strout for his long career as a dedicated journalist. Like many of us, I have for many years read Mr. Strout under his own name in the Christian Science Monitor and as TRB in the New Republic.

Perhaps Mr. Strout described the latter association best in his own words when at the end of his TRB column of March 18, 1978, he wrote:

Oh, and I almost forgot—this is an anniversary. Thirty-five years ago this month this reporter became TRB, marking some kind of record, I imagine, for continuity.

Those of us who read Richard Strout—and TRB—know his writing to be marked by wit, integrity, and a dedication to justice.

Mr. Speaker, on March 14, 1978, Mr. Strout celebrated his 80th birthday. I draw to the attention of my colleagues a number of articles that appeared in tribute to him on that occasion. The articles follow:

RICHARD LEE STROUT: ANY REGRETS? HELL NO!

(By Boris Weintraub)

On a day back in 1921, Richard Lee Strout, a young reporter for the Christian Science Monitor came to Washington for the first time to do some research on a series he was writing about a raging strike of coal miners.

Now it is 1978—57 years later, for those who count slowly—and there is a raging strike of coal miners going, and Richard Lee Strout is still here writing for the Christian Science Monitor. He may hate the term "dean of the Washington press corps"—"What the hell does that mean, anyway?" he asks, and he says that he is "surprised to find how many people mistake longevity for profundity." But it is, nonetheless, a remarkable achievement to remain as active as Richard L. Strout has for so many years and never, not once, lose his enthusiasm for his work.

"Oh, gee, that was wonderful!" he will say as he recalls some reporting experience from 30 or 40 or 50 years ago. "Oh, geez, that was a lot of fun."

MARCH 14, 1978: EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY

Richard L. Strout will be 80 years old Tuesday. He will pay the occasion as little mind as he can. He will still come to work, sit down at an ancient rolltop desk in his office that may be as old as he is, pore over some report from a government agency or attend a press conference or conduct an interview, and then he will probably write a piece for the Monitor in which he reports something that everybody else in the massive Washington press corps of today has, somehow or other, missed. (James Reston has said that Strout "must have an extra gland, because he still runs around like a kid.")

The next day, he will not write for the Monitor but for the New Republic, and, thus, will take part in marking yet another anniversary. It is 35 years since Strout replaced Kenneth Crawford as the author of the New Republic's most famous column. Among all his other achievements, Richard L. Strout is "TRB."

THE EARLY YEARS

Actually, Strout has not been in Washington continuously since that 1921 visit, during which he tagged along with Cora Rigby, then chief of the Monitor's Washington bureau, to a presidential press conference conducted by Warren G. Harding, the first of the 11 presidents he has covered. He returned to Boston and worked there until Christmas week in 1924, when he was assigned to the Washington bureau. He and his bride piled their belongings into a Model T Ford and drove here as fast as they could, making the journey in three days.

At the time, Strout was earning $60 a week, and considered it a decent salary. After all, back during that 1921 visit, he had written home worriedly:

"I am paying $2 a night for my room. Things are very expensive down here."

Lovely recollections like these have been sprinkled like little jewels in a series Strout has been writing for the Monitor at the rate of once a month under the heading "Richard L. Strout Recalls America." The series, which will be expanded into a book, began with him describing how he shipped out for England in 1919 as a messman which led to his first newspaper job, on the Sheffield Independent.

By that time, he already had accumulated some experience in the world. After graduation from Harvard, he had joined the Army, fired with Wilsonian zeal to "make the world safe for democracy."

"But they called the war off before I had paid for my unifrom," he says now with a gleam in his eyes, which are barely visible under a pair of eyebrows of John L. Lewis proportions.

Strout spent two years in England, spent a brief spell in Ireland reporting on the troubles there, and then returned to an America he found completely changed from the way he had left it.

"I had culture shock when I came back," he says. "When I left, we were all talking about making the world safe, about creating the League of Nations, and so on. When I returned, isolationism was coming in a mighty wave, and the League was forgotten.

"I was looking for my foundations, so I went back to Boston, which then had 10 distinct daily newspapers. I applied at several papers, and got a job on the Post: a tawdry, exciting, sensational paper. My job was to get pictures of women who had just been run over by a truck, that sort of thing."

Strout held the job at the Post for only a few days—during which time the paper reported in a front page story the selection of a jury to try a fish peddler and a cobbler named Nicola Sacco and Bartolomeo Vanzetti on murder charges—before the Monitor beckoned with another job offer.

"They gave me a job, and I've been with the paper ever since," he says.

FIVE DECADES COVERING WASHINGTON

The Teapot Dome scandal was in full flower by the time Strout came to Washington, and he covered some of the Senate's investigation in the Senate Caucus Room. Years later, he returned to the same room to cover the Senate's investigation into another scandal then in full flower, called Watergate. Nothing had changed, he reported, except for the presence of the hot lights of television, and the fact that this later scandal was worse.

"It was a special kind of corruption without greed," he wrote in a TRB column. "No sex, no dollars. Just power. It doesn't strike at oil leases, it strikes at democracy."

Hardly any major story of the past five decades has escaped Strout's keen eye. The Depression, the bonus marches, the New Deal, World War II, McCarthyism—predictably, Sen. Joseph R. McCarthy attacked him for leftist tendencies—the Kennedy Camelot, the Johnson Great Society, on and on. He found himself in an abandoned building on Pennsylvania. Avenue with a group of bonus marchers when Gen. Douglas MacArthur moved to oust them, and had a frontrow seat at the riots which the ouster inspired. On Pearl Harbor day, he went to the White House, and "stood on the South Portico watching the isolationist senators go in gloomily to see the president." He was on a ship speeding toward France on D–Day, with a military stenographer assigned to him "to take down my every thought." He has rarely not been in the right place at the right time.

And he has written about what he has seen or read or heard with a vivid style that sometimes rambles but always makes the reader understand that what he is writing about really, truly matters. Here, for example, is the beginning of one of the "Recalls" series, called"A Time of Demagogues":

"It is March, 1934. I am sitting in the press gallery of the United States Senate. Franklin D. Roosevelt has been president for two years. A senator gets the floor; he seems ordinary, but why does he wear that bright pink shirt? He looks guideless at first and then formidable, with rubbery pink face and pop eyes and an ingratiating grin like the caricature of a cherub. He smirks up at the press gallery.

"It is Huey Long, the Kingfish. His language has a swaggering informality (though when he chooses, he can speak conventionally and eloquently). Every colloquial 'y'all and 'ain't' pokes fun at the Senate establishment. He torments slow-moving leader Joseph T. Robinson like a matador with a bull. Gallery crowds love it; senators hate it. Franklin Roosevelt is rumored to have called him one of the two most dangerous men in America; the other . . . ? Well, the story goes he mentioned Gen. Douglas MacArthur, the man who ousted the bonus army."

Who among us with the slightest interest in American history could fail to read on?

RICHARD L. STROUT IS "TRB"

It was in 1943 that Kenneth Crawford and the New Republic came to a parting of the ways, and Strout, who had been helping raise his five children by free-lancing everywhere he could, was offered the TRB column. At first, he was dubious, but Crawford assured him, he says, that it was easy.

"All you have to do is get mad at someone every week and spit in their eye," he says Crawford told him.

The column, which took its name from an editor's reversal of the letters of a passing New York BRT subway train, has been a fixture in the magazine throughout the magazine's stormy history, its ups and downs and changes of ownership and changes in editorship. None of this bothers Strout much; he just keeps sending in the column every week.

There have been some changes recently. In the interest of truth-in-journalism, the column's author is now identified in the 60 or so papers (including The Star) which carry it. "That makes it harder," he says, "because I used to be able to just dash it off and nobody knew who wrote it. Now I've got to be more careful."

The column, like much of his regular reporting for the Monitor, bears the stamp of the never-ending Strout curiosity. He has what another syndicated Washington columnist calls "a remarkable ability to keep the focus on issues that the rest of us let slide, and keep coming back to them from time to time." For example, he is utterly fascinated by the Malthusian questions of food supply and population growth, considering these the basic questions.

He is troubled by what he sees as the problems in the American system, problems which seem to be multiplying. "What a clumsy form of government we have!" he exclaims, and he frets over a national failure of will to act on energy matters, the decline of a responsible two-party system, the inordinately long and preposterously constructed system by which Americans choose a president.

These things come so gradually, you don't see them," he complains. "And if anybody says we should look ahead, he is criticized for being an apostle of doom." He thinks we would be better served by a parliamentary form of government, but doubts that the change will ever be made.

Still, he says, "this is the most open capital city in the world.

"If you really want to find out something, you can always find some little man at the other end of a telephone line who will tell you."

He feels that the press has improved over the years he has been in Washington, has become more responsible; yet, he worries that the press has so much freedom that it has to be careful not to abuse it.

NO REGRETS

In June of 1929, Strout purchased Ticket No. 1 on a preview offering of the first transcontinental air service open to the public. It was actually a combination of train and air service; the plane, a 10-passenger Ford trimotor, flew by day, at about 110 miles an hour, making stops every 250 miles or so to refuel, and the passengers switched to trains at night, moving into the comfort and security of a Pullman.

Strout wrote about the experience in one of his recollection pieces last year, and it contains a characteristic combination of zest at the sheer joy of the experience and a searching look at its implications.

"The cabins (of the plane) are ventilated by sliding the windows at each seat," he wrote. "'Big,' I write. 'Impressive.' 'Immense.' Yes, it's 50 feet long and 79 feet along the wings. TWA's present Boeing 747 is 231 feet long, has a 176-feet wingspan and carries 363 passengers . . .

"Our generation produced all these new toys: radio, sound pictures, television, and now we are shrinking America."

"My story is that of a typical Washington reporter," says Richard L. Strout today. "I've just been doing it longer than others. If you have a lifetime to live and you like what you're doing, why not continue, as long as you're still getting paid for it?

"I always wanted to be a newspaperman, and after a couple of trips here, I knew this was where I wanted to be."

There are no regrets, then, he is asked.

"Oh, hell, no!" Richard L. Strout thunders in reply. The very idea is incomprehensible to him.

RICHARD STROUT: THE OLD HAND AT 80 WEEK AFTER WEEK, A FINE EDGE OF OUTRAGE

(By Michael Kernan)

The trouble with being 80 years old is that everyone always wants you to talk about the past, when the thing you need most urgently to talk about is the present and, maybe even more, the future.

Old Washington Hand Richard L. Strout had his 80th birthday yesterday, and the people at the New Republic were waiting for him, standing in a ring around a table loaded with petit fours, strawberries and champagne.

Since 1943, Strout has been writing the TRB column, which appears inside the front cover every week. And that isn't even his main job. He's been a reporter for the Christian Science Monitor since 1921, starting in Boston.

At last he appeared, and everybody clapped, and editor Martin Peretz connected him to a plastic glass of the better champagne, and he lounged in the door, tall and trim in his dark blue suit and drawled:

"This is my second surprise party today . . . I have one more to go."

(Before he got there, the phone rang, and because it had been arranged for Vice President Mondale to call in his congratulations, the New Republic's dean, John Osborne, took the call. The voice at the other end was singing "Happy Birthday," and Osborne kept trying to break in, "But Mr. Vice President—" until he realized he was being hoaxed by staffer Ken Bode from another room. He hung up with an oath, to general hilarity. Later, President Carter himself phoned "and had some very nice things to say.")

They gave Strout a pair of oval gold cuff links engraved "TRB." The initials, a house pseudonym, are supposed to be an editor's inspiration upon glancing at a New York BRT subway car. Evidently, the editor was standing on his head at the time.

PASSIONATE CONCERNS ABOUT THIS COUNTRY

Then the guest said a few words, which neatly summarized an interview earlier that morning, when he expressed his passionate concerns about this country.

"We have a clumsy form of government," he said then. "We deserve a better one. You see it in various ways: We elect a president first, and then find out who he is. There's been a national failure of nerve, of will power, over the energy problem. We can't seem to make ourselves do what we have to do. I don't want to be too pessimistic, but the last 30 years have seen a decline in American preeminence."

He quoted Alvin Hansen, one of his favorite professors at Harvard (class of '19), who in 1945 wrote confidently that Americans "can undersell any competition in autos, radios, typewriters, etc."

"Now look at us," Strout said. "In 1945 we couldn't believe we'd have all this foreign competition. We couldn't believe we could ever lose a war. Well, we've lost a war. We've had a faithless president. . . ."

Ten years from now, he added, our Constitution will have its bicentennial, and maybe it's time we took a hard look at it. Do we really still need a guarantee that citizens won't have to quarter troops in their homes?

And this business of requiring a two-thirds vote on foreign treaties: "Can you imagine how I felt, coming back from fighting a war to make the world safe for democracy, to see the League of Nations lose out in Congress? At least three out of four senators wanted one sort of league or another, but they couldn't agree on which one, so it lost."

Maybe, he mused, we should study the Canadian parliamentary system.

He is regarding the Federalist Papers on treaties. He finds Jay and Hamilton, who wrote their pieces 190 years ago after all, poignantly out of touch with the needs of today's industrial nation and its global responsibilities.

"At the moment it seems that five people will decide the Panama treaty issue. The lobbying, the promises . . . it was Christmas yesterday on the Hill."

He has seen a lot of lobbying in his 55 years in Washington. It used to be the farmers who had the most powerful lobby. He doesn't expect the technique to go away.

He worries about the seesaw of power between president and Congress, notes that when Congress grabs the reins it never seems to do much with them and soon gives way to the executive branch again. He recalls George Reedy's 1970 warning about the specter of a Man on Horseback.

"I don't feel we learned a thing from Watergate," he said.

He mourns the "dangerous decline" in party strength, the weakening of the two-party system, the disaffection of voters and especially the failure of blacks to organize their voting power as they might.

"Also, I see a failure in the national nerve on this question of illegal immigrants, Mexico City is on the way to becoming the biggest city in the world. We have a million illegal immigrants a year coming in, taking jobs—mainly from black people—and we don't know how to deal with it."

In fact, the whole problem of world population growth has bothered him for years. It is a theme that runs through many of his TRB columns like a vibrant bass note of doom.

IMAGINATION IS THE DIFFERENCE

Someone wanted to know how he kept that fine edge of outrage in the column, week after week.

"It's not so much anger," he said. "I'm a reformer, and I see injustice—well, what it really is, is a lack of imagination. Imagination is the difference between a liberal and a conservative."

This morning, free at last from the surprise parties, the presents on his desk, the interviews by other reporters, he would go back to work. Perhaps would lope over to the National Press Club for a Richard Strout Salad (cottage cheese), or eat a liverwurst sandwich at his roll-top desk. And would go home to the big house on Foxhall Road, so quiet now without the five children or the 10 grandchildren. A widower for eight years after his first wife died, he married again in 1939.

With a noon deadline, he says he doesn't get in as much legwork as he would like, but you'd never know that from his incisive, balanced and always readable copy.

"I've been rummaging through a lot of my old stories for a book of reminiscences I'm doing. And you know, I used to say we reporters write on water, but now I see that we write on paper. Which crumbles."

"MR. CARTER CALLING MR. STROUT"

(By a staff correspondent)

In his capacity as Washington correspondent for The Christian Science Monitor, Richard L. Strout has been contacting U.S. presidents since the days of President Harding in the 1920s.

This week a President turned the tables. President Carter telephoned Mr. Strout March 14 to honor the veteran journalist on his 80th birthday.

It was all part of the unusual attention this city has focused on Mr. Strout in recognition of his journalistic accomplishments. He has been a Monitor correspondent for 57 years.

To mark the occasion the Washington Star and Washington Post carried stories and photographs of the Monitor veteran, who also writes the weekly TRB column in the New Republic.

A reporter and photographer were present at a party in the Monitor's Washington bureau when the Carter call came through. The President spoke highly of Mr. Strout and said he was a regular reader of Strout stories. Mr. Strout said he was very much moved by the call.

Earlier in the day Mr. Strout was honored at a Monitor newsmaking breakfast group, of which he has been a regular since its inception in the 1960s.

Later in the week he was to be a guest on the Washington-produced TV talk show "Panorama," which is shown in several other U.S. cities.

TRB AT EIGHTY—OUR OWN GREY EMINENCE

(By Carroll Kilpatrick)

More than a half century ago a young and eager newspaperman arrived in Washington. At about this time Bruce Bliven, then editor of The New Republic, was taking one of his weekly subway rides from his office in Manhattan (where TNR was then published) to Brooklyn to deliver copy to the printer. Bliven had in his pocket a new political column from Frank R. Kent, a Washington correspondent of The Baltimore Sun. The column was to be anonymous and Bliven had puzzled over how to sign it. As he rode the lurching train and pondered his problem, his eyes fell on a placard bearing the subway name—BRT, for Brooklyn Rapid Transit. Bliven reversed the initials and signed the new column TRB. It has been a fixture in this journal ever since. Today it is one of the most widely read and respected columns of opinion in America, and is reprinted in 60 newspapers.

Frank Kent was a fighting liberal in those days. After all, he fought Prohibition and he regularly attacked Calvin Coolidge. He was a slashing writer who believed that nearly all government was bad and all bureaucrats were miserable sinners. When Franklin Roosevelt reached Washington, Kent, in the Sun, became one of the New Deal's most acid critics, as might be expected of a good friend of Henry Mencken.

Other writers also were called in to contribute the TRB column. Kenneth Crawford, later a columnist for Newsweek, was one of the notable contributors in the late 1930s and early 1940s. Then, in 1943, the young man who had left New England for Washington about the time Bliven launched the column tried his hand. It has been his ever since, except for times off for vacation, for travel and for covering the Normandy invasion.

EIGHTY YEARS YOUNG

Every editor knows that the enthusiasm and imagination of youth make a newspaper or magazine sparkle. Richard L. Strout, who writes TRB every week on long sheets of white paper, is that youthful person. His long legs propel him about Washington every day with a speed that many of his colleagues find exhausting. Few can match his ability to digest masses of government documents and to see through every false argument. There is a report, obviously false, that Dick Strout is eighty years old this month. As the Duke of Wellington, standing in full dress uniform, said when someone addressed him as Mr. Smith: "Sir, anyone who believes that will believe anything." If Dick Strout has one outstanding characteristic it is his youthfulness. His enthusiasm for life and for the drama of Washington politics is as alive as it was the day he came to the city the first time. Just last month, in the issue of February 25, he wrote one of his sprightliest columns on, of all things, the statistics he, and he alone, dug out of the President's economic report.

"There's nothing more agreeable on a winter evening than to curl up before a good fire with the tables of statistics of the President's Annual Economic Report," the column began. "Let the gale howl. Let the snow fall. I have here Table B–28." That beginning might have sent many of his readers out into the snow for a breath of fresh air. But, knowing TRB, the majority must have kept on reading. There followed a dramatic and entertaining interpretation of those figures in human terms. Dick Strout did not see the dull statistics. He saw the human beings, the farmers, the workers, the blacks, the women, whose biographies were encompassed in those figures. He found sex, humor, sadness and hope in what he read. Did any other reporter find so much and report it with such style?

WISE ADVICE

One day early in the Nixon administration, John Ehrlichman invited Strout to his office to ask for advice. Ehrlichman is a Christian Scientist who had come to appreciate Strout's factual reporting in The Christian Science Monitor. Strout has been working for the Monitor since 1921 and has been a member of its Washington bureau since 1923. He is a reporter on the Monitor, a commentator in The New Republic. Perhaps Ehrlichman did not know of the second Strout. He asked his gangling visitor with the somber eyes and bushy eyebrows what he thought the Nixon administration should make its first goal. Why, to build the kind of social democracy and equality that one finds, for example, in Sweden, Strout replied, confidently. Needless to say, the interview was short and it was the only time the Nixon administration sought Strout's advice.

Later, when he was covering Watergate, other reporters asked Strout how it compared with Teapot Dome, his first big Washington story. During both investigations, Strout wrote, many readers charged that the press was "carrying things too far." Many voters, he said, "shrugged and said both parties were alike and it was all just politics." But there was a crucial difference between the two scandals, he said in one TRB column. Watergate was "more disturbing and dangerous" than Teapot Dome because it was "a special kind of corruption without greed. No sex, no dollars. Just power. It doesn't strike at oil leases, it strikes at democracy." Unlike some who have seen the same sort of argument or event time and again Strout is never blase about the story he is covering. He sees the drama every time and reports it in a way that makes it come alive to the reader.

CONCERNS ABOUT OUR POLITICAL SYSTEM

Long before Johnson and Nixon, Strout expressed concern about the growth of presidential power. As he once said, "there's a feeling that once you sleep in Lincoln's bed, you become deified. It's a dangerous thing." He is convinced that the presidential system is structurally muscle-bound, and he has long believed that the parliamentary system is both more effective and more responsive to the people's needs. No amount of argument has swayed him from that conviction, nor has he been pursuaded that it is idle to think the United States will move from the presidential to the parliamentary system.

Another campaign of his that failed was against the televising of presidential news conferences. In 1954, when parts of the Eisenhower conference first were opened for television, Strout wrote an unusual signed article for The New Republic, arguing that verbatim recording of a press conference "turns what has been an extremely handy, carefully evolved, semiofficial and unique contrivance into a theatrical performance. The press conference becomes a show. Its informal, easy-going nature is changed into a self-conscious half-hour broadcast." He argued that the informal mood that helped make it possible to pry out information would be lost "if each reporter knows that his boss, the world and his wife will listen to what he is about to say." Now there are as many prima donnas in the press as in the United States Senate. But to argue against television's intrusion was to try to turn back the tide.

Nevertheless, Strout was right about what television would do to press conferences and to the press. Some of FDR's press conferences lasted five or ten minutes, some forty-five minutes or an hour, depending upon the questions and the news developments of the week. Now a presidential conference must fit into television's rigid schedule and appearances often are more important than substance. On television, a President's every word is guarded; informality and give-and-take are held to a minimum, as Strout feared. Even in the Senate debate has degenerated because a Senator would rather use his oratorical skills to obtain a half minute on television than to explore an issue in floor debate. "The communicating medium is television, not the ornate Senate chamber," Strout has written.

STRONG CONVICTION

SALUTE TO BOB HOPE

HON. LARRY WINN, JR.

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, May 25, 1978

● Mr. WINN. Mr. Speaker, as I listened last week to my colleagues extoll the many virtues of Bob Hope, it occurred to me that probably no other event, except for possibly our Nation's Centennial and Bicentennial celebrations, had brought so much love and good will to this city and to the Nation.

Our city reveled in the glory of Bob Hope's sparkle for nearly 3 days. His was the only "show" in town, and it united people of all political persuasions in a way that only someone with his talent and genius could do.

Who else but Bob Hope could draw so many celebrities to our town? Who else could receive so many glowing words of tribute within such a short time from the President of the United States and no less than 80 Members of Congress? And who else could do it as gracefully?

In my memory, no other individual has been as widely hailed. As I reread the RECORD for last Thursday, certain words and phrases kept popping up. Words like "great humanitarian," "talented entertainer," "master of mirth," "dedicated American," and "distinguished citizen" were used over and over to describe the man who in his own inimitable way brought laughter, love, joy, and even some tears to people all around the globe.

Only man is endowed with the power of laughter. It is perhaps the most useful and important exercise we can engage in, and Bob Hope understands that.

We have laughed with him. We have laughed at him. But most of all, with his guidance, we have learned to laugh at ourselves. From him, we have learned that laughter is the best medicine in life.

The French writer and moralist, La Rochefoucauld said: "Hope, deceitful as it is, serves at least to lead us to the end of life along an agreeable road." Bob Hope has, indeed, led each of us along a very agreeable road.

Therefore, I want to join my colleagues in saluting Bob Hope's 75th birthday. Having met him on several occasions, I have come to believe we owe him a very special thanks—a thanks for letting the American public share in his celebration.●

CANCER AND THE CONGRESS

HON. TOM HAGEDORN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. HAGEDORN. Mr. Speaker, the U.S. Department of Agriculture, by sharply limiting the use of nitrites and nitrates in bacon and other cured meat products, is currently causing substantial disruption in this country's meat industry. The Department has argued that these substances, traditionally used to inhibit botulism growth, may cause cancer in test rats if ingested in sufficient amounts.

Rather than continuing to deal on an ad hoc basis with saccharin, cyclamates, bacon, food dyes, and whatever else the "disaster lobby" at USDA and FDA decide to ban, it is clear that a reassessment of the so-called Delaney clause of the Food and Drug Act is in order.

I would like to call to the attention of this body the recent remarks of our colleague, Representative JIM MARTIN, in an interview by Chemical Times & Trends magazine. His observations on the Delaney clause, and on Congress responsibilities in the area of cancer prevention are extremely interesting and provocative:

CANCER AND THE CONGRESS

Congressman Martin, you attracted considerable attention last year for opposing the FDA ban on saccharin. Your bill, H.R. 5166, requiring a risk-benefit assessment before the Agency could ban suspect substances, won a record number of co-sponsors for any bill in the history of the Congress. How do you view the events of the last few months?

Of course, since that legislation was introduced, we have proceeded to buy a little time by passing legislation which prohibits the FDA from enforcing its regulation to ban saccharin for 18 months. During that time, the National Academy of Sciences has been conducting a study to do two things which are related to my bill: to determine how to translate animal studies to human risk; and to estimate the benefits of saccharin. At the end of that time period, Congress will have to decide whether a little more time will be necessary or whether we will then be in a position to revise the food additive law. I am fairly optimistic about that.

Do you think that your bill in particular may have drawn a good deal of public attention to the risk-benefit consideration?

The credit has to go to saccharin. Long before FDA proposed to ban saccharin, I knew that the Delaney Clause was not a scientifically sound regulatory principle. But I wasn't about to challenge it, because everyone who did had been subjected to severe intimidation and accusations of being "in favor of a little bit of cancer." The bill that I drafted could not have happened without saccharin.

Now, risk-benefit comparisons have been used in evaluating drugs and various other safety questions, such as the operation of airplanes. It is a question of balancing the risks and benefits. Yet that principle had not been applied to food additives and could not be as long as the Delaney Clause was in effect. But saccharin turned that around.

Does the Congress have a responsibility to the public to set a unified government policy on the carcinogen question?

The Congress will have to be involved if we are to get a reasonable and uniform regulatory policy relating to carcinogens.

Hasn't Congress abdicated responsibility on this hot issue to the Occupational Safety and Health Administration, which is leading other regulatory agencies to develop a uniform generic program that many people feel is neither quantitatively nor qualitatively scientific?

Exactly. That is the reason why I say if we are going to have a reasonable regulatory policy, Congress is going to have to get involved in it. I don't believe it is going to be possible just on the basis of scientific argument to turn OSHA around, because they don't care about the scientific principles involved.

Let me mention that in addition to OSHA, you also have the Environmental Protection Agency, the Food and Drug Administration, with its responsibility for things other than food additives, and the Consumer Product Safety Commission. Those four have agreed in principle that they will try to work out a uniform policy. But unless Congress gets involved, I am afraid it is going to be a destructive policy so far as our economy and our productivity is concerned.

What do you think it would take to get the Congress involved?

First of all, you have got to get its attention. Saccharin is not a profound question, but it got attention because the risk is so remote and the benefits to 50 million or so people who use it are so great that Congress has to pay attention.

Now, there is another issue developing that could be just as potent—the banning of hair color on the grounds that when rats are treated, not by rubbing their fur with hair color ingredients but by feeding them an equivalent of, let's say, a human drinking 25 bottles a day, they developed tumors. There again, how real a risk is that for humans? Surely some of these ingredients must be absorbed through the scalp. But how much? How big a risk is it? If it is a severe risk, we would want to be concerned about it and eliminate those ingredients. But if it is a remote risk, I don't think you should even create any anxiety about it. Government does not need to busy itself by banning risks that are so remote as to be well within the range of the normally accepted risks of living.

By the time that the saccharin issue comes up again, many of the generic programs will already be operative. Consequently, many more substances are likely to be banned in the near future—without risk-benefit considerations. Eventually, the public will see the impact and react, but do things have to go that far before Congress gets involved?

Unless interest is clearly expressed by the public, more than likely the Congress will stay out of it.

Why?

Because most members don't understand the scientific questions that are involved.

So you are saying that certain things will have to be banned and the public will have to feel it first.

No, they must be proposed for banning. I don't think you have to wait until the public is actually deprived. That was not the case with saccharin. Rather, the regulation was proposed and immediately, before any harm was done, the Juvenile Diabetes Foundation, the American Diabetes Association, the soft drink manufacturers, the Weight Watchers, other weight control organizations, geriatric physicians, the medical societies, even the American Cancer Society, said that there was not a good case for banning saccharin. They all opposed it. They protested before saccharin products could be removed from the market. So I am saying the proposal has to be clearly understood; then consumers need to respond to that—producers and consumers, but mainly consumers. Because when consumers say, "We don't want to be deprived of this substance on such trivial evidence," then Congress will have the backbone to get involved.

But isn't the problem different with the generic plan? It seems that the issue is much larger and much more complex. If dozens of substances are involved in one action that would affect thousands of products, isn't it unlikely that the public will understand the ramifications until products disappear from shelves and the productivity and economic losses of which you spoke earlier are historical facts? Isn't it a different problem, needing a vastly different answer?

Well, part of the answer is that industries which see the impact must find a way to educate Congress to at least be aware of the nature of the problem. I don't mean pressure. I mean education—what the impact will be if this program goes into effect. Many industries will suffer disastrous impacts: the textile industry, the chemical industry, the agricultural industry, the plastics industry. The generic program will have widespread ramifications. Industry must speak up.

But at the same time industry must say to members of Congress that there is also a need for a more forceful regulatory policy aimed at controlling exposure in our plants to substances that are serious risks.

What about science as advocacy? It seems that American research has become more "politics" than "science."

Legislation that impacts on science is all political. Research in the laboratory is organized by individual researchers and is only political insofar as local academic politics are concerned. Scientific regulation has become almost entirely political. It is overdue for scientists to speak up and express themselves about scientific principles that are being incorporated into regulatory law and to discuss the relative merits and demerits of some of these principles. I am pleased that the president of the National Academy of Sciences has done so, as has the editor of Science.

But, in general, wouldn't you agree that most scientists have not come out of their closets?

Few scientists have stepped forward as aggressively as they must to help educate government representatives on these kinds of questions. We have the saccharin issue. We have the hair color issue. We have the fluorocarbon question, which has not gotten the attention of most members of Congress. Certainly, if agencies start banning textiles and closing chemical plants, that will get the attention of the members of Congress. But it is vital for scientists to help explain the meaning of these controversies. For example, the basic principle of the Delaney Clause is that the public must be protected to a "zero level" of risk—an absolute safety precaution. Scientists need to help explain to politicians that this is an impossible goal and a needless goal.

A key concern right now with OSHA's generic program is exactly that—it presumes there is no safe level of exposure to a known carcinogen. As a scientist, how would you change the generic prposal to make it a workable plan?

As a matter of fact, when I testify at the OSHA hearings in May I will be opposing their program and offering what I think is a more sensible generic alternative. I would characterize the OSHA proposal as the kind of thing designed by skillful attorneys rather than skillful scientists. It is an ingenious legal device, but it is irrational insofar as its science is concerned. Now let me explain what I would do and how it fits into the OSHA generic classification scheme.

I think that the first step in a regulatory policy is to screen chemicals to determine which of them have any evidence associated with cancer and which do not. That, as a matter of fact, is the principal purpose of the generic classification scheme as proposed by OSHA and CPSC—to determine if the substance under any circumstances is a carcinogen. Then you can focus regulatory attention on those substances that are suspect. The important premise is that the process should not stop there with bans imposed on all substances that flunk the test. OSHA proposes to do exactly that. In my view, that is not a sound scientific approach.

A second step is needed to determine the relative potency of each substance. Is it a remote potency or a very hot carcinogen, like aflatoxin, benzpryrene, B-naphthylamine, and so forth; or is it remote like saccharin or perhaps sucrose or others, which, if they are at all carcinogenic, are extremely remotely so? This assessment reveals which ones should have regulatory priority. Those that are very potent need an aggressive response through steps three and four.

The third step determines, on the basis of potency and the actual human exposure, how great the risk is to humans. If it is absorbed through the scalp, how much? This, for instance, can be done with radioactive traces telling you how much is absorbed into the bloodstream, how much is passed through the urine and in what form. So if they are very potent carcinogens, or even moderately potent, how much is actually absorbed into the system and, therefore, what is the normal exposure of humans, including specific high exposure groups that work with the substance? On the basis of exposure data you estimate the risk.

The fourth step is the crucial one. You compare that degree of risk with other ordinary risks—for example, the risk of sitting beside a concrete wall, living in a house that has wood construction and has chips and wallboard, the radiation exposure to television sets and other household devices, and even sun bathing or the risk of drowning while fishing. Put the risks in perspective and see if the risk associated with this substance is well within those ordinarily acceptable risks or whether it is a more dangerous risk.

What if the risk is, say, one in a million?

That is about the lower limit of where you apply some limitation. If it is a trivial risk, then I would say don't do anything more about it. It really is not going to protect the public by getting them anxious about natural trace carcinogens in natural foods and their natural environment, and it certainly won't reduce the number of cancer deaths to ban a substance that has trivial risk. Therefore, don't worry about it. If we believe animal tests, you have to believe that anxiety increases your risk of cancer.

Anxiety? What do the tests show?

Even spinning the animals on turntables disorients them and increases their susceptibility to other substances that cause cancer. We are not going to ban figure-skating or merry-go-rounds and so on. What I'm saying is, if it is a relatively low degree risk, don't get people unnecessarily upset about it. If, on the other hand, the risk is significant, considering the potency and the actual exposure, then you need a regulatory mechanism that is based on the comparison of the risks and the benefits. If the risks far outweigh the benefits, then it ought to be banned.

Would there also be standards for setting particular levels of exposure?

Well, yes. But the main thing I want to argue for at this point is the principles that are involved, the four principles, as to decide whether one in a million is the dividing line.

The principles are sound. But doesn't the whole concept of a generic approach negate consideration of single-product uses of a particular chemical?

If you follow the OSHA-type approach, yes, it would. Under my approach, no, it wouldn't. Because what I am saying, as far as step three is concerned, is that you do take into account what the actual human exposure is for the general population. If the way in which people are actually exposed to a substance is such that only parts per trillion get into your system, and if that would lead to a prediction of a remote risk, then take that into account. If, for instance, with a certain pesticide application you find that there is a very great danger if it is mishandled, you need a different kind of regulatory control for that application. Don't ban the entire substance. Compare the risks under each of several regulatory options with the benefits. For example, what is the risk to humans from DDT? Take into account risks to other animals, as well, but principally, what is the risk to humans? And there is just not any evidence that DDT is carcinogenic to humans, because a lot of people have been exposed to quite a lot of it. Take Mirex and the fire ant. How do we trade off fire ants versus whatever risk there is associated with Mirex? If there is a moderate risk, then control the way in which it is used. Give warnings; give limitations on packaging; limit the amount that you can use. If necessary, provide supervision or educational programs on how to use some of these substances in a certain way, based on the comparison of benefits and risks.

So there are four steps. First, is it carcinogenic? Second, if so, how potent is it? Third, based on that potency and the actual exposure, what is the human risk? And fourth, compare the degree of risk and devise an appropriate regulatory mechanism based on those considerations.

So, in short, you support a generic type of approach with risk-benefit considerations as a viable regulatory tool.

I wouldn't reject the generic classification system out of hand, but I would say that once you have made that classification, whether it is Class I, Class II, Class III, don't stop there. Don't ban everything in Class I and half of Class II. Focus your attention instead on the ones that are dangerous. OSHA's classification system is not based on how potent a substance is. It is based on whether you have one or two lines of evidence. That is their generic classification system. If you have two independent experiments that are both positive, even if 10 studies are negative, then it is Class I and you ban it. If you have just one experiment plus a laboratory test tube, like the salmonella mutagen test, then they say that is Class II. The important thing should not be whether it is Class I or II, but how potent it is and how great the exposure.

What about the scientific tests used for making such assessments? Do we have an adequate state of knowledge right now, to test for carcinogens, to predict?

Specialists in toxicology are best qualified to discuss that. I have spent a good bit of time in sessions with toxicologists, talking with respresentatives of the Society of Toxicology, participating in a seminar that was put on by the International Society for Environmental Toxicology. While there are some individual exceptions, most toxicologists feel that the massive daily overdose mechanism or approach is useful only as a screening device and should not be the basis for regulation. Unfortunately, once that screening test is carried out, if it turns out positive someone moves to ban the substance. With food additives such as saccharin, the FDA has to ban it.

Toxicologists say that once you find a positive massive dose test, you must carry out experiments at other dose levels to find out the dose-response relationship. You must examine metabolic evidence to learn about the mechanism of what is actually taking place. Is it a true chemical carcinogen or is it working through some secondary effect by overloading a defense mechanism in your body that is controlling or protecting you from something else? That very likely is the principal explanation of what is happening with saccharin. It is only when you overload the rat fetus at that massive dose that it develops cancer. Many toxicologists also question whether massive-dose testing on hypersensitive, inbred mice tells you anything about other mice, let alone humans.

You mentioned a moment ago that anxiety increases risk of cancer, increases susceptibility to carcinogens. Should the question of relative anxiety enter in assessments of laboratory test results?

Great care should be taken not to handle the test animals differently from the control animals.

Is cancer increasing? We have varying reports.

It depends on how you measure it. The fairest way to compare today's cancer statistics with a decade ago is to do it on the basis of adjusting for increased life expectancy. In the first place, if people live longer and longer and longer, there is going to be a corresponding increase in incidence of cancer, regardless of what you do with any of these substances. On a life-expectancy or, let's say, "age-adjusted" basis, the incidence of cancer is decreasing. If you look at specific cancers, lung cancer among women is increasing. Just about all others are decreasing, even cancer of the colon, which is one of the highest incidences of cancer. Lung cancer among men is declining. Stomach cancer is declining.

Also, when you hear people say that we need to ban sodium nitrite and we need to ban the antioxidants BHT and BHA because they might be carcinogenic, you must remember that they may also be associated with that reduction in stomach cancer by some preservative effect in protecting you from exposure to the decay products that would be there if these preservatives weren't present.

We commonly hear the statistic that 85 percent of cancer today is caused by environmental factors. How much of this do you believe is actually the result of synthetic chemicals?

Well, in the first place, the best estimates are that about 80 to 90 percent of all human cancers are caused by environmental factors. The next thing that you have to do is understand that 80 to 90 percent of those environmental factors are natural chemicals in natural food. That is, 80 to 90 percent of the environmental factors, all of which cause 80 to 90 percent of all cancers, are natural chemicals. If you take all of the chemicals out of food, there is nothing else there.

That means that something on the order of perhaps three to five percent of the incidence of cancer might be attributable to synthetic or manufactured chemicals. No one makes the argument that it is higher than five percent. Most people who have worked in the area feel it is closer to about three. That doesn't mean that you neglect that three percent, because some of those chemicals will be potent. You examine the potent ones and set aside the ones that are so trivial that they are only a thousandth of a percent of the problem. So that gives you an order of the magnitude of what probably is being caused by synthetic or manufactured chemicals.

What do you include in the category of "natural chemical carcinogens"?

Most of your environmental factors are natural chemicals—chemicals in the food supply, those associated with excessive smoking, overeating of rich foods, overindulgence in alcohol, and so forth. If nitrite is a carcinogen, it is present naturally in your saliva. It is present in green vegetables because it comes from the nutrient in the soil. So banning it in frankfurters is not going to remove your exposure.

Would you say, then, that the regulatory agency priorities are out of line in attempting to focus all agency resources for controlling carcinogens on the three percent that are synthetic chemicals?

I think that is a fair statement, but you must allow for the fact that OSHA, EPA, and CPSC are just developing their new regulatory policies for carcinogens. Now they must make sure that these policies will be sensible, reasonable, balanced, taking all factors into account, and not putting the entire emphasis on industrial chemicals. That, I think, is in agreement with the statement that you made.

What types of factors should be considered in a "reasonable and balanced" program?

Where will it get us? If we think we are going to reduce public exposure to zero by removing any carcinogen that we can find, what will we eat? We would have to remove substances that contain selenium, and selenium is an essential ingredient in the diet, at a very low level. At a high level, it is toxic. But it is essential at an extremely low, detectable level.

Would you remove all traces of aflatoxin and other mycotoxin by-products that are present in all grains and leafy vegetables, and in nuts and fish and tomatoes, etc? Not at a risky, dangerous level. I don't want you to get anxious about that, either. But it is there. It is detectable. It is present.

If you remove BHA and BHT and nitrite, what do you do about the botulism outbreak? It just doesn't make sense. If you are really going to be thorough, you have to ban tryptophan. Tryptophan is an essential amino acid, present in all protein. But it presents evidence of a risk that is on the same order of magnitude as that associated with saccharin. No one is going to ban tryptophan. You can't ban an essential amino acid. If you are going to ban polycylic aromatic hydrocarbons, you are going to have to ban all cooked meat, except maybe some boiled foods.

In your four-step sequence, the first step was, in essence, to determine the carcinogenicity. Somebody has to make that determination. Does the scientific expertise lie within an agency, such as OSHA, to make determinations of that nature? If not, can you suggest how to get such expertise into the government?

That is an interesting consideration. One alternative would be a panel of toxicologists to review the evidence and determine whether it is sufficient or that more evidence is needed. For instance, the panel might say that other kinds of tests with lower primates like monkeys should be carried out before you generalize to man. Toxicologists say, "If the substance is carcinogenic with just one animal—and, as in the case of saccharin, just one sex of just one hypersensitive species—then that is not a carcinogen." They believe that you must show that it is carcinogenic with several different kinds of animals. Especially, you must determine if it causes earlier incidence of tumors in monkeys, a very sensitive test. That is one approach. The political problem of course, is that any such panel of toxicologists will get chewed up by the phobia-merchants. As soon as you have a screening test that shows positive evidence, however remote, the phobia-merchants are going to start screaming about the fact that a thousand people are dying of cancer every day, which is a very distressing fact, and they will somehow try to get people to believe that the remote risk in question is the cause of it all, when in fact it is not the cause of any detectable part of it. A panel of toxicologists would provide the expertise but, politically, it may not be a legislative strategy that would stand up.

You see, what I am saying is if you have any evidence whatsoever that there is an increase in cancer associated with any experiment, then it is worth looking at further. You don't need a panel of toxicologists. But you don't ban it unless you have reason to believe and a basis for showing that it is a serious risk in the way in which people are actually exposed to it. Although it would be debatable, that can be reduced to fairly simple mathematics. I don't mean the kind of mathematics that FDA used in saying saccharin would cause 1,200 additional cancers. They did not use arithmetic. They used imaginary numbers and inflated them.

Should the public have the right to make its own assessment of what risks are unreasonable?

If you have strong evidence that there is a severe risk, deal with it through a straightforward regulatory response. If the public is going to react, let them do it through the political process. The public is not equipped generally to assess the order of risk, so someone must do that and publicize the results. If the evidence is not there, or if the risk is questionable, then tell that to the people and let them make their own choices. If they want to give up fluorocarbons, they can do so. If they want to keep saccharin and hair color, let them. But if there is sound evidence of a serious risk, I don't think you need to throw the substance out there and have people exposing each other to it.

Will there ever in our lifetime be a national prioritizing of health, safety, and environmental dangers based on risk, as you suggested earlier? And who should undertake that priority listing?

I think that is evolving right now. It is taking place under the auspices of OSHA and the Environmental Protection Agency and FDA and the Consumer Product Safety Commission. Congress is really not equipped to judge the quality of that work, but toxicologists are. That is why I go back to what I said earlier. People who are in that field need to speak up. Now, I talked with several toxicologists who will be attending the OSHA hearings. At first they said, "We are tired of talking about it; we are not going to get anywhere." But I think I have persuaded them not only to attend but to speak up and help establish a record about the OSHA proposal. That record, I think, will strengthen the willingness of members of Congress, once their attention is brought to it, to support a more scientifically sound approach to carcinogen regulation, rather than the Delaney type of abolutist approach that OSHA is proposing.

Toxicologists need to say that there is no such thing as an absolute zero risk. They need to say that there is no way to remove all risk. They need to say that a substance that causes cancer only at a massive daily overdose in a two-generation study on just one sex of one species of one animal is not a carcinogen. They need to say that.

But they run the same risk you talked about earlier of getting "chewed up."

I would like to talk about that a little bit. Yes, when they take a professionally responsible stance against scientific nonsense, they subject themselves to the same kind of attack that I said was intimidating members of Congress, and they too may be intimidated. They may have their laboratories investigated by a series of federal agencies until they shut up and get back in the corner. I am aware of that. But if they will come forward in great numbers, through their professional societies, backing each other up, they can reduce the risk that any one individual has to bear.

How do you react to claims of a sort of "mass hysteria" for total risk-removal at the sake of whatever scientific evidence exists?

I would dispute one word. It is not mass hysteria. It is a very limited group that is over-reacting—a group of people who anoint themselves as advocates for consumers. They are the ones who are trying to push this absolute perfection principle. The mass of people are not getting hysterical about it. Real consumers speaking for themselves did not demand that saccharin be banned. They demanded that the ban be bombed.

What about the General Accounting Office becoming a sort of cannon to the regulatory agencies, urging them to do even more in the area of chemical controls?

The General Accounting Office is a part of the Congress. It is a part of the Legislative Branch. Any chairman of a subcommittee can ask the General Accounting Office to investigate someone. Human nature being what it is, every business, every office—even Congressional offices, by the way—are going to have some mistakes that they have made along the way, and the General Accounting Office can very efficiently expose whatever mistakes they make. But GAO shouldn't be used as a device for intimidating those who speak up.

To what do you attribute the recent barrage of reports from GAO on the performance of the Environmental Protection Agency in administering its special pesticides program; on the FDA and the Department of Agriculture for not having programs adequate to assess the impact of pesticide residues on meats and poultry; on the Department of Transportation for poor pipeline controls; on the CPSC for having weak substantial hazards program?

I can't answer your question. But you as a citizen can ask under the Freedom of Information Act who is requesting these particular investigations and why. Somebody with perhaps an axe to grind may have persuaded a member of Congress to initiate these investigations. It is a very powerful tool. Such investigations should be examined.

What would you put on a list of key Congressional priorities to be resolved in the next two to three years?

Well, number one is an energy policy which balances conservation with increased domestic production. Number two would be restraining the growth of government—not just the regulatory function but government—and providing real jobs for people who are unemployed. How long a list do you want?

It's a good list so far. What do you think of voluntary standards—standards proposed by an industry to regulate itself—self-regulation, where risks are not severe, through groups like ASTM, ANSI?

The problem there is that if industry regulates itself and a mistake is made, the worst possible interpretation is going to be made of that mistake. It leads to the kind of hysteria we have got now. That had its day. That had its place. It was a good-faith effort for a while. But I don't think you are going to be able to avoid a regulatory program dealing with carcinogens and other toxicity problems. Politically that is unavoidable.

What are your perceptions about the chemical industry science in America? Is it responsible? Does it have credibility? Is there integrity?

I think I used the phrase earlier about human nature being what it is, and I have to use that again. Human nature being what it is, there will be cases where people will take shortcuts in industry and will overlook, perhaps conveniently overlook, some evidence that they should have paid more attention to. This will lead to industrial mistakes in the handling of chemicals. Do scientists in the chemical industry have credibility as scientists? With the exception of the groups that I mentioned who have appointed themselves to represent consumers, generally there is a fairly high public regard for industrial scientists. You are distinguishing them from academic governmental scientists; yes. It would help, of course, if chemical companies promoted chemistry again, like the old duPont "Better Things for Better Living" ad.

What is it that makes the governmental system right now so susceptible to this move by, as you called them earlier, a small number of "phobia-merchants"?

I would put it in one sentence, that the fear of the unknown is greater than the fear of the known.

That has always been true, though, hasn't it?

But you asked me what is it that allows a group of people to terrify and manipulate policy. The answer is that they very effectively utilize the fear of the unknown. And they also very effectively use the politics of intimidation.

Why?

I have to assume their goal is what they say it is, and that is to eliminate human exposure to carcinogens and to toxic substances. But I think that it is nonsense as far as science is concerned. It is obsolete in view of the increasing sensitivity of analytical detection of chemicals. There is no way you can avoid eating food with a detectable carcinogen in it, or, if you do, you starve.●

POLL SHOWS PUBLIC SUPPORT OF TUITION TAX CREDIT

HON. LAWRENCE COUGHLIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, as you know, we are to begin consideration today of H.R. 12050, a bill to provide an income tax credit for educational expenses. I am pleased to call to the attention of my colleagues the findings of a recent Harris poll which reports that a 65 to 25 percent majority of Americans support the idea of a tuition tax credit system as a form of desperately needed relief for middle-income families with children in school. This article appeared in the May 18, 1978, issue of the Binghamton, N.Y. newspaper, the Sun Bulletin, and I am sure that the strong public support of tuition tax credits shown in the results of this poll will convince my colleagues of the urgent need to pass this bill.

The article follows:

PUBLIC SUPPORTS TUITION TAX BREAK

(By Lou Harris)

A 65–25 percent majority of Americans supports the idea of Congress passing a $250 tuition tax break for each child for whom a taxpayer is now paying tuition, according to the latest Harris survey. Sens. Bob Packwood, R-Ore., and Daniel P. Moynihan, D-N.Y., have sponsored such a bill, although President Carter and the Democratic leadership of Congress oppose it.

The basic reasons why Americans back the bill are not hard to find:

By a lopsided 82–13 percent, a majority feels "it is very hard for middle-class families to afford to send their children to school, and relief for them is long overdue." Among the 23 percent of Americans who pay tuition to send their children to school, an even higher 89–10 percent majority feels this way. Significantly, even among those with no children at tuition schools, an 80–14 percent majority sympathizes with the parents who pay for their children's education.

By 63–28 percent, a majority also feels that the proposed tuition tax cut will be "a way to get some tax relief to parents who send their children to parochial and private schools and have not been able to get any federal aid up to now." Among those who pay tuition, an even higher 73–21 percent majority feels this way.

The most controversial part of the tuition tax credit issue revolves around giving the same relief to those who send their children to religious schools as to those who do not. Traditionally, the courts have declared unconstitutional any direct aid to parochial schools on the grounds that such assistance would violate the separation of church and state. Sens. Moynihan and Packwood have argued that, by giving tax relief to the parents of children in religous schools, the aid is not going directly to the parochial schools. It is almost certain that if the bill is passed, an early test in the federal courts will follow.

In at least two respects, Americans have some doubts about the wisdom of the tuition tax credit, according to the survey of 1,999 adults nationwide:

A 56–38 percent majority agrees that "it is wrong to give everyone the same tuition tax credit, including rich people who can afford to send their children to school." Among parents who now pay tuition, an almost identical majority feels the same way on this issue.

It is clear from this finding that while people might be willing to give tax credits to those who send their children to parochial schools, they are deeply bothered by the thought of subsidizing the rich. This ties in closely to the general notion shared by 77 percent that most of the tax laws already favor the rich over the poor.

By a relatively close 45–37 percent, a plurality of the public is worried that "if the tuition tax credit bill is passed, it could make the federal deficit higher by $5 billion, which could add to inflation." Among those with children in school where tuition is paid, an even higher 49–33 percent majority holds this view.

The public has become highly aware of the fact that tax reductions can have the same effect as federal spending in leading to a higher federal deficit.

Despite these important reservations, when people are asked outright whether they favor or oppose the tuition tax credit, a clear-cut 65–25 percent majority supports it. It is not surprising that those who will be the beneficiaries of the bill support it by a much higher 77–19 percent. Catholics also back it by a lopsided 78–16 percent, while white Protestants are for it by a lower 59–29 percent.

Given the degree of support for the tuition tax credit, it may be difficult for President Carter to have his veto sustained should he veto the bill. It looks as if it will be difficult, indeed, to stop the tuiton tax credit from becoming law—although the courts may have the last say.●

THE PESTICIDES PLAGUE

HON. MARK ANDREWS

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. ANDREWS of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, in March the Washington Post carried an editorial in their Outlook section by Daniel Zwerdling entitled, 'The Pesticides Plague, Evidence Indicates They Create Superpests, Make Crops Vulnerable."

Those of us from areas where the use of pesticides is so important are concerned over the growing number of articles like this one that paint pesticides as dangerous and ineffective.

The Council for Agricultural Science and Technology has prepared a response to this article and I would like to place that article in the RECORD at this point. CAST has done an excellent job in pointing out what the American farmer, with the help of modern science—including improved pesticides—has been able to accomplish in the last decades. I think it is important that this side of the story be known.

The article follows:

THE PESTICIDES PLAGUE [1]

Since 1910, total American farm output has increased tenfold, production per man-hour has increased more than tenfold, and yield per acre has increased sixfold. Each person employed on the farm now produces food and fiber for 53 of his countrymen and another 20 or so persons in other countries. This revolution in production is due to better technology, largely the breeding of better plants and animals, farm mechanization, and the greater use of fertilizers, pesticides, and growth regulators.

Nowadays, most people accept agricultural abundance as a matter of course, along with better health care and other advances in technology. A few people object to modern farming, complaining that new varieties do not taste good or have other faults. Machines are opposed as dehumanizing, and chemicals are claimed to be unnecessary and to cause more problems than they solve. This is the theme of an article about pesticides by Daniel Zwerdling that appeared in the "The Washington Post" on March 5.

According to Mr. Zwerdling, we originally had few pests, and these caused little trouble until modern pesticides were invented. He claims that pesticides create superstrains of weeds and insects that did not exist before. Mr. Zwerdling is of the opinion that these monster pests are on the verge of wiping out the Corn Belt and other major agricultural areas of the country. He claims also that the use of pesticides changes the nature of crop plants, making them more vulnerable to pests. Chemical pest control is unnecessary according to Zwerdling. He argues that the chemical industry persuaded farmers to start using pesticides; and, although these turned out to be of little or no value, farmers now have the pesticide "habit" and aren't able to stop using them. The solution, according to him, is for farmers to "kick the habit," to stop using pesticides. Pest problems will then solve themelves.

There are numerous flaws in these arguments, not the least of which is Mr. Zwerdling's low opinion of the mental capacity of farmers. He asks us to believe that farmers in the United States and worldwide are foolish enough to adopt, and make standard practice, expensive products and procedures that not only are ineffective but usually cause them harm. We are asked to believe that farmers are unable to understand so simple an economic proposition and instead become enamored of chemicals as a kind of contagious "habit" that they cannot break.

Mr. Zwerdling reaches his conclusion that pesticides are essentially worthless on the basis of an assortment of half-truths and untruths. To suggest a proper conspiratorial background, he claims, for example, that parathion was developed by the Pentagon as a chemical warfare weapon. Actually the original research was done by the I.G. Farbenindustrie in Germany, and the technology came to other nations from that source. Other untruths include the statement that attempts were made to eradicate the boll weevil by use of DDT and that this generated an "armada of super-weevils immune to DDT." The fact is that there has been no attempt to eradicate the boll weevil using DDT, nor has DDT in any way produced a "super weevil."

The notion that 2,4-D may have caused the epidemic of southern corn leaf blight in 1970 is nonsense. The causes of this disease outbreak are well known and have nothing to do with herbicide injury. The generalization that protecting crops from weed competition or treating crops with herbicides makes them physiologically more vulnerable to insects or disease is not supported by evidence.

The idea that chemical weed control makes weed problems worse is contradicted by worldwide experience. Herbicides have restored the productivity of millions of acres of land formerly heavily infested with noxious weeds. The acreage of noxious perennial weeds in the U.S. has declined steadily in recent years.

Contrary to Mr. Zwerdling's statement, the "green revolution" did not invent or even extend monocultures as a means of crop production. The term green revolution applies to the diffusion of appropriate modern agricultural technology into the underdeveloped areas of the world. Monoculture, the practice of growing one crop in a field at one time, has been a standard procedure since biblical times and is described and defended at length by Roman writers on agriculture.

Mr. Zwerdling looks upon the rapid increase in the use of pesticides as a measure of their failure rather than their usefulness. Virtually all of the recent increased use of pesticides is in herbicides and is part of a worldwide trend to substitute these chemicals for tillage as a means of weed control. The saving in fuel alone virtually dictates this change. The new procedures called conservation tillage, some of which involve use of pesticides, can save energy, increase yields, and greatly reduce soil erosion. Such procedures, wherever applicable, are strongly supported and promoted by the U.S.D.A. Soil Conservation Service, the Soil Conservation Society of America, and most soil, water, and crop scientists in the developed world. The average annual loss of soil from tilled land is about 10 tons per acre per year, eroded into streams and valleys by wind and water. Conservation tillage may reduce this loss by 50% or more.

Mr. Zwerdling, who seems unnerved by the knowledge that organisms often adapt to control measures, feels that these must surely be monsters or some kinds of superpests. It is biological orthodoxy that any control measure leads to some degree of resistance by the pest to that measure. For example, our cropland weeds are remarkably resistant to tillage as a result of exposure to intensive cultivation for thousands of years. Fly swatters select our strains of flies with a quicker reaction time. Sulfa drugs caused selective growth of bacteria resistant to these chemicals, and the same continues for their replacements, the modern antibiotics. Fleas will someday become resistant to certain pesticides and flea collars. The results will not be monster fleas or superfleas, but will simply be ordinary fleas resistant to a certain kind of pesticide or flea collar. The same is true of resistance generally. We need new kinds of flea collars and medicines and traps and plows to stay even or perhaps get ahead of the game. Each new procedure becomes more or less obsolete as time passes. It is a game that we can never win completely. It is simply evolution in action, and it applies to all living things and all measures applied against them, whether chemical, physical, or biological. Perhaps Mr. Zwerdling's despair over the status of pest control is his way of recognizing these dismal facts.

There is clearly no permanent solution to protecting ourselves and our resources from pests. Yet there is more to the game than simply quitting and trusting to nature as Mr. Zwerdling recommends. Two-thirds of our pesticide use is weed killers. Weeds develop resistance to chemicals only slowly, and with rare exceptions there has been no serious impairment of the effectiveness of these chemicals over the 20 or 30 years of their intensive use as a result of the evolution of resistance. The same is true of common seed protectants and fungicides. Bordeaux mixture, an important fungicide, has been heavily used for nearly a century with essentially undiminished effectiveness. Sulfur has been used as a multipurpose pesticide at least since the time of the ancient Greeks.

We can expect many of our current pesticides to be around, functioning quite well, a century from now. These will be augmented by other new and more effective chemicals. We can still expect to be using plows and rakes and mowing machines and traps, and we can still expect to have to work hard at the never-ending job of pest control. And no doubt we shall continue to have instant experts to be perplexed by it all.

Perhaps parathion or the flea collar will be gone in 10 or 20 years. But then, who is to say that some better way of accomplishing the same things will not be invented? In any event, science will have reduced the need for constant scratching for one generation of dogs, which surely isn't all bad.●

DETERRENCE AND THE NEUTRON BOMB

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Speaker, I realize that the President and his advisers, notably Mr. Young, Mr. Warnke, and Mr. MONDALE, have our best interests at heart. I think the President has sincerely had our best interests at heart when he canceled the B–1 bomber, delayed the MX, agreed to limitations on cruise missiles at the SALT negotiations, and announced his decision to postpone the neutron bomb. I believe that he believes that his decisions, a demonstration of unilateral restraint on the part of the United States, were sincerely intended to convey to the Soviet Union an honest desire to put a stop to this costly arms race and reduce the risk of nuclear war. I believe that the President is sincere when he says all of this, and that the antics of Ambassador Young and Hamilton Jordan aside, even as a comic relief, the President heeds the advice of these men on national defense questions because they feel as strongly as he does on these matters.

Consider the neutron bomb. Mr. Young advises us that it is "inhumane." He is right: it is inhumane. It is a weapon designed to kill. It is designed to kill military personnel in a sure-fire fashion, within a very limited geographic perimeter. But what Mr. Young and those of like mind do not realize is that the neutron bomb is an alternative to the 7,000 high blast tactical nuclear weapons already installed in Europe. If the neutron bomb is "inhumane," what are these other 7,000 nuclear weapons?

Consider the confusion that surrounds the President's position on this and several other related issues. He announces that he is going to postpone the production of the neutron bomb, but says he is going to continue with the production of the Lance warhead and the artillery shell used to carry the bomb. What is the President trying to do? What kind of message is he trying to send? We are going ahead with the production of the carriage without buying a horse. We are securing the parking spot without owning a car.

Mr. Speaker, the neutron bomb is a perfect defensive weapon. It is designed to be used against enemy concentrations in one's own territory, limiting collateral damage from nuclear blasts. Soviet theater doctrine calls for a blitzkrieg-like attack on enemy targets, seizing the offensive with deep penetrating assaults by armored and infantry decisions, supplemented by selective nuclear strikes. Soviet doctrine is highly integrated. It calls for a coordination of conventional and nuclear operations.

Mr. Speaker, the tank is an offensive weapon. It is absolutely nothing less than an offensive weapon. Its major job is to assault enemy strongholds. Doesn't anyone in the administration ask himself why the Soviet Union and its Warsaw Pact allies possess more than four times as many tanks as NATO? The success or failure of a future Communist ground operation in Western Europe will depend upon the efficiency and effectiveness with which the armored divisions can be used in combat.

This, Mr. Speaker, is why the neutron bomb is so crucial. It can blunt an armored attack. It could slow the wave of Communist troops and armor overrunning Europe; it can turn the Russian traditional disposition toward military mass and concentration from an offensive asset to an unmitigated vulnerability. The massive conventional strength of the Warsaw Pact forces is now supplement with the deployment of the SS 20 IRBM's capable of striking targets deep in Western Europe.

Mr. Speaker, the Soviet high command surely realizes the immense military problems they would have to confront if the United States were to deploy the neutron bomb. That is why Communist propaganda mills around the world have turned their energies toward the neutron bomb. That is why the Kremlin gets so exercised over the very prospect of deploying the weapon. And that, Mr. Speaker, is why the West must deploy it. It can deter war in Europe. It can prevent the very nuclear holocaust that Mr. Carter and his advisers are so desperately trying to avoid.

As in other recent military and defense commitments, the United States seems to be behaving as if it were already hopelessly isolationist. We are making unilateral decisions which have a direct effect on multilateral relations, the relations we have with our several European allies. In this desire to show the Soviets our restraint, our reasonableness, our good will, we are neglecting our firm friendship with NATO allies. The cynicism this must engender among our Soviet adversaries must be tremendous. What could be more cynically laughable than the Soviet offer not to go ahead with the production of the neutron bomb, the bomb they had not even developed. What must go through the minds of an adversary who watches carefully our every move, and who monitors our decisions not to go ahead with weapons systems in which we enjoy unmistakable technological superiority?

Mr. Speaker, I sincerely agree with the President's aims. But I sincerely fear that his decisions, on the neutron bomb among others, will only provoke the enemies of the United States into unprecedented, rash and reckless policies. It is perceived weakness, confusion, and irresolution that drives the ambitions of the aggressor. It is only perceived strength that will deter the totalitarian states from plunging the world into another war. We must as a free people show resolve.

Mr. Speaker, American foreign policy cannot me pursued in a cloudy hope for good will from men who have never shown anything less than ill will toward us and all we believe. The neutron bomb is an exotic weapon. Its development is an unpleasant necessity. But we must weigh the alternatives carefully. We cannot afford to miscalculate on optimistic assumptions, hopes, dreams, or desires. Writing in The Federalist at the very founding of this Republic, Alexander Hamilton warned his countrymen, and he warns us, his posterity:

> Let us recollect that peace or war will not always be left to our option; that however moderate or ambitious we may be, we cannot count upon moderation, or hope to extinguish the ambitions of others.

I was impressed with the observations of Mr. Stefan Geisenheyner on the revolutionary character of the neutron bomb in a recent issue of the International Defense Review. I would ask that my colleagues examine the piece, and that it be inserted into the RECORD:

MIRACLE WEAPONS

(By Stefan Geisenheyner)

Between the years 1250 and 1300 the first effective portable crossbows capable of penetrating armor with the steel-tipped bolts they fired made their appearance on the battlefields. They created a revolutionary effect in infantry weaponry because they provided the foot soldier with an even chance of defending himself against the hitherto invulnerable armoured horseman—the knight. Up to this time full armor had given the latter more than adequate protection against everything available in the armory of those days. To what extent this protection reached is illustrated by Marchiavelli, the Florentine philosopher, in one of his books: Around the year 1200 a minor battle between two armies from Pisa and Florence, which was fought on the banks of a river, involved about 200 knights, plus an unknown number of foot soldiers. After a day of fierce inconclusive fighting only two knights had become casualties. These two unfortunates had fallen off their horses and were drowned in the river. Their companions got by with concussions, bruises and broken bones.

It is therefore quite understandable why the crossbow brought a fierce reaction from the military of those days, in particular after Richard the Lion-Hearted, King of England, had been killed by a bolt shot from such a "devilish" weapon. Firstly, it had turned war from a relatively safe game into a highly dangerous affair, and secondly, it was felt that an era was coming to an end. Indeed, the crossbow revolutionized warfare and together with the first firearms appearing a hundred years later it eliminated the knighthood principle as a social and military force. Hence, it can be termed a miracle weapon of its day.

At the moment we are again on the verge of the introduction of such a new weapon, namely the neutron bomb, which is slated for tactical and possibly strategic use. Here then is another miracle weapon which promises to change warfare as much as the crossbow or the missile did. Whereas the nuclear bomb destroys by blast, heat and pressure effects, the neutron bomb is the first true radiation weapon, where the explosive force is small but the radiation set free for some microseconds is the destructive factor. All living organic substances found in range of the radiation forces set free by the N-bomb will be killed, or to express it in other terms, the zone will be thoroughly sterilized of life. This starts with humans and ends with soil bacteria; mutations are to be expected over longer ranges. To date there is no protection against this radation and it is highly unlikely that any will be discovered in the course of this century.

Actually, the N-bomb as far as combat effectiveness goes, with one major difference, namely that tanks or other armored vehicles do not offer protection any longer, and here lies the true core of the aversion to the new weapon. The whole concept of armored warfare as developed and practiced in this century must be scrapped. History of war is taking a new turn again, and the impact on society promises to be just as hard as that effected by the crossbow and the bullet when they made the armor of the knight obsolete. The arrival of the N-bomb heralds the end of an era, and a novel type of warfare based on radiation weapons of a yet totally unkown quality looms on the horizon.

But only a fool will believe that an international ban on neutron devices will stop their further development. History proves otherwise. The idea and the technology to build these new weapons are with us, and therefore they will eventually be constructed.

Nobody has any doubt that we are living in an age of rapidly advancing technology, and it is silly to try and halt the progress in weaponry on a predetermined level. If this were compatible with human nature, we would still be fighting with clubs or not at all. There will be more new and highly effective weapons to come. They will be endowed with properties we cannot even imagine yet, and we can only hope that their destructive capability—on whatever level it might be—will help to prevent at least the types of war as experienced in the past.

On the other hand, radiation weapons—and they include such exotic variants like charged-particle and laser ray projectors—due to their lethality, are bound to create new war scenarios which do not involve the accustomed masses of soldiers and armament facing each other on the battlefield. Indications are that this trend is already accelerating since terrorism and guerrilla activity are on the upswing. Against warriors involved in such small-scale actions, neither N-bomb nor other sophisticated weaponry will be useful. To combat them a new weapon has again to be discovered. This cycle will never end unless a radical change in human character takes place. And this is more than unlikely. Thus, we can expect more miracle weapons in the future, all of which will be designed to "end all war".●

THE DRAFT IS NO REMEDY

HON. WILLIAM A. STEIGER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. STEIGER. Mr. Speaker, recently, renewed attention has been drawn to the volunteer army and how well it is working.

One of the top experts on the draft and the volunteer concept is Bruce Chapman, who in 1966 authored "The Wrong Man in Uniform: Our Unfair and Obsolete Draft" and is now Washington's Secretary of State. In the May 13 Seattle Post-Intelligencer, Chapman had an excellent piece, "The Draft Is No Remedy."

Chapman says in his article that complaints about the volunteer force are "poorly researched and thought out." He suggests that critics of today's Army lack perspective, failing to consider the state of our military during the draft era and ignoring the fact that "nearly every tyrant of the past two centuries either has come to power at the head of a conscript army or has put conscription into practice immediately after taking power."

Bruce Chapman's article merits the attention of all those who are interested in the volunteer force-universal service-conscription debate. I commend it to your attention:

THE DRAFT IS NO REMEDY

(By Bruce Chapman)

One negative report on the volunteer Army by one congressman does not prove much, least of all that the U.S. should bring back the draft. Yet, that is the conclusion immediately reached by The P–I and several other observers after release of a study by Rep. Robin Beard, R-Tenn.

Less well-publicized studies, meanwhile, go unnoticed, including the 1977 Congressional Budget Office report and last fall's authoritative report by Dr. Richard Cooper of the Rand Corporation. Cooper found many beneficial changes under the volunteer force, including reduced rates of crime, racial incidents and AWOLs (absences without leave).

The reports by Cooper and others remind us that many criticisms being leveled at today's armed forces—such as the recent charge by ABC News that our forces in Europe are not adequately trained—have nothing to do with the manner in which military personnel are recruited, and applied just as much to the military prior to the end of the draft in 1972.

Circumstances may well require improvements in the military, but the draft is not needed or desirable as a means to achieve them.

Other complaints against the volunteer force are grounded in opinions that are just as poorly researched and thought out. The higher payroll budget of the volunteer force is criticized, for example, but the main salary hike came before the draft ended in 1971. In fact, it merely reflected the decision to pay a long-overdue fair wage (still none too generous) to soldiers in the lower grades.

The old draft, over two decades, simply exploited one portion of our youth with forced low pay while the rest—the undrafted—retained both their freedom and the greater buying power of civilian salaries.

It is also argued that today "many of the regulars joined to find work and escape poor educational backgrounds," as if that was not true previously, or as if there is something inherently bad about such opportunities being available. The charge is vaguely patronizing. Did the draft provide better civilian opportunities for the poor?

Then, the critics bring out the flimsy old canard, "History has shown large, professional armies to be dangerous to the state in times of stress."

History, in truth, shows the opposite. There weren't any large armies, in contemporary terms, until conscription came along, and conscription made the mass army possible. Since Napoleon marched over Europe with the first modern conscript army, nearly every tyrant of the past two centuries either has come to power at the head of a conscript army or has put conscription into practice immediately after taking power.

Hitler, Mussolini, Tojo, Stalin, Mao: All employed peacetime conscription as a device for militarizing generations of their countrymen and for stamping out dissent. But the nations that in peacetime traditionally relied on a volunteer military—Britian, Canada, and the U.S.—have never been seriously threatened by coups or other tools of dictatorship.

Nonetheless, a universal draft—"fair this time"—again is being urged upon us, to provide "useful training" and to "play social roles," remedying bad teeth and improving posture.

This "fair" draft of everybody in reality, would provide many times more soldiers than we require or could keep busy, and it would burst the seams of the national budget and rocket inflation still higher. It also would retard the private economy by depriving it of the productive contributions of millions of young people. It would disrupt the lives of those same millions, and its "training" would be irrelevant to most of their later civilian careers; witness the plight of so many Vietnam veterans.

As for the objective of satisfying such needs as better dental hygiene and physical fitness among our youth, we would be better advised to develop a program to serve those particular needs than to conscript a whole generation of unneeded personnel into the military in order to do so.

Indeed, given the government's record so far at running our private lives, does anyone still have faith in Washington, D.C.'s ability to succeed at massive social programs, especially ones pursued through means of coercion?●

GETTING TO THE "CORE" OF THE TUITION TAX CREDIT ISSUE

HON. LAWRENCE COUGHLIN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, when the House begins consideration today of H.R. 12050, the Tuition Tax Credit Act of 1978, an amendment will be offered to extend the credit to include parents of children attending nonpublic elementary and secondary schools. I fully support this amendment and would like to insert into the RECORD at this time a statement by the Congress of Racial Equality (CORE), a major national civil-rights organization, which makes a number of strong points in favor of tuition tax credits for elementary and secondary education expenses.

In an open to letter to Members of Congress, CORE puts to rest the fears of many opponents of the inclusion of elementary and secondary schools in this tax credit proposal who have alleged that tax credits would be particularly damaging to minorities. I urge my colleagues to read this statement carefully and vote to include credits for elementary and secondary education expenses in this worthwhile tuition tax credit program.

The statement follows:

AN OPEN LETTER TO MEMBERS OF CONGRESS ON THE TUITION TAX CREDIT ISSUE

The Congress of Racial Equality urges you to support tuition tax credits for elementary and secondary school students. CORE, as a major national civil-rights organization, rooted in Black communities across the nation, is in a unique and important position to speak on this legislation, particularly in terms of its effects on Black and other minority citizens. It is our long-standing concern for the education of our youth which has brought us to the Senate Finance and House Ways and Means Committee hearings and which impels us to address you now, as key votes on the legislation approach.

During the debate on tuition tax credits, various allegations have been made that the credits would destroy public schools and that minorities, in particular, would be hurt. We believe not only that such fears are groundless but that tuition tax credits will benefit the poor and minorities. A look at the hard facts and common-sense reasoning will show why this is so.

The rich have always had choice in America. Their children either attend private schools or, much more typically, they attend exclusive suburban public schools. Tuition tax credits are one effective way of increasing the choices available to poor people.

CORE has long been committed to the improvement of public schools, and CORE is unchanged in its dedication to this goal. However, the public schools are now doing an inadequate job of educating inner-city Black children. CORE, in response to vigorous urging from the community, opened CORE Community School in the South Bronx. In surveying the situation, we found that in the neighborhood public schools the children were reading, on the average, one to two years behind grade level, with many individual cases of failure much worse than that. In New York City the proportion of pupils reading at or above grade level has dropped from 47 percent to 40 percent in the past two years. The same dismal situation prevails in cities across the country. Public schools are enmeshed in webs of bureaucracy; while administrators' and teachers union interests are deemed important, the children's interests are largely neglected.

The people are crying out for alternatives. We have seen this at our school in the Bronx. We have seen this as parents in poor communities across the country do without groceries so they can scrape up the tuition to send their children to non-public schools. Incidentally, the tuition at these neighborhood non-public schools (which are much more numerous than the elite private schools often cited in discussions) is usually at a low enough level that the amount of the proposed tax credit would be significant.

These families we speak of should no longer have to face financial hardship to obtain quality education.

The lack of financially plausible non-public school options has contributed to the exodus from cities and the destabilization of neighborhoods. A vote for tuition tax credits would be a vote for strengthening communities and recognizing their right to control their own institutions.

Perhaps the most salient point is that the existence of strong non-public schools, fostered by tuition tax credits, will provide a competitive stimulus for improvement in the public schools. No one expects people to desert public schools in droves upon enactment of tax credits, and CORE, being strongly committed to improvement of public schools, would not wish for such an eventuality. Rather, private schools will be a catalyst for change. Competition is the only real hope for breaking the bureaucratic logjam now gripping our public schools and increasing accountability and effectiveness.

In the course of the debate you have heard school boards teachers unions and others with vested interests decry tuition tax credits and claim that public schools will be destroyed. Their rhetoric reflects only their own fear of losing power and their embrassment over the failure of too many of the public schools entrusted to their care. We note that, by and large the affluent have not abandoned public in favor of private schools. Rather, they have voted with their feet and moved to suburban areas with exclusive public schools, where per-pupil expenditures are two to three times as much as at the most elite prep schools.

Some civil-rights leaders have spoken in opposition to tuition tax credits. This reflects largely that the tax credit approach to tuition assistance is rather new in terms of minority community participation, and the possible benefits of this approach have been inadequately explored. Also, some minority leaders are allied with school board and union powers that be and are putting their trust in the same old non-functional formulae. But we have see the groundswell of opinion in the Black community at large in favor of alternatives.

In regard to specific features of tuition tax credit legislation the existence of a refundability clauses which would allow a refund to the taxpayer if the tuition tax credit is greater than the total tax owed, would be highly beneficial to the poor and minorities. They could benefit the most from this provision because of their low tax bracket.

In summary, every day tuition tax credits are not available is a day when more poor and minority children are stifled in our failing public school systems. A choice is needed now. CORE has been in a position to perform an objective clear-headed analysis of the tuition tax credit issue. We trust that you will perform such rigorous analysis and hope that you will see the value of tuition tax credits. ●

VIETNAM TRIBUTE

HON. HENRY J. HYDE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, the Veterans Affairs Committee has unanimously reported out legislation directing the Secretary of the Army to place a 5-foot marble and bronze plaque, as a tribute to Vietnam Veterans, in the Trophy Hall of the Memorial Amphitheater at Arlington National Cemetery. The plaque will carry the inscription:

The people of the United States of America pay tribute to those members of its Armed Forces who served honorably in Southeast Asia during the Vietnam conflict.

The Purple Heart and medals, ribbons, and tributes associated with the Vietnam conflict will be mounted in a manner appropriate for display in the trophy room. Plans are tentatively set for dedication of the plaque on Veterans' Day, November 11, 1978.

There is no doubt in my mind that the 107 cosponsors of my original Vietnam tribute legislation contributed greatly to the progress in developing the legislation that will finally give us an opportunity to pay tribute to those who gave their lives in Southeast Asia.

Mr. Speaker, I join the families and friends of those who paid the supreme sacrifice in expressing sincerest appreciation for the strong support of my colleagues who cosponsored the original legislation, and to the Members of the Veterans' Affairs Committee and the Department of the Army for their endorsement of the concept and development of an outstanding tribute to the memory of those who gave their lives in Vietnam.

In conclusion, I would like to share with my colleagues the following column in the May 28 edition of the Washington Post, by columnist Richard Cohen, entitled, "Walking Amid History at Arlington Cemetery."

WALKING AMID HISTORY AT ARLINGTON CEMETERY

(By Richard Cohen)

On the Friday before Memorial Day, the the subway takes me to Arlington National Cemetery. It has been years, maybe not since high school, since I've been to this place, and when the trains stops I am alone. The concrete station is quiet and the escalator climbs without any noise and soon you can see the blue of a perfect sky and then the tops of the trees and then, after a short walk, the rows of tombstones—small, white and neat. They have names on them and ranks and branch of service and if you go and sit among them for a while and wonder about them and about other things, a bugle will sound in your head. Play taps for them. Play taps for them all.

There are fresh flowers at the grave of Richard Edwards. The stone says he was a corporal—the 1st Cavalry Division. He died in 1967 when he was 21 years old. He died in Vietnam. Around him are Carlozzi, Robert M. and Fierke, Robert W. And Frest and German and a soldier named Bromberg. The oldest was 24 and the youngest was 18 and they all died in Vietnam. Play taps for them, too.

This is a beautiful place. This is a nice place to walk in, to think in—a place rich in history and heavy in emotion. You can walk off the path that the tourists take and go down among the rows of headstones where the little American flags snap in the breeze, and wonder about the men and their lives and the sort of things you stopped thinking about back during Vietnam—things like bravery and patriotism and pride and the judgment of history.

There is a cathedral somewhere in England—one of the beautiful, Gothic places where the nobility used to be buried and I remember going through it looking at the plaques and wondering about the ones who were buried there. You could come up close and read in the bad light that someone died in some war you never heard of in some place you never knew existed fighting an enemy who is now a friend, for some cause no one now quite remembers. But they were brave, the plaque says—they were brave.

I come upon Larry Smedley, a Medal of Honor winner. He lies in the shade of a tree. His tombstone tells of his medal and there is a replica of it engraved on the stone itself. Smedley was born in 1949 and he died in 1967. He died, of course, in Vietnam. The stone does not say how. Bertram Vogel Lobred of Kentucky lies nearby. He died an old man and is buried with his wife, Hannah. Something nice about that. Lewis Johnston of the 5th Massachusetts Regiment is their neighbor. He fought in the Spanish-American War. It's hard to remember what that one was about.

Across the road and up the hill toward the Custis-Lee mansion are the graves of John and Roberty Kennedy. A German tour group surrounds the grave of John Kennedy, but at the one for Robert Kennedy there are only two young people, both about 16 or so. They are taking pictures. We chat for a while and I want to ask them if they know who Robert Kennedy was, but they run off to join their group. They were only 6 or so when he was killed and only 5 when Smedley died. There are things they cannot know.

They cannot know how we lived those years. They cannot know that you thought Vietnam-Vietnam-Vietnam every day. You woke to it and you spent the day with it and at night it was with you when you slept. My friends ran from it and lied because of it and valued their infirmities. It is hard now in this age of the jogger to believe that there was a time when you envied someone with flat feet or a trick knee. To escape the draft, people became scholars in fields that bored them and married women they didn't love and some of them made bombs and went underground. Some of them didn't escape. Some of them died in battle.

Vietnam kicked my generation in the head. It did to us what the Depression did to our parents and I fear it will always be with us—a reference point, always something to be relived, and those who come after us will have no idea what we're talking about. They will look at us like we're crazy or out of date or both—like we're afraid to use the banks and stuffing money in a mattress or scared of losing a job that cannot be lost. Already, kids don't believe that there was once an underground and that middle class kids became bombers and already you can feel a nation getting antsy—itching to get a piece of the action in Africa. The language is the same. It's about commitment and interest and pride and purpose and the requests, of course, are always modest. They always are in the beginning.

At 10:47 a.m. the sound of a bugle comes out of the quiet. Somewhere there's a funeral and somewhere there's a bugler. A man in a white Banlon shirt hears it and comes to a halt. He brings his feet together and salutes. The sound of the bugle seems to come from every direction—sad, mournful, taking a tear from your eye. Someone is playing taps.

He is playing taps for them all.●

THE HIGHWAY AND PUBLIC TRANSPORTATION IMPROVEMENT ACT OF 1978 (H.R. 10578)

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 31, 1978

● Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, the National Society of Professional Engineers, a nonprofit organization representing 75,000 individual members engaged in virtually all disciplines of engineering, recently provided the House Subcommittee on Surface Transportation with its statement on H.R. 10578, the Highway and Public Transportation Improvement Act of 1978.
